BIBLIOTHECA SANCTA — BOOK I

With the front matter: the title, the dedication to Pius V, and the general preface. On the divine volumes: their canon, and the order and authority of the sacred books

English translation — Bibliotheca Sancta, Book I

Note on the Latin sources. This English version is drawn from two copies of Sixtus's Bibliotheca Sancta. The front matter and pages 6–108 were translated from the 1586 Cologne edition (Maternus Cholinus), which carries few marginal notes; the marginal glosses were then supplied from a second, more heavily annotated copy of the same work. From page 109 onward the translation is made directly from that margin-rich copy. The printed leaf- and page-numbers in both copies are frequently misprinted, so pages are aligned by content and scan sequence rather than by the printed folios.

DEDICATION

To the Most Blessed Father and Supreme Bishop of the Christian Religion, PIUS V, Pontiff Best and Greatest: Friar Sixtus of Siena, of the Order of Preachers, [wishes] FELICITY.

Many indeed, and well-nigh innumerable, MOST BLESSED FATHER, are the things illustriously done by you before you were raised, by the gift of the divine benignity and with the immense applause of the whole world, to the summit of the supreme Pontificate. But among the other works of [your] pious solicitude, which you accomplished in contending for the defense of the Catholic religion against all the heresies of this pitiable age, far more admirable is that truly divine providence of yours, whereby you delivered the whole Library of the Christian Commonwealth from the peril of the ruin intended [against it] by the heretics. For when, among the ten most eminent Cardinals with whom rested the supreme authority of the sacrosanct Roman Inquisition, you held the first place, there came forth, with you as its author, that most holy decree concerning the repairing of the Library of the whole Christian Church — which the most abandoned heretics of our times had so corrupted with their diseases and plagues, that nothing else was to be expected but its most certain destruction, had you not suddenly brought aid. For first you commanded that the books of nefarious doctrine be sought out through the whole Christian world and publicly burned. Then you took care that all the writings of Catholic writers — and especially the writings of the ancient Fathers, contaminated with the dregs and infected with the poisons of the heretics of our age — be expurgated and cleansed of blemish. Lastly you ordered that a Catalog, or Index, be published of all authors and books of heretical name, which were to be barred from the ecclesiastical Library and cast away by all Christian readers.

I, kindled by this most burning zeal of your piety, have gathered the eight volumes of the HOLY LIBRARY (BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE); in which I have embraced all those things which seem most to pertain, both to the reading and elucidating of all the authors and books which, approved by your most wise judgment, you have declared worthy of the Christian Library; and to the confuting of all the authors and books which, condemned by your most just decree, you have pronounced unworthy of the same Christian Library. And since certain pious and learned men have judged that this — whatever there is of my labor — would profit in no small measure the students of the sacred letters, and on that account have also exhorted [me] to send it forth to the public: I have dared to consecrate it to the most pious name of your Beatitude, judging that it befits no one more that a Holy Library be dedicated [to him] than you, THE MOST HOLY REPAIRER OF THE CHRISTIAN LIBRARY — and by me singularly above all [others]: whom you once recalled from the infernal regions [from the very jaws of death], and dug out from the darkness of errors, and illumined with the light of sincere truth; and, having led [me] to the observance of a loftier discipline, clothed [me] with the habit of your own holy profession — you yourself, with your own vestments, with your own hands; and adopted [me] as a son reborn by your spirit; and have so cherished me in this sacred Order of Preachers by your benignity and liberality, ever unto this very day, that I am indebted to no one on earth more than to you. And since it is not permitted [me] to attest in any other manner a mind mindful of so many immortal benefits, I have thought that this labor, such as it is — a witness of my not ungrateful will — should be inscribed [dedicated] to your Beatitude: whom, I pray, may God, Best and Greatest, long preserve unharmed for the dignity of the Apostolic See and for the aiding of the Christian Commonwealth, and flourishing in all affluence of felicity.

At Venice, in the year from the Nativity of Christ 1566, on the Kalends of October [October 1].

PREFACE of Friar Sixtus of Siena, of the Order of Preachers, upon the eight books of the Holy Library

With such clouds of ignorance indeed are all mortals encompassed, and overwhelmed with such darkness of errors, that by their own strength they cannot lift the bedimmed eyes of the mind to that most refulgent splendor of the divine light, in the beholding of which consists the highest and true felicity of man. God, the creator of all things, taking pity on this so profound gloom of the human mind, has bestowed very many remedies upon our blindness: among which that most excellent light of Christian wisdom stands foremost, revealed in the holy books of the divine oracles, whose most brilliant rays show, amid the devious and dark by-paths of this life, the unencumbered way to eternal beatitude.

And lest any difficulty either of foreign speech and unknown tongue, or any obscurity of abstruse meaning, should in any part becloud for readers the flashing brightness of the divine volumes, He summoned into His Church, out of all the nations of the whole world, various interpreters, expositors, and doctors, nobly imbued with the secular disciplines and divinely inspired with skill in sacred things, who should pour over the blessed scriptures of both Testaments into the principal languages of the nations, and should unlock the mysteries hidden in them not only with living words and the animated sound of the voice, but should also, with pen and ink, piously and perspicuously unfold them in pages and codices destined to endure the longer — leaving to us, upon all the parts of both the old and the new instrument [Testament], divers works of sacred explanation: that is, Translations, Introductions, Partitions, Annotations, Paraphrases, Enarrations, Homilies, Sermons, Meditations, Disputations, Collations, Coacervations [accumulations], Commentaries, Collectanea, Compendia, and other innumerable writings of the interpretative kind like to these, digested according to the diversity of talents and the variety of the times.

And lest either the carelessness of men, or the injury of time — which obliterates all things — should bring destruction upon such distinguished monuments of letters, God first raised up not a few prelates and pastors of the Church, kindled with ardor for the evangelical doctrine and for ecclesiastical discipline, who gathered up the toils and vigils of the sacred authors, sought out through the whole world not without great labor and enormous expense, and with great fidelity — or rather religious scruple — copied them out in most correct codices; and thereafter out of these erected libraries in the chief churches, in the colleges of priests, and in the monasteries of monks, stocked full with the most precious lucubrations of the holy doctors of the Church: so that the custody of so divine a thing might rest with those whose chief concern it is to pass their whole mortal life in the studies of eternal life, and not only to meditate on the laws of God day and night, according to the sentence of David [2], but also to instruct others delivered over to their care, and to school them both in the evangelical precepts and in the [evangelical] counsels.

For nothing is more useful for the training and teaching of the people of the Church than the divine furniture of books, and the writings of the noble chieftains of the Church, containing nothing that does not belong to the celestial and immortal goods. For from these, as from the most fertile and ever-verdant fields bedewed with the dew of Mount Hermon, the Christian people is fed with wholesome nourishment; the thirst of the hearers is quenched as from the purest fountains of living water and from the eternal rivers of paradise; and against spiritual diseases, as from medicinal gardens, are gathered the most efficacious remedies of herbs and flowers that perish by no old age. From these, just as from a most opulent treasury of riches, the poverty of needy souls is enriched; nor otherwise than from the best-furnished armories are weapons taken up, whereby the madnesses of infidels and the furies of heretics are laid low. From these, no otherwise than from a school and training-ground of all the virtues, the whole life, manners, and duties of the Christian man are formed: the unlearned are taught, the learned are exercised, the fallen are helped, that they may rise; the standing [are admonished], lest they fall; the naked are armed with spiritual arms; the armed are led forth into battle; those in the fight are heartened, lest they be conquered; the conquering are admonished, lest they lose their victory. In sum, there is nothing anywhere either honorable, or useful, or delightful — nothing great or rare — which could be desired in these [books] for [attaining] Christian erudition, for piety of life, and for the gaining of true felicity.

But, our sins so deserving it, it has come to pass that upon this sacred treasure of the ecclesiastical Library — which God, by such great solicitude of our forefathers, willed [luit, →]

[→] to be preserved for the use of the Church, there have now — O grief! — been brought loss and disaster, to be bewailed with many tears, by the ignorance together with the avarice, the rashness, the ambition, and the impiety of many utterly abandoned men of this wicked age.

[1] Among whom, first, the printers and certain booksellers, seeking nothing by their craft except gain, daily send forth new broods of books — adulterine, supposititious, pseudepigraphous, and bastard — having set upon the frontispieces of the works, without any judgment or shame, the false inscriptions of illustrious authors, that thereby they may sell them both dearer and faster. By this artifice, to be sure, they have foisted upon us, among many spurious births, the Questions on Genesis of Philo the Jew; the Questions to the Gentiles of Justin, philosopher and martyr; the Questions to Antiochus of St. Athanasius; the Paraphrase on Job of Origen, and Commentaries of the same on the same book; likewise the Commentaries on the Psalms of Arnobius the Rhetor; the Homilies on the Gospels of Eusebius of Emesa; the Explanations on the Apocalypse of Ambrose; the three books of Jerome On Proverbs, and three books On the Lamentations of Jeremiah; the eight books of Eucherius On the histories of Genesis and of Kings; and along with these very many other works falsely fathered, especially under the names of the ancient Fathers — whose doctrines, style, and times stand farther from their own titles and inscriptions than heaven from earth.

[2] And with a not dissimilar, but more impudent trickery, these same men — as the adage has it, getting themselves two sons-in-law from a single daughter — have oftentimes printed what was the work of but one author separately, and even in the same printing-house, under the diverse titles of two or three authors: exhibiting to us (that I may meanwhile adduce a few little instances out of so many for example) the Homilies on Leviticus printed in separate volumes, once under the name of Origen and again the very same under the name of Cyril; bringing forward likewise the same commentaries on the epistles of Paul, inscribed in some codices to Athanasius, but in others to Theophylact; similarly publishing the same Paraphrase on Ecclesiastes, first fore-titled with the inscription of Gregory of Neocaesarea, and then, the following year, with that of Gregory Nazianzen; selling the same commentaries on Proverbs, at first claimed for Bede, and soon after for Jerome; divulging also the same commentations on Job, in many volumes, under the name of Philip the Priest, but in most fore-titled with the style of Bede the Priest — under which [name] they have also issued the Collectanea of the same Bede On the Hexameron, struck off at the same time under the appellation of Junilius the African; and the same explanations of the Psalms, bearing in the earlier edition the inscription of Hugh of [St.] Cher (Hugonis Carensis), but in the later, that of Alexander of Hales.

[3] A detriment far greater and graver than these have the impious heretics of our times brought upon the divine Library: who, that they might win credit for their heresies from the authority of distinguished authors, have set upon the books of nefarious doctrine published by themselves the well-graced names and surnames of the Catholic Fathers — by this kind of imposture, forsooth, enticing to themselves greedy and incautious readers, to whom they might vend dregs and excrements for ambrosia and nectar, and death-dealing poisons smeared over with honey for remedies and antidotes. Thus in recent years they published abroad the pernicious volume of Oecolampadius against the Sacrament of the body of Christ under the title of Bertram the Priest, On the body and blood of the Lord, to Charlemagne; and, conversely, the work of Carlstadt against the venerators of images, with the inscription of Charlemagne, On the cult of images, to the sixth synod gathered in the East. And again they sent forth another work — of Calvin — under the name of Alcuin, the preceptor of Charlemagne, to the same Emperor Charles. In this fashion they transformed the book of Henry Bullinger against the visible church into a book of St. Athanasius, On the true and pure church. So too they changed the little work of Bucer against the merits of good works into another little work, with the lying inscription of John, bishop of Rochester (episcopi Roffensis), On the mercy of God. And with a like fraud they turned the Italian sermons of Bernardino Ochino, apostate and heretic, into the sermons of Thomas [Stella], of the Order of Preachers, bishop of Justinopolis [Capodistria].

[4] And as though this detestable metamorphosis of writings might seem, to these Proteuses and masked play-actors, of no moment or of very little: they have again, with a boldness far more pestilent, rushed upon the labors of the orthodox Fathers, usurping to themselves — above all in the writings of the ancients — a certain tyrannical power of judging, of censuring, of calling into doubt, of repudiating, of mutilating, of rescinding, and, at the lust of their fancy, of removing and utterly abolishing whatever did not please their own insane taste. Of these — that I may not review them one by one — let Oecolampadius, Luther, and Erasmus suffice for example. The first of whom removed the books of Ambrose On the sacraments out of the Ambrosian works, as if unworthy of Ambrose their parent, for no other cause than that they overthrew his heresy concerning the sacrament. The second cast utterly away all the works celebrated under the name of Dionysius the Areopagite — brought forward now for so many ages, under his authority, by great authors in testimony of the weightiest matters — offended, as he himself says, by their Platonic dreams, and by their unskilled and fri- [gidis →]

[→ fri-]gid allegories, in which that author would be forever playing. But the third [Erasmus] — whom the heretics, by way of honor, do not blush to call the Censor of the ecclesiastical library — snatched up the censor's rod against sacred authors of great name with such authority (not to say temerity), that out of their distinguished lucubrations he either removed a great part altogether, or reduced it into the lowest classes of worthless writers: taking away from Cyprian well-nigh half of his labors; from Jerome, a fourth; from Ambrose, one tome out of four; from Chrysostom, the half of one tome; from Augustine, more than sixty books or opuscula — of which, though I grant that some were not undeservedly expunged, yet very many were unworthily and rashly hissed off.

[1] I pass over the innumerable and almost infinite volumes of pontifical law and of scholastic theology, which the impious fury of the heretics has shamefully cast out of the sacred Libraries as tyrannical, barbarous, and sophistical, and has even burned up in public conflagrations of flames.

[2] I omit, for brevity's sake, certain profane defilers who, as cockle with wheat and lees with wine, mix into the writings of the Fathers their own trifles, old-wives' songs, and errors, with such a mingling and such a joining that they cannot be torn away from the authors' true works without loss of the whole work, and can only with difficulty even be distinguished: of which kind are Prefaces, Arguments, Coronides [tail-pieces], Appendices, Corollaries, Summaries, Glossemata, Annotations, Scholia, Castigations, Observations, Censures, Antidotes, and a thousand other by-works (parerga) of most impudent temerity, conferred [inflicted] by Oecolampadius and Lucianus upon Chrysostom, by Beatus Rhenanus upon Tertullian, and by Erasmus upon Hilary, Jerome, and Augustine — and lately condemned by decree of the holy Roman Church.

[3] And, lest I delay the reader longer in a matter so manifest, I say nothing of the translations and printings of the sacred authors, in so many places deliberately altered, depraved, falsified by the heretics, and violently wrested to their own heresies. I come rather to the blessed writers of both Testaments: whom, though above all — on account of the majesty of the divine word and the undoubted authority of our faith — they ought to have kept untouched and left inviolate, yet against none have these boars, more than sylvan [wild], raged more savagely.

[4] Of whom some, raising the beginning of contention from the very translations of the divine scripture, proclaim with sacrilegious voice that all the editions which the church of the faithful has down to this day venerated as true and certain are for the greater part badly translated, wrongly copied, contaminated, altered, in many places falsified, scraped away, added to, and in every way most vilely handled; and that therefore, for the sincere reading of the holy volumes, there is need of new, true, and emended versions: such as in recent years have been sent forth by Pellican, Zwingli, Luther, Münster, Erasmus, Castellio, and several other authors of profane novelties — who out of the Greek and Hebrew fount have translated the holy Bible into the various tongues of divers nations according to the good pleasure of their own dogmas, with scholia, glossemata, arguments, summaries, titles, and most pestilent indices adjoined: whereby they compel the divine scriptures to speak whatever they themselves have willed, and whatever of impiety they have devised.

[5] Others, having assailed the very authority of the divine letters more criminally and more impiously, diminish for us the number of the volumes of both Testaments and reduce it to a smaller sum: among whom Luther and Zwingli first eliminate from the old Testament the books of Wisdom, of Ecclesiasticus, of Tobias, of Esther, of Judith, of Baruch, of the Maccabees, and a part of Daniel, as apocrypha and writings of uncertain authority and credit. And from the new instrument [Testament] the same men take away from us the epistle of Paul to the Hebrews, the Epistles of James and of Jude, the second of Peter, and the second and third epistles of John, as being too little evangelical and unworthy of the apostolic name. Calvin cuts out of the Gospel of John the history of the adulterous woman. Musculus lops off the last chapter from the Gospel of Mark, of whose author and inscription Erasmus had some time before entertained doubts. Erasmus tears away from the new testament the Apocalypse of John, previously condemned by Luther, and pronounces that they are deceived who believe it to be [the work] of John the Evangelist — from whose earlier [first] epistle he also cut away that most celebrated testimony Of the Unity of the Trinity [1 John 5:7], as adventitious and thrust in from elsewhere by the Homousians [defenders of the homoousion].

[6] And the raving Fanatics and the Anabaptists proudly boast that the whole body of divine scripture has been corrupted on every side, but especially in the evangelical and apostolic letters: inasmuch as in them many testimonies out of the Mosaic and prophetic books were rashly and falsely inserted by half-Jewish Christians.

[7] Others, on the contrary, wishing to augment the number of the holy books, bring forward under the name of divine authors certain apocryphal writings: such as are the Protoevangelium of James, the Gospel of the Nazarenes, the Gospel of Nicodemus, the epistle of Paul to the Laodiceans, the Visions of Esaias, and other things of this kind, lately struck off by the presses of the heretics and illustrated with scholia. Such also are the Hebrew [Gospel] of Mat- [thaei →]

[→ Mat-]thew's Gospel; the Hebrew epistle of Paul to the Hebrews; and the Hebrew volumes of Tobias, Judith, and the Maccabees, far different from our vulgate edition — which Münster, having partly translated them himself out of the Latin into the Hebrew speech, and partly fabricated them, has put under the press and published, as though faithfully taken from the ancient archives of the Jews and from the very archetypes of their authors.

And, lest by enumerating each thing singly I weary the reader with too long a preface, let it suffice to have pointed out these things only, by way of example: which indeed, together with the other impostures of this kind — to be plainly detected by us in the course of the present work — have so tossed the precious treasures of the divine Library topsy-turvy, and, rolling them up together with the filthy off-scourings of the heretics, have confounded them into one chaos of undivided commixture, that nothing is now more difficult than, in so great a confusion of writings, to discern the true from the false, the pious from the impious, the pure from the impure; to distinguish the legitimate and truly genuine from the spurious; and to separate the depravations of impostors from the entire and uncontaminated writings of the authors.

Considering — I myself — this so great calamity of the orthodox Library, not without immense sadness of heart and the constant brooding of a grieving mind, I judged that I should be doing a thing neither wholly superfluous, nor at all unserviceable for the repairing of this loss, if out of the most approved writers I should weave together the present work, divided into eight books: whose arguments — that from these you may comprehend at a single glance the matter, the usefulness, and the order of the whole undertaking from its very beginning — I shall briefly set forth in this place.

The first book, then, treating of the divine volumes of both Testaments, will expound most diligently the several arguments of them, their authors, their authority, and the times of the matters described by their authors.

The second will review all the writings — extant and not extant, the true and undoubted as well as the apocryphal and pseudepigraphous — of all the writers of whom mention is made in the sacred volumes; and will lucidly explicate their arguments, and many obscure things in them.

The third, embracing the art of expounding the holy volumes, will show, by most apt rules and examples, almost sixty modes of explaining the holy writings, employed by the Catholic expositors.

The fourth, containing a catalog of those who have illustrated the divine volumes with Catholic interpretations, will comprehend, of all the expositors who from the three-hundredth year before the birth of Christ down to these times have expounded the holy books rightly and piously: their names, their race [nation], their dignity, their century, the number and variety of their commentaries, their language, their style, their kind of exposition, their method of expounding — and especially the various judgments of illustrious men concerning the principal expositors. To this will be added, in the place of an appendix, an Index (Elenchus) of the Hebrew expositors of the divine volumes; and likewise a brief admonition On the causes of false inscriptions, and by what conjectures their falsity may be detected.

The fifth, claiming to itself the censor's right over the expositors of the divine volumes of the old Testament, will contain annotations, censures, castigations, observations, and elucidations of the most erudite doctors of the church upon various passages in the explanations of the nobler expositors — partly to be read with caution, partly to be avoided altogether, partly to be piously interpreted, or at least modestly excused.

The sixth will contain, with the same annotating zeal and order, censures and annotations upon the explainers of the books of the new Testament.

The seventh, contending against those who have attempted to obscure the books of the New testament with their heresies, will most sharply confute — both out of the divine letters themselves and out of the writings of the ancient fathers — all the heresies which from the ascension of Christ down to this day have arisen against the several scriptures of the new Testament.

The eighth, with the same weapons, will overthrow all the heresies stirred up by the heretics against the several volumes of the old Testament.

These things, therefore, digested into eight books according to the order proposed, we have gathered together for no other cause than by a pious zeal of helping to serve the public convenience of all lovers of the sacred letters: that — the ambushes being detected, and the perils and well-nigh all the obstacles being removed, which the fraud of the heretics has set in opposition to those greedy of celestial wisdom — it may be permitted to the students of the holy scriptures to range at large through the ample and pleasant fields of the sacrosanct Library, with the greatest delight of mind, more freely, more boldly, and without stumbling. Wherefore I exhort the pious readers — for whose sake we have undertaken this labor, such as it is, with many vigils, sweats, and the expense of good hours — that, if they find any things in my writings which they judge to pertain to the profit of readers, they give thanks to the excellent authors of the church, from whose immor- [immor- →] [→ immor-]tal monuments we have borrowed whatever of good we have contributed hither. But if they detect anything said less than rightly, or strayed into through imprudence (for we too are men, and in many things, as the Apostle says, we all offend), again I beseech and implore them not to attribute it either to arrogance, or to malice, or to any other private affections of mine, but rather to ascribe it to my weakness and slenderness [of powers], modestly correcting and sincerely emending whatever things shall seem to them worthy of castigation. For I myself — a cast-down manikin, and not ignorant of my own lowest condition — not only, as is fitting, do I as a suppliant offer myself and all my writings to the apostolic judgment of the Holy Roman Church, but I also willingly and gladly subject the same to the reckoning [vote] of every candid reader for castigation and emendation: admonishing those who are about to read these things not to exact from me ornaments of words and elegance of elocution — which I neither profess, nor, if I did profess it, could I preserve it in so various and unequal a collection of divers writings — but to receive kindly from me the truth of the matters, set forth in such speech and order as was possible; and to embrace with their whole heart the ready willingness of my mind, my burning desire of helping, and my labor expended for the common profit of all good men: praying our Lord Jesus Christ, that out of His most bountiful goodness He may breathe favorably upon the beginning of our work, and after the beginning may grant prosperous successes even to the end. But now, to the labor of the sacrosanct Library already marked out, let us begin to set our hands.

LIBER PRIMVS — BOOK ONE

Of Friar Sixtus of Siena, of the Order of Preachers: On the Divine volumes — [being] the FIRST BOOK of the Bibliotheca Sancta (the Holy Library)

The first book of this sacrosanct Library — in which, as the first foundations of the whole work to come, we have laid down the enumeration of all the divine volumes, their order, partition, authority, authors, arguments, and the times of the matters comprehended in them — we wish to be divided into three Sections: [1] of which the first will contain the holy Scriptures and Writers, of the old as well as of the new testament, placed in the first order of the sacred Canon. The second will review the holy Scriptures and Writers of both testaments pertaining to the second order of the Canon. To the third and last Section we shall relegate the apocryphal Scriptures and Writers, inserted in various places of the old as well as of the new testament — showing all these things, now from the very testimonies of the divine scripture, now from the monuments of the ancient fathers, now from probable arguments, with the utmost fidelity and brevity. But before we expound the order of the proposed partition, the method of teaching seems to require that first of all we explain what the Canonical and the Apocryphal scriptures are, and in what way the Canonical writings of the first and of the second order differ between themselves.

ON THE DIVINE SCRIPTURES AND WRITERS OF THE FIRST ORDER — SECTION ONE

What the Canonical and the Apocryphal scripture, and [their] Writers, are.

The Divine or Canonical scriptures [2] (which the Greeks call διαθηκόγραφα, that is, Testamentary writings) are those which, according to the tradition of our forefathers, are believed to have been divinely inspired by the Holy Spirit Himself for our instruction: whose authority is so great, that it is an abomination (nephas) to doubt concerning their trustworthiness. And the Divine and Canonical writers [3] are those who, at the dictation of the divine spirit, wrote the canonical scriptures with such constancy of faithfulness, that not to believe them most firmly is impious. Concerning their venerable authority [4] Augustine, writing to Jerome, says this: "I have learned to pay this fear and honor to those writers alone who are called canonical, that I hold most firmly that none of them erred in writing. And if I stumble upon anything in them which seems contrary to the truth, I shall reckon nothing else than either that the codex is faulty, or that the translator has not attained what was said, or that I have by no means understood it — of this I shall have no doubt. But the others I read in such wise that, however much they excel in sanctity or in doctrine, I do not therefore think a thing true because they so judged, but because they were able to persuade me, either through those canonical authors or by probable reasons, that it does not depart from the truth." Thus far Augustine. [5]

Moreover, the canonical books of the old as well as of the new testament are distinguished between themselves by two orders: [6] of which the one is prior, the other posterior — prior, I say, and posterior not in authority, or certainty, or dignity (for each receives its excellence and its majesty from the same Holy Spirit), but in [the Church's] cognition [of them], and in time; by which two things it comes about that the one order precedes, the other follows.

The Canonical [books] of the first order, [7] which it is convenient to call Protocanonical, are books of undoubted credit; that is, concerning whose authority there was never in the catholic Church any doubt or controversy; but immediately from the beginning of the nascent Church they were received by the common consent of all the orthodox fathers, and taken up for the confirming of the authority of our faith: such as are, in the old Testament, the five books of Moses, and in the new Testament the four gospels, and others like to these, to be numbered in their place.

The Canonical [books] of the second order [8] (which of old were called Ecclesiastical, and are now by us termed Deuterocanonical) are those concerning which — because they came to the knowledge of the whole Church not immediately in the very times of the Apostles, but long afterward — opinion among Catholics was at one time wavering. Such are, in the old Testament, the books of Esther, of Tobias, of Judith, and of Baruch; the epistle of Jeremiah; the wisdom of Solomon; Ecclesiasticus; the prayer of Azariah; the Hymn of the three children; the history of Susanna; the history of Bel; the first and second book of the Maccabees. And similarly in the new Testament: the last chapter of Mark; the history in Luke of the bloody Sweat of Christ and of the apparition of the Angel; the history in John of the adulterous woman; the epistle to the Hebrews; the epistle of James; the second epistle of Peter; the second and third epistle of John; the epistle of Jude; the Apocalypse of John; and other books of the same kind — which of old the ancient fathers of the Church held as Apocryphal and not Canonical, and permitted them to be read at first only among the catechumens, not yet capable of the canonical reading (as Athanasius testifies in the Synopsis); then, with time proceeding, they allowed them to be recited among all the faithful (as Rufinus writes in [his exposition of] the Creed), not for the confirmation of dogmas, but solely for the instruction of the people; and, because they were read publicly in the Church, they named them Ecclesiastical [9]; but at the last they willed that they be taken up among the scriptures of irrefragable authority.

But the Apocryphal — that is, hidden, occult, or doubtful — scriptures are so called in two manners: [10] either because their author is uncertain, in which manner assuredly it can happen that even some of the canonical books are "Apocryphal," [11] since it is not altogether certain and ascertained to the Church which of men was their scribe, although she believes most certainly that their author was the Holy Spirit; or they are called Apocryphal for another reason [12] — that is, of hidden, unknown, uncertain, and obscure authority — because the ecclesiastical fathers did not know with certainty, nor dared to define, whether they were composed by their writers under the breathing [inspiration] of the Holy Spirit; and for this cause they willed not that they be brought forward for the confirmation of the dogmas of the Christian faith, nor be read publicly in the Church for the edification of the people and pronounced in the temples, but permitted them to be read only privately and at home. Such are the third and fourth books of Esdras; the third and fourth book of the Maccabees; likewise the [Appen- →]

[→ Appen-]dix of the book of Esther; the Appendix of the book of Job; the Appendix of the psalter; the Appendix of Paralipomenon; and the scriptures akin to these, which we have put off to the third Section. The name of "apocryphal" is also wont, in the pontifical decrees, to be transferred at times to the interdicted and utterly condemned writings of heretics; [1] but of this signification we make no use for the present, precisely because we believe that in the vulgate Bibles of the catholics there is no part which the apostolic Church has either pronounced heretical or interdicted to christians. Since, then, the whole body of the Bible as it now stands among catholics is distinguished by a threefold difference of books — namely the canonical of the first order, the canonical of the second order, and the apocryphal — [2] we shall begin from the enumeration and manifold partition of the canonical volumes of the first order which are contained in the old Testament, as well among us as among the Hebrews; intending afterward to do the like for the books of the first order which the scripture of the new Testament embraces.

On the various reckonings of the Canonical books of the old Testament, which are placed in the first order of the sacred canon.

The volumes of the first order, which alone are held in authority among the Hebrews, [3] the Jews are wont to reckon up with a threefold variety of numbers. Some — among whom are Josephus and Philo — reckon the sacred books according to the number of the Hebrew letters: [4] so that, just as among the Hebrews there are twenty-two letters, by which all things that can be said and written are comprehended, so there should be twenty-two volumes in which are contained all things that can be known and declared concerning divine matters. This enumeration, among the Christians, Origen, Epiphanius, Gregory the Theologian, Jerome, and Rufinus have followed. [5] Others of the Jews — of whose number are Aben Ezra and David Kimchi — count twenty-four books of the old testament, [6] according to the same number of letters, the letter Iod being nevertheless thrice repeated, in honor of the divine name; for the Jews are accustomed to write that four-lettered name of God — which among them it is an abomination, for reverence of God, to utter with tongue and voice — with the letter Iod tripled, after the Chaldaic manner, in this fashion: יייי. [7] This partition some of the ancient Greeks took up, because it agreed most aptly with the number of the twenty-four Greek letters; and very many of the Latins, ancient as well as more recent, embraced it with equal zeal, having regard to that mystic number of the twenty-four elders whom John brought forward in the Apocalypse — adoring the Lamb that opens the book sealed with seven seals, which no one could open, neither in heaven nor on earth, and crying out: "Worthy art thou, O Lord, to open the book, and to loose the seals thereof." [8] Again, some of the Hebrews have been accustomed to number twenty-seven books, [9] according to the number of the twenty-seven Jewish characters, resulting from the twenty-two simple elements of which the whole Hebrew alphabet consists, and from the five final — or repeated, or double — letters. For there are among the Hebrews five geminate or two-formed letters, [10] which at the end of words are written otherwise than at the beginning and in the middle, namely כ caph, מ mem, נ nun, פ phe, צ zaddi: which at the end of words are noted with these figures — ך caph, ם mem, ן nun, ף phe, ץ zaddi. Of these three reckonings the examples are these:

[1] In the pontifical decrees the condemned writings of heretics are called apocryphal. [2] The body of the Bible is distributed into canonical books of the first order, of the second order, and apocryphal. [3] The volumes of the first order have authority among the Jews. [4] By Josephus and Philo as many sacred books are numbered as there are Hebrew letters. [5] Some Doctors of the Church approve the opinion of Josephus and Philo on the number of the sacred books. [6] There are 24 sacred books according to Kimchi and others. [7] In what manner the Jews write the name of God. [8] Rev 5:9 [9] Some of the Hebrews number 27 sacred books. [10] There are five geminate letters among the Hebrews.

THE SECOND SUPPUTATION, according to the twenty-four Hebrew elements, which result from the twenty-one [sic — twenty-two] Jewish characters and from the letter Iod thrice repeated for reverence of the divine name. It contains the books of the old Testament as twenty-four: whose number answers also to the twenty-four letters of the Alphabet of the Greeks, among whom the Greek inscriptions of the books are these:

#	Hebrew	Greek	Book	Greek inscription
1	א	A	Genesis	Γένεσις, that is, Generation.

And let these things suffice to have been said of the supputations of the books of the old testament which are placed in the first order of the sacred canon. Now let us briefly say into how many and what kinds of partitions the same holy volumes are wont to be distributed, by the Greek as well as by the Latin and Hebrew authors.

ON THE VARIOUS PARTITIONS OF THE CANONICAL BOOKS of the old Testament which are placed in the first order of the sacred Canon

Three, as we have already shown, are the modes of reckoning the holy volumes of the old covenant among the sacred expositors: [1] of whom those who follow the third supputation employ, as I judge, no partition for distinguishing the divine books. But they who embrace the first supputation discern the twenty-two books already enumerated by four partitions differing among themselves. And they to whom the second kind of enumeration is more pleasing distribute the twenty-four books into three partitions, each differing from the other: of which the first has three classes of books, the second four classes, and the third likewise four. Their co-ordinations are here subjoined in order.

THE FIRST PARTITION of the two-and-twenty volumes of the old Testament, into three classes [2] — that is, into the books of the Law, of the prophets, and of the Psalms or Songs: which [partition] indeed (as Luke relates) our Lord Jesus Christ used after his resurrection, when, opening to the disciples the sense of the scriptures, he interpreted to them whatsoever things had been written of him in the Law, the Prophets, and the Psalms. Josephus also, in the first book against Apion the grammarian, followed the same partition.

The books of the Law, five: [3]

1. Genesis. 2. Exodus. 3. Leviticus. 4. Numbers. 5. Deuteronomion.

The books of the Prophets, thirteen: [4]

6. Joshua. 7. Judges & Ruth. 8. Samuel. 9. Melachim [Kings]. 10. Paralipomenon. 11. Esdras. 12. Esther. 13. Job. 14. Esaias. 15. Jeremias & the Threni. 16. Ezechiel. 17. Daniel. 18. The XII minor Prophets.

The books of the Psalms, or Hymns, or Songs, four: [5]

19. David. 20. Proverbs. 21. Ecclesiastes. 22. Canticle of Canticles.

THE SECOND PARTITION of the two-and-twenty Hebrew volumes, which Epiphanius, Bishop of Salamis, in the book entitled On the parts of the divine scripture, and John Damascene, in the 4th book On the orthodox faith, digested into four Quinaries [sets of five] — namely the Legal, the Hagiographic, the Poetic, and the Prophetic — and besides these into one Binary [set of two].

The first Quinary, of the Legal [books]:

1. Genesis. 2. Exodus. 3. Leviticus. 4. Numbers. 5. Deuteronomion.

The second Quinary, of the Hagiographa:

6. Joshua. 7. Judges & Ruth. 8. The first of Kingdoms with the second. 9. The third of Kingdoms with the fourth. 10. The two of Paralipomenon.

The third Quinary, of the Songs:

11. Job. 12. Psalter. 13. Proverbs. 14. Ecclesiastes. 15. Canticles.

The fourth Quinary, of the Prophets:

16. The twelve minor Prophets. 17. Esaias. 18. Hieremias. 19. Ezechiel. 20. Daniel.

The Binary:

21. Esdras. 22. Esther.

THE THIRD PARTITION of the two-and-twenty ancient books of the first order, distributed into three classes by Gregory the Theologian [Nazianzen]: that is, into the historical, the Poetic, and the Prophetic books.

The historical books, twelve:

1. Genesis. 2. Exodus. 3. Leviticus. 4. Numbers. [5 Deu- →]

[1] There are three ways in which the books of the Old Testament are numbered. [2] There are three classes of the volumes of the Old Testament. [3] The first class is of the books of the Law. [4] The second class contains the books of the Prophets. [5] The third class comprises the Psalms.

(the Third Partition, continued — the historical books:)

5. Deuteronomium. 6. Joshua. 7. Judges. 8. Ruth. 9. Kings first & second. 10. Kings third & fourth. 11. Paralipomenon. 12. Esdras.

The Poetic, or Song-books, five:

13. Job. 14. David. 15. Proverbs. 16. Ecclesiastes. 17. Canticles.

The Prophetic books, five:

18. The twelve minor Prophets. 19. Esaias. 20. Jeremias. 21. Ezechiel. 22. Daniel.

This series of the books Gregory the Theologian, in the book of his poems, briefly comprised in these Greek hexameters, with some pentameters:

Δέχνυσο τοῦτον ἐμεῖο τὸν ἔγκριτον, ὦ φίλ᾽, ἀριθμόν·
ἱστορικαὶ μὲν ἔασι βίβλοι δυοκαίδεκα πᾶσαι, τῆς ἀρχαιοτέρης Ἑβραϊκῆς σοφίης.
πρωτίστη Γένεσις, εἶτ᾽ Ἔξοδος, Λευιτικόν τε, ἔπειτ᾽ Ἀριθμοί, εἶτα Δεύτερος Νόμος.
ἔπειτ᾽ Ἰησοῦς, καὶ Κριταί, Ῥοὺθ ὀγδόη, ἡ δ᾽ ἐνάτη δεκάτη τε βίβλοι πράξεις Βασιλήων, καὶ Παραλειπόμεναι· ἔσχατον Ἔσδραν ἔχεις.
αἱ δὲ στιχηραὶ πέντε, ὧν πρῶτός γ᾽ Ἰώβ· ἔπειτα Δαυίδ· εἶτα τρεῖς Σολομώντειαι, Ἐκκλησιαστής, Ἆσμα καὶ Παροιμίαι.
καὶ πένθ᾽ ὁμοίως πνεύματος προφητικοῦ·
μίαν μέν εἰσιν ἐς γραφὴν οἱ δώδεκα· Ὡσηὲ κ᾽ Ἀμώς, καὶ Μιχαίας ὁ τρίτος, ἔπειτ᾽ Ἰωήλ, εἶτ᾽ Ἰωνᾶς, Ἀβδίας,

Ναούμ τε, Ἀββακούμ τε, καὶ Σοφονίας,

Ἀγγαῖος, εἶτα Ζαχαρίας, Μαλαχίας.

μία μὲν οἵδε. δευτέρα δὲ Ἡσαΐας, ἔπειθ᾽ ὁ κληθεὶς Ἰερεμίας ἐκ βρέφους, εἶτ᾽ Ἰεζεκιήλ, καὶ Δανιήλου χάρις.

ἀρχαίας μὲν ἔθηκα δύω καὶ εἴκοσι βίβλους, τοῖς τῶν Ἑβραίων γράμμασιν ἀντιθέτους.

Which we have rendered, after a fashion, thus [Sixtus's Latin verses, here Englished]:

> Receive the number and the names of the holy books: and first the historical, twice six in order. Of these the first is Genesis, then Exodus, and Levites [Leviticus], and Numbers, and the will of the law repeated once again [Deuteronomy]. These Jesus [Joshua], the Judges (Critae), and Ruth the Moabitess follow. Next the ninth and the tenth hold the illustrious deeds of the Kings; in the eleventh come the annals [Paralipomenon]; the last is Esdras. There are likewise five books of song: of these the first is Job; next to him is David the king; and the Three of Solomon — namely Ecclesiastes, and Proverbs, and the Song. After these, next, five volumes of the holy Prophets: of which twice six are held in one book — Oseas and Amos, Michas, and Joel and Jonas, Abdias and Naum, Abacuh and Sophonias, glad Aggeus, Zacharias, and Malachias: these hold the first book; Esaia holds the second; after these, Irmeias [Jeremiah], called from his mother's womb; Ezechiel, the strength of the Lord; and Daniel the last. These seven, and thrice five, volumes of the old covenant figure forth the two-and-twenty elements [letters] of the men of Jerusalem.

Nor let it seem strange to you, excellent reader, that in this partition no mention is made by Gregory of the book of Esther, [1] which the Hebrews receive into their canon. For Melito, bishop of Sardis, enumerating the canonical books in his epistle to Onesimus, also passes it by; and St. Athanasius, in the Synopsis of the divine scripture, expressly cuts it off from the canonical volumes [2] — because in those times the authority of this book was not yet firm among all the churches, which certain additions ■■■■ [a word inked out by the censor], inserted into the book (as we shall afterwards point out), had rendered suspect.

THE FOURTH PARTITION of the two-and-twenty Hebrew volumes, distributed by the ancient Jews into three classes — that is, into the Legal, the Prophetic, and the Hagiographa — which Jerome, in the preface of the book of Kings, and Isidore, in the sixth of the Etymologies, embrace.

The Legal books, five:

1. Genesis. 2. Exodus. 3. Leviticus. 4. Numbers. 5. Deuteronomion.

The Prophetic books, eight:

6. Joshua. 7. Judges & Ruth. 8. Samuel. 9. Melachim. 10. Esaias. 11. Jeremias with the Threni. 12. Ezechiel. 13. The twelve minor Prophets.

The books of the Hagiographa, nine:

14. Job. 15. Psalter. 16. Proverbs. 17. Ecclesiastes. 18. Canticles. 19. Daniel. 20. Paralipomenon, or chronicon. 21. Esdras & Nehemias. 22. Esther.

THE FIFTH PARTITION of the four-and-twenty books of the old Testament into three classes — namely the Legal, the Prophetic, and the Hagiographic — in use among the ancient Latins; of which Jerome makes mention in the preface of the book of Kings, and of Daniel.

The Legal books, five:

1. Genesis. 2. Exodus. 3. Leviticus. 4. Numbers. 5. Deuteronomion.

The Prophetic books, eight:

6. Joshua. 7. Judges. [8 Sa- →]

[1] Why Gregory Nazianzen makes no mention of the book of Esther. [2] Athanasius rejected the book of Esther.

(printed p. 6 [PDF p. 19], verso — the partitions conclude; the treatise on the several books begins. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

8. Samuel. 9. Melachim. 10. Esaias. 11. Jeremias. 12. Ezechiel. 13. The twelve minor Prophets.

The books of the Hagiographa, eleven:

14. Job. 15. Psalms. 16. Proverbs. 17. Ecclesiastes. 18. Canticles. 19. Daniel. 20. Paralipomenon. 21. The two of Esdras. 22. Esther. 23. Ruth. 24. Cinoth, or the lamentations.

THE SIXTH PARTITION, by which the more recent Jews divide the עשרים וארבע Hesrim ve Arba — that is, the twenty-four — books of the old Testament into four series: namely into תורה Thora, i.e. the Law; into נביאים ראשונים Neviim Risonim, i.e. the former Prophets; into נביאים אחרנים Neviim Acharonim, i.e. the latter Prophets; and into כתובים Chethuvim, that is, the Scriptures — or, as the Greeks say, ἁγιόγραφα, that is, Holy writings.

The books of the תורה Thora — that is, of the Law, which is also called חומש Chomesci, i.e. the Quinary, from the number of its volumes — five:

1. Genesis. 2. Exodus. 3. Leviticus. 4. Numbers. 5. Deuteronomion.

The books of the נביאים ראשונים Neviim Risonim, that is, of the former Prophets, four:

6. Joshua. 7. Judges. 8. Samuel. 9. Melachim.

The books of the נביאים אחרנים Neviim Acharonim, that is, of the latter Prophets, four:

10. Esaias. 11. Jeremias. 12. Ezechiel. 13. תרי עשר Thire Hesser, that is, the Twelve minor Prophets.

The books of the כתובים Chethuvim, that is, of the Scriptures, eleven:

14. Psalter. 15. Proverbs. 16. Job. 17. Daniel. 18. Ezra. 19. Paralipomenon. 20. Ruth. 21. Esther. 22. Ecclesiastes. 23. Canticle of Canticles. 24. Lamentations.

THE SEVENTH PARTITION of the four-and-twenty holy volumes of the old Testament, digested by the more recent Latins into four classes: namely into the legal, the Historical, the Paraenetic [hortatory], and the Prophetic.

The Legal books, five:

1. Genesis. 2. Exodus. 3. Leviticus. 4. Numbers. 5. Deuteronomion.

The Historical books, nine:

6. Joshua. 7. Judges. 8. Ruth. 9. Kings first, with the second. 10. Kings third, with the fourth. 11. The two of Paralipomenon. 12. Esdras. 13. Esther. 14. Job.

The Paraenetic books, three:

15. Proverbs. 16. Ecclesiastes. 17. Canticles.

The Prophetic books, seven:

18. David. 19. Esaias. 20. Jeremias. 21. The Threni. 22. Ezechiel. 23. Daniel. 24. The twelve minor Prophets.

ON THE ARGUMENTS, AUTHORS, AND TIMES of the books of the old Testament which are computed in the first order of the canon

Hitherto we have reviewed in general the diverse enumerations and the various partitions of the ancient books of the first order, which alone the Hebrews receive, and read written in Hebrew: now we shall explain one by one (particulatim) the authors of each, their arguments, and the times of the matters described in them.

PENTATEUCH

The book of the Law of the Lord, or the volume of the law of Moses (for by both names the sacred letters call it), is named by the Hebrews תורה Thora, that is, "Law," and by the Greeks πεντάτευχος, Pentateuchus, that is, the Fivefold volume. This Moses — the son of Amram, grandson of Caath, great-grandson of Levi the patriarch, the leader of the Hebrews and their lawgiver — composed. [1] Which he himself also testifies thus in the book of Exodus: "And Moses wrote all the discourses of the Lord, and taking up the volume of the covenant of the law, in the hearing of the people…" [2] And again in Deuteronomy he adds: "After Moses had written the words of this law, and had completed them, he commanded the Levites who carried the ark of the covenant of the Lord, saying: Take this book, and put it in the side of the ark of the covenant of the Lord your God." [3] But that which is added at the end of Deuteronomy concerning the death and burial of Moses, down to the close of the book [4], some believe Esdras to have adjoined. Moreover, by what plan Moses digested this whole work into parts, and gave it its titles, is not sufficiently established. [Hebraei →] [→ Hebraei] The Hebrews (as Philo the Jew in the book On the world, and Josephus in the first book against Apion, relate) divide the whole volume into five books, and inscribe them from the opening of those same books.

The first book, then, containing the succession of the human stock down to the death of Joseph — that is, the deeds of two thousand three hundred and eight years [1] — is called among them Berescith, that is, "In the beginning," because the book begins with these words. The second, containing the deeds of one hundred and forty-six years [2] — namely from the death of Joseph to the construction of the tabernacle in the desert — is called Veellecemoth, that is, "These are the names." The third, containing the history of one month [3] — that is, from the erection of the tabernacle in the desert to the numbering of those who were apt for war — is called Vaiikra, that is, "And he called." The fourth, containing the narration of 38 years, nine months, and twenty days [4] — that is, from the first day of the second month of the second year of the going-forth from Egypt, to the encampment in the plains of Moab upon the Jordan, where Moses afterward died — is called Vaedaber, that is, "And he spoke." The fifth, setting forth the deeds of the two last months of the life of Moses in the plains of Moab [5], is called Helle hadde varim, that is, "These are the words."

But the Greeks, though following the same partition, inscribe the books far otherwise. For the first among them is called Genesis, that is, "generation," because the beginning of the world and the generation of the age are contained in it. The second Exodus, that is, "exit," which narrates the exit of the Israelite people from Egypt. The third is inscribed Leviticus, because it comprehends the ministries of the Levites, the sacrifices, the laws, and the rites. The fourth Arithmi, that is, "Numbers," because in it those who came out of Egypt are numbered by tribes, and the number of the forty-two halting-places through the wilderness is reviewed. The fifth Deuteronomion, that is, "the second law," is so inscribed because in it a repetition of the law is made anew. Philo the Jew thinks that Moses was the author of these latter inscriptions [6], writing thus in the book On the world: "MOSES asserted the world to be begotten and incorruptible, in the sacred books; and they are five, of which he himself inscribed the first Genesis, which begins in this manner: In the beginning God made heaven and earth." And in the book On the migration of Abraham: "Rightly," says he, "did the sacred seer Moses entitle one entire book of the law Exodus, by a name agreeing with the oracles contained in it." Thus far he. To me, however, it seems more likely that not Moses, but the seventy interpreters — being Greeks — devised these new and Greek inscriptions of the books. [7]

Now Moses gathered together in these books the history from the beginning of the world down to the hundred-and-twentieth year of his own life — in which, his teeth not loosened nor his eyes grown dim, in his whole body he put off mortality — that is, down to the year after the founding of the world two thousand four hundred and ninety-two, and before the birth of Christ one thousand four hundred and seventy [8], according to the Hebrew supputation of the holy scriptures and of Philo the Jew. But the remaining eight verses, from that place, AND MOSES DIED, to the end of the whole volume, Joshua is believed to have supplied after the death of Moses [9]: although Josephus asserts that Moses, being presently to die, wrote of himself in the sacred volumes as dead [10], fearing lest, on account of his excellent virtues, the Jews should proclaim that he had been caught up [rapt] by God.

The Hebrews divide the whole Pentateuch into two-and-fifty distinctions, or titles [11]: that is, Genesis into eleven, Exodus into eleven, Leviticus into ten, Numbers into ten, Deuteronomion into ten. And these distinctions too they inscribe from their initial words, calling the first בראשית berescit, that is, "in the beginning"; the second נח Noach, or Noe; the third לך לך lec leca, that is, "going forth, go forth [get thee out]"; and so on with the others, down to the last. And all the Pesukim — that is, the verses — into which the Jews divide the whole Pentateuch, are five thousand eight hundred and thirty. [12]

The same Moses wrote, as Jerome testifies in the epistle to Cyprian [13] — besides these five books (which Philo reports to have been composed by their author in the Chaldaic tongue [14]) — also eleven Psalms [15]: that is, from the ninetieth Psalm, whose title is THE PRAYER of Moses the servant of GOD, to the hundredth Psalm, which is fore-titled IN Confession. He composed also, as the Rabbins of the Jews hand down, the book of Job [16] — although the vulgate edition of the Greeks, at the end of that same volume, asserts that Moses translated the history of Job out of the Syrian speech into the Hebrew tongue. [17] There are also other writings borne about under the name of Moses, of which something is to be said in the following book.

JOSHUA

The book of Joshua (which the Hebrews call יהושע Ieoscua, the Greeks Jesus [son of] Nave) took its name from Osee, the son of Nun, whom Moses, changing his name, called Josua [18] — a leader most illustrious in the glory of war as well as of peace; who, as is read in the last chapter of this book, wrote after the death of Moses all the words which the Lord spoke to him, in the volume of the law of the Lord [19], adjoining to it the history Of the passage of the sons of Israel through Jordan, Of the subversion of the impious kingdoms, Of the division of the land of promise, and the other memorable sayings and deeds from the death of Moses down to the seventeenth year of his captaincy: in which year — Josephus being witness — this man, renowned in arms and in religion, died, in the hundred-and-twentieth year of his age; that is, in the year from the founding of the world two thousand five hundred and ten, and before the coming of Christ one thousand four hundred and fifty-two. [20] The rest, which stand written from the death of Joshua to the end of this book, Esdras is by report said to have adjoined. [21] Theodoret, however, judges [22] that the whole book, too, was compiled long after the death of Joshua out of an ancient commentary whose title was THE BOOK OF THE JUST — being led by the authority of the words which stand in the tenth chapter of this volume, namely: "Are not these things" (no doubt, the deeds of Joshua) "written in the book of the Just?" This book contains, among the Jews, six thousand and forty-five verses. [23]

JUDGES, AND RUTH

The book of Judges (which by the Jews is called שופטים Sciophtim, by the Greeks κριταί) is so named [24] because in it are contained the deeds of the judges and princes of Israel who were set over the people in the holy land after Joshua, down to the beginning of the kingdom of the Hebrews, in which kings reigned. And it is said that Samuel gathered this book together [25], [eique →]

[→ eique] and to have adjoined to it the history of Ruth the Moabitess. There are those who think Ezechias, and those who think Esdras, the authors of both volumes. [1] Now these two books contain the successions of three hundred and seventeen years [2] — namely from the death of Joshua to the first year of the principate of Heli, who began to judge Israel in the year from the founding of the world two thousand eight hundred and ten, that is, before Christ one thousand one hundred and fifty-two. The Jews divide the volume of Judges into six hundred verses, but the book of Ruth into eighty-five. [3]

KINGS FIRST, AND SECOND

The book of Samuel (which the Hebrews call שמואל Scemuel, and the Greeks and Latins the first and second of Kings) is believed to have been composed partly by Samuel the prophet, partly by the prophets Nathan and Gad. [4] For Samuel gathered the deeds of Heli, of Saul, of David, and of himself, which are related in the first of Kings down to his own death — that is, down to the twenty-fifth chapter. But Nathan and Gad the prophets wrote the books of Kings from the death of Samuel to the end of the second book: which the first book of Paralipomenon seems to indicate plainly enough, at whose close these words are read: "The deeds of David, the first and the last, are written in the book of Samuel the seer, and in the book of Nathan the prophet, and in the volume of Gad." [5] And although the latter part of this first volume, from the twenty-fifth chapter to the end of the second book of Kings, comprehends the history of Saul and of David, the whole is nevertheless referred to Samuel, and is inscribed from his name — because he himself established Saul, the first king, in the kingdom [6], and chose David for the king to be, and anointed him. Isidore, bishop of Seville, however, is of opinion that king David wrote [the history] down to the beginning of the third book — that is, down to the year from the founding of the world two thousand nine hundred and thirty, and to the year before the birth of Christ one thousand and thirty-two. The first book of Kings has among the Hebrews seven hundred ninety-seven verses; the second, six hundred seventy-nine: and each embraces the history of almost one hundred and twenty years. [7]

KINGS THIRD, AND FOURTH

The third and fourth book of Kings (which the Hebrews name מלכים Melachim, because in these the deeds of the Kings of Juda and of Israel are set forth in order) — by whom it was written is not sufficiently established. [8] Some hand down that Esdras, others — among whom Procopius of Gaza, and Rabbi Moses Kimchi, and Isidore — that Jeremias collected this work into one volume. [9] And this seems to me the nearer to truth, because the last chapter of the book of Kings agrees with the last chapter of the book of Jeremias in style, in words, and in narration. It appears that this volume was collected, by way of compendium, partly out of the books of the Days of the Kings of Juda and Israel, partly out of the writings of the prophets Nathan, Ahias the Silonite, Addo the Seer, and Semeias, Hozai, Jehu, and Esaias, which are very often cited in the third and fourth book of Kings. Now the present work contains the history of five hundred and thirty-seven years [10] — that is, from the last old age of David down to the destruction of the city of Jerusalem, which befell in the year after the world was founded three thousand three hundred forty-seven, and before Christ six hundred and fifteen. [11] The third book of Kings has among the Hebrews eight hundred and nine verses; the fourth, seven hundred and twelve. [12]

THE TWO BOOKS OF PARALIPOMENON

These two books (which the Hebrews call דברי הימים Diure haiamim, that is, "Words of the days," or Annals, or Chronicles) the Greeks call Παραλειπομένων, Paralipomenon, that is, "of things passed over" [13]: because they explain, briefly and summarily, those things which, either in the Pentateuch, or in the books of Joshua, of Judges, and of Kings, were either omitted or not fully described. These books have no certain author [14]; yet Rabbi Salomon and Rabbi Moses Kimchi write, from the judgment of the elders, that Esdras was the author of both [15], and that he compiled in them an epitome and chronicle of all the preceding books — namely, from the beginning of the divine scripture to the end of the fourth of Kings. Among the Hebrews the present history is contained in but a single book; which, by the Greeks as well as by the Latins, was divided on account of the greatness of the volume into two books [16] — as some have done even with the dialogue Brutus of Cicero, distinguishing it into three parts. These two books, then, contain the sum of three thousand three hundred and forty-seven years. [17]

THE TWO BOOKS OF ESDRAS

Esdras, or עזרא Ezra (whom the first book of Paralipomenon calls [the son of] Josedech the priest, and whom the Hebrews think to be Malachias, the last of the prophets) [18], son of Saraias, the son of Azarias, twelfth [in descent] from Aaron the high priest, a scribe of the law of the Lord, ingenious and swift, published the book fore-titled with his own name — [written] indeed in Hebrew letters, and those first devised by himself [19], but digested in the Chaldaic speech: in which he described the return of the Israelite people out of the Babylonian captivity into Judaea, and the restoration of the city of Jerusalem, and the building-up of the new temple. But the other book, which is inscribed the Second of Esdras, and treats through the same history, Nehemias wrote [20] — the son of Helchias, a priest, and, in the captivity, cupbearer of king Artaxerxes; whence also the preface of his book is: The words of Nehemias, the son of Helchias; and he, in almost all the chapters of his book, speaks of himself in the first person. Now this book is allotted the name of Esdras for two causes: first, because it contains the things which were done jointly by Esdras and Nehemias; next, because the two books, among the Hebrews as among the Greeks, are joined together into one volume, [though] among the Latins divided into two. Yet the Greek fathers dissent from us in this part: for the book which we inscribe the third of Esdras, and cast back among the Apocryphal writings, they place in the sacred canon [21], and set it first in the order of the books of Esdras — deciding that the things which are narrated in it were done before those which are contained in the books of Esdras and Nehemias; and these [latter], which among us are the first and the second, they comprehend both under the second volume of Esdras. Wherefore among them the beginning of the first of Esdras runs thus: Καὶ ἢ- [-γαγεν →]

[1] Some make Ezechias, and some Esdras, the author of the books of Judges and Ruth. [2] The books of Judges and Ruth contain the deeds of 317 years. [3] The book of Judges has 600 verses; Ruth 85. [4] The book of Samuel was written partly by Samuel and partly by Nathan and Gad. [5] 1 Par 29:29 [6] Saul the first king of the Hebrews was established by Samuel. [7] The first book of Kings has 797 verses; the second 679; and each covers the history of about 120 years. [8] It is not established who wrote the 3rd and 4th books of Kings. [9] Jeremias is thought to have written both books. [10] The 3rd and 4th books of Kings comprise the history of 537 years. [11] When the destruction of the city of Jerusalem happened. [12] The 3rd book of Kings has 809 verses, and the 4th 712. [13] The reason for the title of the books of Paralipomenon. [14] No certain author of the books of Paralipomenon. [15] In the judgement of some, Esdras wrote both books. [16] The Hebrews have Paralipomenon in a single book, which the Greeks and Latins divided into two. [17] The books of Paralipomenon contain the deeds of 3347 years. [18] The Hebrews think the Esdras who wrote the first book of Esdras was Malachias the prophet. [19] Esdras devised the letters which the Hebrews now use. [20] Nehemias wrote the second book of Esdras. [21] The Greeks think the third book of Esdras canonical.

[→ Καὶ ἤγαγεν] Ἰωσίας τὸ πάσχα ἐν Ἰερουσαλήμ — that is, And Josias kept the pasch in Jerusalem; and it is divided into one hundred and nine chapters. But the second begins thus: Καὶ ἐν τῷ πρώτῳ ἔτει Κύρου βασιλέως Περσῶν — that is, And in the first year of Cyrus, king of the Persians; and it is cut into eighty chapters. There are borne about also other volumes under the name of Esdras, which you will find in the second book of this work. Esdras flourished together with Nehemias, restoring the city and the temple, in the year from the founding of the world three thousand four hundred and twenty-one [1] — which was the third of the Jewish liberation, and before Christ the five hundred forty-first. And he died in extreme old age, after he had most faithfully restored from memory — and not without the divine power of the Godhead — almost all the divine scriptures [2], burned by the Chaldaeans in the destruction of Jerusalem, as they were before; new letters, readier for writing, having been devised — lest the Jews should be mingled with the Samaritans, who had come from the gentile nations into Judaea; for before, down to that very time, they had had other letters, delivered namely by Moses, in common with the Samaritans [3]; and the letters which the Jews now use differ only in figure [shape] from the Samaritan, or Mosaic.

ESTHER

The book אסתר Ester — although according to the order of the Hebrew canon and of Jerome's partition it should be reviewed in this place — nevertheless, because Melito bishop of Sardis, St. Athanasius, and Gregory the Theologian, on account of certain ■■■■ [word inked out by the censor] additaments (as we have already advised above) separated it by name from the other Testamentary writings, we too shall describe it in the following Section, in the very first place among the writings pertaining to the second order of the canon. [4]

JOB

Of the book איוב Iiob, some judge the author to be Job himself [5], the son of Zareth, of the sons of Esau, fifth from Abraham, fourth from Esau; who, after the happy issue of his afflictions, by his own hand fulfilled [the desire of] writing down his victories — the very thing he had chiefly wished for in his calamity, saying: "Who will grant me that my discourses may be engraved in a book — or with an iron stylus, and a plate of lead, and a chisel — that they may endure forever, be hewn out in the rock?" [6] And in another place: "Who will grant me that the almighty may hear my desire, and that he who judges would himself write a book, that I may carry it on my shoulder, and put it round me as a crown; and proclaim it at my every step, and offer it as to a prince?" [7] There are those who think it was written either by the friends of Job, or by some one of the prophets. Origen — with whom the Rabbins of the Jews also agree — says that Moses first translated this holy history [8], composed either by Job or by his friends, out of the Syrian eloquence into the Hebrew speech, for the consolation of the Hebrews who, captives in Egypt, were oppressed by Pharao with unworthy servitude: that reading the vehement and terrible pains of the blessed man they might console one another; and might bear with patience and giving of thanks the evils that had encompassed them; and that, hearing of the most excellent recompense which God bestowed upon blessed Job after his endurance, they too might hope for deliverance and await the benefits of the blessed reward of their labors.

This book was written, as Jerome testifies, in the Hebrew tongue, with Arabic and Syriac locutions at times intermingled [9]; and from the beginning of the volume to the start of the third chapter it proceeds, among the Hebrews, in loose [prose] oration; but from the beginning of the third chapter to the beginning of the forty-second chapter it glides along in Hexameter verses; from which place to the end the book concludes in prose. Rabbi Levi Ben Gerson, in his commentaries upon Job, writes that there were formerly those who rejected the eleven later chapters of this book — that is, from the thirty-second to the last — as adventitious [10]; for the reason that at the end of the thirty-first chapter, in the Hebrew codices, there is found written תמו דברי איוב thammu diure Iob, that is, "The words of Job are ended." [11] Their opinion the same Rabbi Levi disapproves, saying that that versicle is to be referred, not simply to the end of all the discourses of Job, but only to the end of the disputations which Job had had with his three friends, Elipha, Baldad, and Sophar: after which disputations there follow at once the colloquies of the same Job with Eliu, the fourth of the friends. Now Job wrote the present book about the year of the founded world two thousand three hundred [12], comprising in it all the battles, victories, and triumphs of his spiritual warfare in most learned and most eloquent speech. And he suffered, as Athanasius witnesses, when he was seventy years old — so that all his years were two hundred and forty [13]; for after the plagues received he lived yet a hundred and seventy years: albeit the Hebrew verity testifies that from his recovered health he lived but a hundred and forty years. The Greeks divide the volume into thirty-two chapters; the Latins into forty-two. And there are those who among the Greeks distribute the same into twenty colloquies, in this order:

Of GOD to the Devil, one.	Of JOB to his friends, nine.
Of ELIPHAZ to Job, three.	Of SOPHAR to Job, two.
Of BALDAD to Job, three.	Of ELIU to Job, one.
Of GOD to Job, one.

THE PSALTER

Concerning the author of the volume of the psalms (which in Hebrew is called ספר תהלים Sepher theillim, that is, the Book of Hymns; in Greek, Ψαλτήριον) there is a twofold opinion. [14] Chrysostom and Augustine judge that David, king and prophet, was the author of all the psalms [15] [16]; of which he himself sang some with his own mouth, but of the rest of the psalms put forth only the arguments, and delivered them to the singers ordained by himself in the temple of God: who, taking the arguments received, wrote them out in songs, and fitted them to various chants and musical instruments, and inscribed them with their own names. This opinion appears to be drawn from the books of Kings and of Paralipomenon [17], in which David is read to have been the distinguished psalmist of Israel, who with his own mouth sang to the lord certain psalms — as psalm 17, when the lord had delivered him out of the hand of Saul and of all his enemies, and psalm 104, when the ark of the lord was being brought back. And the same [David] appointed in the temple four thousand psalmists, singing to the lord upon instruments; among whom the chief were three who, beside him, should sing canticles in the temple on harps, psalteries, and cymbals — namely Eman, Idithun, and Asaph; who, Esdras testifies, praised God "by the hands of David the king," that is, by psalms written by the hand of king David [18]. But Jerome [mus →]

[→ Hierony-]mus, in the epistles to Sophronius and to Cyprian [1], following the opinion of Athanasius, determines that they err who judge all the psalms to be David's [2], and not [the psalms] of those with whose names they are inscribed — namely of Asaph, of Idithun, of the sons of Corhe, of Eman the Ezrahite, of Moses, and of Solomon, and of the rest, whom Esdras comprehends in the first volume of Paralipomenon. [3] According to this opinion, then, there will be ten authors of this volume, whose names are set in the titles of the psalms: namely David, Salomon, Moses, Asaph, Ethan the Ezrahite, Eman the Ezrahite, Idithun, and the three sons of Corhe. Of whom:

DAVID, the son of Isai the Bethlehemite, king of Jerusalem, and prophet, put forth seventy-three psalms, fore-noted with his name in the Hebrew exemplars, namely:

> III. IIII. V. VI. VII. VIII. IX. XI. XII. XIII. XIIII. XV. XVI. XVII. XVIII. XIX. XX. XXI. XXII. XXIII. XXIIII. XXV. XXVI. XXVII. XXVIII. XXIX. XXX. XXXI. XXXII [printed "XXII," a second time — a misprint]. XXXIIII. XXXV. XXXVI. XXXVII. XXXVIII. XL. XLI. LI. LII. LIII. LIIII. LV. LVI. LVII. LVIII. LIX. LX. LXI. LXII. LXIII. LXIIII. LXV. LXVIII. LXIX. LXX. LXXXVI. CI. CIII. CVIII. CIX. CX. CXXII. CXXIIII. CXXXI. CXXXII. CXXXIII. CXXXVIII. CXXXIX. CXL. CXLI. CXLII. CXLIII. CXLIIII. CXLV.

He founded also, besides these, another nine-and-thirty psalms anepigraphoi — that is, which are placed in the psalter without anyone's name — namely:

> I. II. X. XXXIII. XLIII. LXVI. LXVII. LXXI. CII. CIIII. CV. CVI. CVII. CXI. CXII. CXIII. CXIIII. CXV. CXVI. CXVII. CXVIII. CXIX. CXX. CXXI. CXXIII. CXXV. CXXVI. CXXVII. CXXVIII. CXXIX. CXXX. CXXXIII. CXXXV. CXXXVII. CXLVI. CXLVII. CXLVIII. CXLIX. CL.

Of which seven are cited under the name of David in the divine scriptures, namely:

- The second psalm, in the book of Acts, chap. XIII.
- The seventeenth psalm, in the second of Kings, chap. XXII.
- The hundredth psalm, in the first of Paralipomenon, chap. XVI.
- The hundred-and-fifth psalm.
- The hundred-and-sixth psalm.
- The hundred-and-seventeenth psalm.
- The hundred-and-thirty-fifth psalm — of which [last four] mention is made in the first volume of Esdras.

SALOMON, the son of king David, wrote one psalm [4], namely the seventy-second, which begins, "O GOD, give thy judgment to the King" — which some think was put forth by David on behalf of Solomon his son. Athanasius in the Synopsis, besides this psalm, attributes also two others to Solomon: that is, the sixty-sixth, whose beginning is, "May GOD have mercy on us, and bless us"; and the hundred-and-twenty-seventh, which begins, "UNLESS the lord build the house." Origen, in the third book Peri Archon [περὶ Ἀρχῶν, On First Principles], relates that there were not wanting those who said that the psalms which are inscribed THE CANTICLES OF THE STEPS [Gradual psalms] were composed by Solomon. Among the Hebrews, however, the seventy-second psalm alone is inscribed to Solomon.

MOSES, the man of God (whom Aben Ezra the Jew thinks to have been one of the singers of David; but Jerome, in the explanation of the ninetieth psalm, to Cyprian, asserts that he is Moses the writer of the divine law and leader of the Hebrews), wrote eleven psalms [5] — that is, from psalm XC, whose title is THE PRAYER OF MOSES THE MAN OF GOD, and whose beginning is, "LORD, thou hast been made our refuge," up to the hundredth, which is inscribed IN CONFESSION, and begins, "SHOUT with joy to God, all the earth." And since what is read in psalm XCVIII concerning Samuel the prophet — who was born many ages after Moses — seems to oppose his [Jerome's] opinion, he says that the name of Samuel, on account of the excellence of his merit, was foreseen by Moses at the instinct of the prophetic spirit, and noted down in the letters [text].

ASAPH, the son of Barachias, chief of the singers who sounded upon cymbals of brass, and praised the lord, and ministered in the sight of the ark, composed twelve psalms [6], namely:

L. LXXIII. LXXIIII. LXXV. LXXVI. LXXVII. LXXVIII. LXXIX. LXXX. LXXXI. LXXXII. LXXXIII.

EMAN the Ezrahite — or, as the Greeks read, Heman the Israelite — a singer, son of Joel of the sons of Caath, most skilled with cymbals and trumpet, and in erudition and wisdom in a certain manner the equal of Ethan himself, composed one psalm, namely the eighty-eighth, whose beginning is, "O LORD, the God of my salvation." And because he gave it to the sons of Corhe to be sung, he inscribed it as well with his own name as with theirs. Philo, however, in the book On the times, hands down [tradit →] [→ tradit] that this psalm was put forth long afterward, in the captivity of Babylon, and chanted assiduously through the seven years in which Joakim, king of the Jews, was unjustly oppressed in the prisons of Babylon.

ETHAN the Ezrahite, son of Chusi, of the sons of Merari, sounding upon cymbals of brass, endowed with such wisdom that — as the third book of Kings testifies — no mortal ever, save Solomon alone, was wiser than he [1] [2], put forth one psalm [3], namely LXXXIX, whose title is THE ERUDITION [Maschil] OF ETHAN, and its beginning, "The MERCIES of the lord I will sing forever." Which psalm the same Philo, in the book cited a little before, writes was put forth many years later, for an act of thanksgiving, when Evilmerodach, king of the Assyrians, brought Joakim the king out of prison and began to hold him in honor at his court. There are those who affirm that Eman and Ethan — to whom Solomon is preferred in the third volume of Kings — neither put forth psalms nor were singers of psalms; but that the authors and psalmists both of this and of the foregoing psalm were that Eman and Ethan whom the first of the Annals [1 Paralipomenon], in the sixth chapter, reviews among the singers of the family of Levi. Let others more diligent than I sift this opinion.

The THREE SONS of Korach, or Chorhe, whose names are reviewed in the first of Paralipomenon — namely Asir, Elkana, and Abiasaph — these three with common labor composed eleven psalms [4], that is:

XLII. XLIIII. XLV. XLVI. XLVII. XLVIII. XLIX. LXXXIIII. LXXXV. LXXXVII. LXXXVIII.

IDITHUM, a most eminent singer, who upon the harp prophesied over those who confessed and praised the lord, set to melody one psalm [5], which is the thirty-ninth in number, and begins, "I SAID, I will keep my ways."

AND these are the authors of the whole psalter, inscribed at the heads of the psalms according to the Hebrew verity: besides whom certain others also are set at the beginnings of the psalms in the Greek codices, as for instance:

EZECHIEL AND JEREMIAS, to whom is ascribed the sixty-fifth psalm, "A hymn, O God, becometh thee in Syon."

The SONS OF JONADAB, with whose name is inscribed the seventy-first psalm, "IN thee, O lord, have I hoped; let me not be confounded forever."

JEREMIAS the prophet, to whom is ascribed psalm CXXXVII, "UPON the rivers of Babylon."

AGGAEUS AND ZACHARIAS, the prophets, with whose names are inscribed the psalms written below, namely:

CXXXVIII.	I WILL CONFESS to thee, O lord.
CXXXIIII [CXXXIX].	LORD, thou hast proved me.
CXLVI.	PRAISE the lord, O my soul.
CXLVIII [CXLVII].	PRAISE the lord, O Jerusalem.
CXLIX [CXLVIII].	PRAISE ye the lord from the heavens.

Thus far of the authors of the book of Hymns — which Jerome affirms to consist, among the Hebrews, of various kinds of verse [6], not otherwise than the poems of Pindar among the Greeks and of Horace among the Latins. Rabbi David Kimchi teaches that this is the custom of the Hebrew poets: that the songs in which certain illustrious arguments are treated they dispose according to the series of the Hebrew alphabet, that they may be more easily imprinted on the memory, and, once imprinted, may cleave the more tenaciously. And in this order, as Cardinal Cajetan also shows, seven of the more excellent psalms of this volume were composed [7], namely:

XXV.	whose beginning is, TO THEE, O lord, have I lifted up.
XXXIIII.	which begins, I WILL BLESS the lord.
XXXVII.	BE NOT emulous — which proceeds by an interpolated alphabet.
CXI.	I WILL CONFESS to thee, O lord.
CXII.	BLESSED is the man that feareth the lord.
CXLV.	I WILL EXALT thee, O God — which are contained in a simple alphabet.
CXVIII.	BLESSED are the immaculate in the way — which consists of eightfold alphabets, with eight verses always beginning from the same letter.

Jerome, however, in the epistle to Paula Urbica [8], writes that only five psalms are found disposed alphabetically [9], and that they are deceived who reckon more. Epiphanius, in the book On weights and measures, writes that the volume of the psalms is distinguished among the Jews into five small books, or sections: of which the first runs from the first [psalm] to the fortieth; the second from the forty-first to the seventy-first; the third from the seventy-second to the 88th; the fourth from the eighty-ninth to the hundred-and-fifth; the fifth from the hundred-and-sixth to the last. And at the end of all of these is set a double Amen, which the LXX rendered Fiat, fiat [So be it, so be it]. Chrysostom judges that Esdras, after the Babylonian captivity, gathered these psalms, dispersed here and there, into this volume which we now have. [10] But Athanasius in his Synopsis writes that this was done before the captivity by the friends of king Ezechias — asserting that out of the psalms of David, which he affirms to have been three thousand, they collected only a hundred and fifty [11], the rest being hidden away, lest they should come into the hands of all. All the aforesaid ten psalmographers flourished at nearly the same times [12] — namely about the year of the founded world 2940 [printed bis 1940], but before Christ 1400 [so printed; the figures do not agree]. There are borne about also other writings under the name of David, which are reviewed in the following volume.

THE THREE BOOKS OF SOLOMON

SALOMON — or שלמה Scelomo, who in the sacred letters is called also ידידיה Iedidia, and קהלת Koeleth — son of king David, and king of Jerusalem [13]; whose like God himself testified never to have been before, nor to have been after, nor to be hereafter: he composed, according to the number of his names, three books. [14] Of which the first the Hebrews call משלי Misle, the Greeks Παροιμίαι, the Latins Proverbia [Proverbs]; because in it adages, similitudes, and certain common sentences concerning the various events of human affairs [eventi- →]

[1] Ethan's wisdom was great. [2] 3 Reg 4:31 [3] Ethan composed one psalm. [4] The sons of Korah composed several psalms. [5] Idithun composed one psalm. [6] Among the Hebrews the psalms consist of various kinds of verse. [7] Seven psalms are arranged according to the order of the alphabet. [8] Jerome, Epistle 155 [9] Jerome thinks only 5 psalms are arranged alphabetically. [10] Chrysostom thinks Esdras collected the psalms into one volume; but Athanasius attributes this to Ezechias. [11] Out of three thousand psalms only 150 survive. [12] At what time the psalmographers flourished. [13] 3 Kings 3:1 [14] Solomon wrote three books.

[→ eventi-]bus are referred [gathered], necessary for the ordering of life. Its latter part — namely from the twenty-fifth chapter to the end — Sebna and the other scribes of Ezechias, king of Juda, collected out of other volumes. [1] Now the book of Proverbs contains, as the author of the Hebrew Questions upon the third book of Kings writes, nine hundred and fifteen verses; in which three thousand parables are comprehended [2] — those, no doubt, of which it is written in the third volume of Kings: "And Salomon spoke three thousand parables." [3]

The SECOND book Salomon himself inscribed קהלת Coheleth; the Greeks, Ἐκκλησιαστής, Ecclesiastes; we may call it the Preacher (Concionator) [4]: because his discourse, as Jerome says [5], is directed not to one man in particular, as in the Proverbs, but to all men generally — teaching that all things which are in the world are perishable and brief, and for this cause to be desired not at all. But the Hebrews, judging a little otherwise, will have both Salomon himself and this book to be called קהלת Koeleth on account of the admirable wisdom which was copiously gathered together in Salomon and in this volume.

The THIRD is called by the Hebrews שיר השירים Scir hascirim, by the Greeks Ἆισμα ᾀσμάτων, by us the Canticle of Canticles [6]: because it is more excellent and more illustrious than the other canticles, whether of Salomon or of other authors — containing, under the metaphor of the bridegroom and the bride, wondrous mysteries, and the ineffable philanthropy [loving-kindness] of God toward the soul of man. This book — together with the exordium of the book of Genesis, and the beginning and end of Ezechiel — the ancient hebrews, on account of its hidden senses, attended with such veneration that they would not have it read except after the thirtieth year of age. [7] [8] And among Christians very many expositors of no contemptible name, led by the same reverence, have judged that the explanation of this little book is not to be touched in youth, but to be reserved as a solace of Christian old age and a viaticum of the holy passage — after the example of those holy men Bernard of Clairvaux, Gilbert of Hoyland, Thomas Aquinas, and John Gerson, to whom it befell happily to put off mortality in the meditation and exposition of this work. [9] There are those who say that the sentences of these three books were collected by Esaias the prophet [10] out of the various books of Canticles and of Proverbs which the divine scripture records to have been composed by Salomon; and that they were preserved by the instinct of the holy spirit, as being more useful than the rest, and compacted into these three little books. These Isidore, from Josephus and Jerome, affirms to have been written by Salomon in hexameter and pentameter verses [11], and that the last part of the book of Proverbs is closed with an alphabet [acrostic], which is reckoned in Iambic trimeter. It is agreed that Salomon, besides these books, wrote other volumes also, among which the book of Wisdom is counted; but of these we shall speak in the following volume. Salomon died in the year from the founding of the world two thousand nine hundred and seventy, in the ninety-second year before the nativity of Christ [so printed; read: the nine hundred ninety-second].

ESAIAS

IESCAEIAHU ישעיהו — or, as we say, Isaias, or Esaias, or Jesaias, which is interpreted the Salvation of the lord — prophet, son of Amoz, a citizen of Jerusalem, noble in race, of the tribe of Juda, wrote the book of his prophecies: which, the holy spirit enlightening him, he pronounced under four kings of Juda succeeding one another [12] — namely Ozias, Joatham, Achaz, and Ezechias — against Judaea and Jerusalem, and against the nations, chiefly the Babylonian, Philistine, Damascene, Egyptian, Idumaean, and Tyrian. And in this book, as Jerome says, whatever of Physics, of Ethics, of Logic — whatever of the mysteries of the holy scriptures the human tongue and the sense of mortals can receive — he embraced, with a grace of speech and an elegance of polished diction supreme above the other prophets. [13] The narration of the whole book is prose, distinguished by cola and commata and finished in all its rhythms, except three canticles — namely of the Vineyard, of the city of Syon, and of king Ezechias — which, together with the prayer of Esaias, Isidore testifies to march in hexameter and pentameter verses. Now Esaias brought forth, concerning the advent of Christ our savior, his incarnation, miracles, preaching, life, passion, death, resurrection, and glory, testimonies so many, so magnificent, and so open, that he seems not to prophesy of his events to come, but rather to write a history of his deeds already past — and to fill the part of an evangelist rather than of a prophet. [14] And hence, I judge, our lord JESUS Christ chose for himself this one among all the prophets, to read and expound publicly first in the synagogue of his own country. [15] Esaias dies under the most impious king Manasses, cut asunder into two parts by his command [16], because he had called the nobles of the royal house princes of the Sodomites, and had said that he had seen God sitting upon a lofty throne. And he was buried under the oak of Rogel, in the tribe of Benjamin, about the year from the founding of the world three thousand two hundred and forty, and before the birth of Christ the seven hundred twenty-eighth. He is said to have written besides these things others also, which we shall note in the book next following.

JEREMIAS

IRMEIAHU ירמיהו — or, as we say, Jeremias, that is, the Exalted — prophet and priest, from Anathoth, a hamlet three miles from Jerusalem, son of Helchias the high priest, who in the eighth year of Josias, king of Juda, found in the house of the lord the book of the divine law [17], lost for many years through the negligence of the preceding kings: he began, when still quite a youth, to prophesy, and to commit his vaticinations to letters — in a speech indeed unpolished, and well-nigh rustic [18], but sublime in the majesty of its senses. Now he wrote — Baruch, the son of Neerias, taking it down from his mouth [19] — the book of his prophecies and visions, which he received from heaven, concerning the disaster of the Jews and the future church of Christ, through two-and-forty years: that is, from the thirteenth year of king Josias down to the destruction of the city and the removal of the remnants of Juda into Egypt. To which volume Baruch adjoined a last chapter, borrowed in almost the same words from the end of the fourth book of Kings, so that, by the commemoration of the disaster of Jerusalem which is related in that chapter, he might pave a way for readers to the next following book — איכה Eca, or קינות Kinoth, that is, the book of Lamentations: in which Jeremias the prophet bewailed with mournful song the lamentable overthrow of the city and the captivity of the people, [the songs] being digested [digestis →]

[→ digestis] [the songs] being digested into Alphabetic order by verses, in such a manner that the first should begin from Aleph, the second from Beth, the third from Ghimel, and so on to the end — imitating in this David and Salomon, of whom the latter composed the last part of the Proverbs, the former seven psalms, in metrical alphabets. Now in these lamentations there are four alphabets: of which the two first, as Jerome testifies, are written in a verse not very unlike the Sapphic meter, since a comma [closing colon] of heroic verse concludes three versicles which are joined to one another and begin from a single letter; but the third alphabet is woven in trimeter, and the triple verses begin from three letters each — but the same [letter thrice]; the fourth alphabet is like the first and the second. Rabbi Salomon judges this book of Lamentations to be that which — as you have it in Jeremias, chapter thirty-six — the profane king Joachim, when its beginning had been read, cast into the fire, and in hatred of the prophecy burned up; and that Jeremias, summoning Baruch the scribe, at God's command dictated it anew, and added the fourth alphabet with its threefold series of letters, whereas in the earlier exemplar he had set down only three simple alphabets. Jeremias lived under the kings Josias, Joachim, and Sedechias, down to the removal of the remnants of Juda into Egypt — whither he too was carried off by Joanan, son of Caree; and he perished in Taphnes [Thaaphnes], overwhelmed with stones by his own people [1], and was buried in that same place, about the year from the founding of the world three thousand three hundred and fifty: although Victorinus the martyr and very many other most ancient fathers opine otherwise, who taught that he is still alive [2], and is to be slain, together with Elias, by Antichrist in the last age of the world. There are borne about also certain other writings under his name, of which we shall speak in the following book.

EZECHIEL

IECHEZKEL יחזקאל, or Ezechiel — which is interpreted the strength or the dominion of the lord — prophet and priest, son of Buzi a priest, and himself a priest, of the land of Sarera, wrote a prophetic book of the visions and oracles revealed to him by God within the space of twenty years — that is, from the fifth year of the deportation of king Jechonias, with whom he himself was led away into Chaldaea (and he began to prophesy by the river Chobar), down to the twenty-fifth year of the same deportation, which was the first captivity of Juda, when the wrath of God dropped down upon Jerusalem. His style is neither eloquent enough, nor altogether rustic, but tempered out of both. Moreover, the mysteries of his narration are wrapped in such obscurities that among the Hebrew Rabbins it has been provided by tradition that no one should ever dare to explicate the first chapter of the book, nor the end — that is, the eight later chapters — unless he have completed the 30th year of his age. [3] Jerome — who first of all expositors dared to compose commentaries on the whole of Ezechiel [4] — expressed the most abstruse difficulty of this book by the most apt similitude of the Cretan labyrinth [5], in these verses of Virgil:

> Here is the toil, that house, and the inextricable maze; as once in lofty Crete, the labyrinth, they say, held a path woven between blind walls, and a doubtful deceit of a thousand ways, whereby the unretraced and irretraceable wandering might baffle the signs of those who followed.
> May the Spirit himself unloose the wiles and windings of that house; and, I pray, its blind traces — thou being our guide, O Christ!

Ezechiel dies in Chaldaea, cut down by the leader of his own nation [6], whom he had rebuked for the worship of idols; and he was buried in the land of the Spyrians, in the field of Maur, in the tomb of Sem and Arphaxad, the forefathers of Abraham, about the year from the founding of the world three thousand three hundred and sixty. Josephus, in the tenth of the Antiquities, relates that Ezechiel, besides this book, composed also another volume of vaticinations; concerning which, see in the book that follows next after this one.

DANIEL

DANIEL דניאל, that is, Judged by the lord, a prophet of the tribe of Juda, born of the royal nobles in upper Bethebero, not far from Jerusalem — while he was yet a boy, was led away to Babylon with Joakim, king of Juda, in the third year of his reign; and he was made an eunuch of the king of the Chaldaeans, that in him might be fulfilled the vaticination of Esaias, which he uttered over king Ezechias, saying: "Of thy sons, who shall be born of thee, they shall take away, and they shall make eunuchs in the house of the king." [7] He put forth the book of his prophecy, in which he comprehended illustrious and most certain vaticinations concerning all the kingdoms of the whole world, and especially concerning the glorious and eternal kingdom of Christ [8]; and he compressed into the same volume all the histories of all nations which were written after his times. For the exact understanding of which, Jerome admonishes that a manifold history of the Chaldaeans, Greeks, and Latins is necessary [9] — namely of Sutorius [Callinicus], Diodorus, Hieronymus [of Cardia], Polybius, Posidonius, Claudius Theon, Andronicus, and Josephus, and of those whom Josephus adduces; but chiefly of Titus Livius, Trogus Pompeius, and Justin, who narrate the whole history of Daniel's last vision, and describe, from Alexander down to Caesar Augustus, the wars of Syria and Egypt — that is, of the Seleuci, the Antiochi, and the Ptolemies.

It is to be observed, moreover, that this whole book is completed in four parts: of which the first — that is, from the beginning to those words of the second chapter, namely, THE CHALDAEANS ANSWERED THE KING IN SYRIAC [10] — is narrated in the hebrew speech. The second, which proceeds thence to the vision of the third year of Balthasar — that is, to the end of the seventh chapter — is written in Hebrew letters indeed, but in the Syrian, that is, the Chaldaic, tongue. The third, to the end of the twelfth chapter, is written again in hebrew eloquence. The fourth and last, concerning Susanna and Bel, was written in greek, out of the Greek edition of Theodotion of Ephesus — who also inserted the prayer of Azarias and the hymn of the three children, put forth by himself in greek, into the third chapter of the same book. This book, moreover, begins, among us as among the Hebrews, thus: In the third year of the reign of Joachim, king of Juda, came Nabuchodonosor, king of Babylon, etc. But the vulgate edition of the greeks, and the very Synopsis of Athanasius (in which the beginnings of all the sacred volumes are recorded), take the beginning of the book from the history of Susanna — because it befell while Daniel was yet a boy [11] — in these words: Καὶ ἦν ἀνὴρ οἰκῶν ἐν Βαβυλῶνι, καὶ ὄνομα αὐτῷ Ἰωακείμ, that is, And there was a man dwelling in Babylon, and his name was Joa- [-chim →]

[→ -chim], etc., down to the end of the same history, which in our codices also is contained in chapter 14 [so printed; the history of Susanna stands as chapter 13 in our codices]. Which being completed, there follow immediately those words, In the third year of the reign of Joachim — whence our exemplars, together with those of the Hebrews, take their beginning. Now this same book, according to the hebraic verity, ends in those words: But thou, Daniel, go to the appointed end, and thou shalt rest, and shalt stand in thy lot at the end of the days — which among us are read at the close of the twelfth chapter; but the Greeks, together with us, finish the present book in those words of the history of Bel and the dragon: Καὶ κατεβρώθησαν παραχρῆμα ἐνώπιον αὐτοῦ — that is, And they were devoured in a moment before him. Daniel lived in the captivity of Babylon, most acceptable to the kings of the Assyrians; and he died in the times of Cyrus, king of the Persians, in Babylon, and there was buried with great honors, about the year from the founding of the world ter 1400 [thus mixed in the print; i.e. three thousand four hundred]. [1] His book, together with the volume of Ezechiel, Isidore reckons to have been written down by the wise men of the Hebrews. The Greeks divide the whole volume into twelve visions: of which the first contains the history of Susanna, the last the destruction of the Dragon and the rapture of Abakuk.

OSEA

HOSCEA הושע, that is, Saviour, son of Beeri, sprung from the town of Belometh, in the tribe of Isachar, wrote a book commatice [in short clauses], and as it were digested by sentences, of the prophecies put forth by himself against the ten tribes of Israel under the name of Ephraim, of Samaria, and of the house of Joseph: in which, beyond the other prophets, he vaticinated of the vocation of the gentiles and the reprobation of the Hebrews. [2] He lived under Ozia, Joathan, Achaz, and Ezechia, kings of Juda, synchronous with Esaias the prophet; and he died, and was buried in his own country, about the year from the founding of the world three thousand three hundred and forty. [3]

JOEL

IOEL יואל, that is, Beginning, son of Pethuel, sprung from the field of Bethor, of the tribe of Ruben, wrote a little book of prophetic forewarnings; in which he foretold what great evils hung over the world [4], and especially over the two tribes which are called Juda and Jerusalem, and Jacob, on account of its many and grievous crimes — announcing also mysteries concerning the kingdom of Christ and the mission of the holy spirit. He was famous under king Joram, son of Achab, king of Israel: in whose times he both foresaw and experienced the great famine that was to be in the land; and he departed this life a little after, and with glory and honor was buried in Bether, about the year from the founding of the world three thousand and fifty, but before Christ the nine hundred and eighth. [5]

AMOS

AMOS עמוס, that is, Bearing, from the town of Thecue — which Epiphanius places in the tribe of Zabulon, but Jerome hands down to be six miles distant, toward the southern quarter, from holy Bethlehem, in the tribe of Juda [6] — since he was not a prophet, nor the son of a prophet, but a plebeian man and a shepherd [7], plucking the mulberries of the brambles, suddenly and by divine miracle called into the order of prophets: he prophesied against the ten tribes of Israel, some things also against the nations neighboring the land of Israel, and against the kingdom of Juda, preaching even against the temple itself; and he transmitted his vaticinations to posterity in a single volume. He was famous under Ozia, king of Juda, and Jeroboam, son of Joas, king of Israel: by whom, and by the son of Amasias, priest of Bethel — whom he himself had rebuked concerning the two golden calves — he fell, transfixed with a nail through the temples, about the year from the founding of the world three thousand one hundred and ten. [8]

ABDIAS

OVADIA עבדיה, or Abdias, that is, the Worshipper of God, was born, as Epiphanius writes, in Sichem [Sichera] in the field of Leththacmar. He, before he began to prophesy, bore the dignity of a Semicenturion, or Quinquagenarius [captain of fifty], under Ochozias, king of Israel: by whom when — after two companies of fifty had been consumed by celestial fire — he had been sent to apprehend Helias the prophet, deserting the king he adhered to him, and was made his disciple. But Jerome judges that he was that man who [9], as is read in the third book of Kings [10], in the times of Achab and Jezabel fed a hundred prophets hidden away in caves. Certain of the Rabbins think that he was a proselyte from Idumaea [Aedomea], because his little book of prophecy was written chiefly against the Edomites [Aedomeos] — that is, the Chaldaeans [so printed] — and the nations which afflicted Israel. He lived about the year from the founding of the world three thousand and sixty [11]: whose sepulcher in the times of Jerome was to be seen in Sebaste, which of old was Samaria, together with the mausoleum of Heliseus the prophet and of John the Baptist.

JONAS

IONA יונה, whose name signifies a Dove, as is had in the third volume of Kings [12], was the son of Amithai the prophet, from the region of Opher, from the hamlet of Geth — which in the times of Jerome was called Diocaesaria [so printed; Jerome says rather that it lay at the second milestone from Sepphoris, itself then called Diocaesarea], situated at the second milestone from Sephorim toward Tyberias, in the tribe of Aser. Yet Epiphanius hands down that he was born in Gath, or in Chauathamaum, in the tribe of Dan, not far from Azotus, a city of the Palestinians, near the sea; and that he was the son of the widow of Sarepta, whom Helias the prophet raised up when dead at Sarepta of Sidonia [13] — the mother afterward saying to him, NOW I have known that thou art a man of God, and the truth is in thy mouth [14]: and for this cause the boy was called the son of Amithai, that is, of truth, because, Helias the prophet speaking true, he was brought forth again into this light. He, when he had come to man's estate, prophesied first of the restitution of Damascus, and of Hemath, and of the borders of the kingdom of Israel, made through Hieroboam, king of Israel; then, sent to Ninive, the metropolis of the Assyrians, founded by king Ninus beside the river Lycus, he converted that city by his preaching to penitence: and this history — in which the death and resurrection of Christ is figured — he committed to a small book. He lived in the times of Osea, Amos, and Esaias; and he died in the land of Saar, and in the same place was buried in the cave of Cenezaeus the judge, about the year from the founding of the world three thousand two hundred and forty. [15]

MICHA מיכה, that is, Humility, prophet, born in Morasti [in Morastite] — which, near Eleutheropolis of Palestine, in the tribe of Ephraim, is a hamlet not great; or, as Jonathan the Chaldaean hands down, from the city of Maresa, which is in the tribe of Juda — wrote a book of the vaticinations which [in →]

[1] He dies cast headlong from a high place; and he was buried in Morasti, his own country, near the Polyandrium [common burying-place], in the year from the founding of the world almost three thousand two hundred and forty. [2]

NAHUM

NACHUM נחום, or Nahum, that is, the Consoler, as Epiphanius asserts, born in the town of Elkesei beyond the river Jordan toward Begabar, of the tribe of Simeon — or, as it pleases Jerome, from Helchesei, which was a ruined hamlet in Galilaea [3] — vaticinated, after Jonas the prophet, against the Ninivites, because, after the pardon obtained from God, they had again perpetrated heavier crimes; and he concluded in a small volume his prophecy Of the subversion of Ninive and of the whole kingdom of the Assyrians — which is thought to have been afterward accomplished by Nabuchodonosor in the first year of his empire. [4] He dies under the impious king Manasses, and was buried in Bagabar, about the year from the founding of the world three thousand two hundred and forty-five. [5]

ABACUCH

CHAVAKKUK חבקוק, or Abacuch, that is, the Wrestler, prophet, sprung from the field of Bezochar, of the tribe of Simeon: at God's command — as is written in the second chapter of his own prophecy — he drew up a book of vaticinations against Babylon and Nabuchodonosor, king of the Chaldaeans, who overthrew Jerusalem and the temple, and brought upon the kingdom of the Jews evils so great as they had never suffered from any tyrant. He lived in the age of the Babylonian captivity [6]; at which time also he was carried off with a dinner by an angel into Chaldaea, to Daniel shut up in the den of the Lions [7]; and he departed this life two years before the return of the Judaic people from Babylon, and with great honors was interred in his own field, in the year from the founding of the world ter 1400 and 16 [thus mixed in the print; i.e. three thousand four hundred and sixteen]. [8] There is numbered also another Apocryphal writing of Abacuch, in the following volume.

SOPHONIAS

ZEPHANIA צפניה, or Sophonias, that is, the Secret [hidden one] of the lord, prophet, a Sarabathide — that is, from the mountain Sarabatha — son of Chusi, grandson of Gedalias, great-grandson of Amarias, great-great-grandson of Ezechias, composed one book, in which with wondrous and luminous brevity he ran through the vaticinations put forth by himself concerning the overthrow of Jerusalem and the devastation of the whole kingdom of the Jews. He was famous under Josias, king of Juda, synchronous with Jeremias the prophet, in the year from the founding of the world three thousand three hundred and thirty. [9]

AGGAEUS

CHAGGI חגי, or Aggaeus, that is, Festive and Glad, returned while quite a youth from Babylon into Judaea, and by his vaticinations impelled the people to the re-edification of the temple of God, threatening them with innumerable evils unless they pressed on with the building: and he saw with his own eyes the structure of the temple completed, and there, first of all men, sang ALLELUIA in the praise of God [10]; and his joyful prophecies — of the return of the people, of the re-edification of the temple, and of the overthrow of the hostile nations — he left digested in a very short book. He dies at Jerusalem fifty years after the return from Babylon, in the year from the founding of the world ter 1469 [thus mixed in the print; i.e. three thousand four hundred and sixty-nine]. [11]

ZACHARIAS

ZECHARIA זכריה, that is, Mindful of the lord, prophet, and son of Barachias, grandson of Iddo, from the land of the Chaldaeans [printed Chalst■orum], wrote a book, beyond the other twelve prophets the longest and the most obscure, having almost the same argument as Aggaeus — of the re-edification of the temple, yet treating more fully of the city of Jerusalem than of the temple — and containing visions exceedingly obscure, not unlike the visions of Daniel; in explicating which many illustrious wits, as well of the Jews as of the Christians, have sweated. He passed away, worn out with long old age, in Judaea, and was interred next to Aggaeus the prophet, about the year from the founding of the world ter 1450 [i.e. three thousand four hundred and fifty].

MALACHI מלאכי, or Malachias, that is, my Angel or my Messenger: he is thought by some to have been an Angel, who coming from heaven assumed a body, that he might vaticinate to Israel the things which had been commanded by God — which opinion Jerome fastens upon Origen. [12] But Epiphanius writes that he was born in the town of Sopha, in the tribe of Zabulon, and obtained the name of Angel because he was of surpassing beauty, and endowed with most blameless manners. Jonathan the Chaldaean and the rest of the Hebrews hold that he was Esdras the scribe and priest, because all the things which are contained in his book this prophet also commemorates, saying: THE LIPS of the priest keep knowledge, and they require the law from his mouth, because he is the angel of the lord. [13] But whosoever he may have been who wrote the book under the name of Malachias, it matters little; since the authority of his book labors under no suspicion, but is cited by the Evangelists in testimony of the truth. Malachias was famous about the year from the founding of the world three thousand four hundred [14], in the year before Christ almost the five hundredth; and he wrote this book against the impure life of his people, and especially against the wicked manners of their priests: who, after the return from Babylon and the restoration of the temple, having turned back again to their former foulnesses, had begun to offer the oblations and the divine sacrifices with contaminated souls and bodies.

APPENDIX

APPENDIX FROM THE BOOK OF THE WAYS OF THE HOLY TONGUE of Rabbi Moses Kimchi: in which, according to the tradition of the Rabbins, are most briefly run through the writers of the holy books of the first order, which alone are in authority among the Hebrews.

MOSES, the man of God, wrote the five fifths of the law — that is, the Pentateuch — except eight verses, from these words, AND MOSES DIED, etc., to the end of the law; and the book of Job.

JEHOSCUA [Joshua] wrote his own book, and the eight verses of the law.

ISAIAS wrote his own book, and the book of Proverbs, and the book of the Canticle of Canticles, and the book of Ecclesiastes.

JEREMIAS wrote his own book, and the book of Kings, and the book of the Threni [Lamentations].

THE MEN OF THE GREAT SYNAGOGUE wrote the book of Jehezekel, and the book of the Twelve — that is, of the Twelve minor prophets — and the book of Daniel, and the volume of Esther.

DAVID AND THE TEN PROPHETS wrote the book of Hymns, that is, of the psalms.

EZRAS wrote his own book, [and] the genealogies of the words of the days — that is, of Paralipomenon — as far as those words, AND THE SONS OF JOSAPHAT HAD BRETHREN.

THE NUMBER of the verses of the law: five thousand eight hundred and forty-five.

OF THE PROPHETS: nine thousand two hundred and ninety-four.

OF THE HAGIOGRAPHA: eight thousand and sixty-four.

THERE IS FOUND, therefore, as the sum of all the verses of the reading of the Bible: twenty-three thousand two hundred and three verses.

OF THE SCRIPTURES AND WRITERS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT, which are numbered in the first order of the Canon

THE various supputations and the diverse partitions of the scriptures and writers of the old testament being completed — of the Protocanonical, which are placed in the first order of the canon — we must now proceed to the books of the same order which are had in the new testament: of which the most certain index, and through all the successions of the catholic fathers the undoubted and most approved, is this:

1	Ματθαῖος,	Matthaeus.
2	Μάρκος,	Marcus.
3	Λουκᾶς,	Lucas.
4	Ἰωάννης,	Joannes.
5	Πράξεις τῶν Ἀποστόλων	The Acts of the Apostles.
	Παύλου ἐπιστολαὶ ιγ′.	The epistles of Paul, XIII — namely:

20	Ἰωάννου ἐπιστολὴ α′.	The epistle of John, the first.

MATTHAEUS — who is also Levi, an Apostle from a publican [1] — first of all, in Judaea, for the sake of those who had believed from the circumcision, composed the Gospel of Christ, as Irenaeus witnesses, in Hebrew letters and words. [2] Who afterward first translated it into Greek is not sufficiently certain. Moreover, Jerome testifies that the author's Hebrew exemplar itself was preserved in his own times in the library of Caesarea, which Pamphilus the Martyr had built up; and that he himself obtained the faculty of copying it from the Nazaraeans, who, dwelling in Beroea, a city of Syria, used a similar Hebrew volume. Hence it is that, since Matthaeus wrote in Hebrew, in bringing forward the testimonies of the old scripture he does not follow the edition of the seventy interpreters cited by the other evangelists, but produces each testimony according to the Hebraic verity. [3] This gospel is divided by the more ancient latins, according to the partition of Hilary, into 33 canons; and according to the section of Christian Drutman [Druthmar], into 67 canons; but among the more recent Latins into 8 chapters; among the Greeks, according to Euthymius, or Oecumenius, into 68 chapters; but according to Suidas into 68 titles, and 355 chapters; Ammonius similarly, and Eusebius, into 355 chapters. This gospel was written, as Eusebius relates, in the third year of the Emperor Caius Caligula — that is, in the eighth year from the ascension of Christ. [4] Its author Matthaeus, having set out into Aethiopia for the preaching of Christ, and thence returned, fell asleep in Hiera, a city of Parthia, and there was buried, in the year from the birth of Christ 50. He is reported to have written certain other things also, of which it shall be spoken in the following book.

MARCUS, bishop of Alexandria, and evangelist, whose name was John, had for mother Mary — she who in her own house kindly received the apostles, as Lucas in the Acts of the Apostles thus testifies: But Peter, CONSIDERING, came to the house of Mary, the mother of John, who was surnamed Marcus; where many were gathered together, and praying. [5] He first, as Origen says, before the dominical pas-[-sio →]

[→ -sio]n, followed Christ among the seventy-two disciples [1]; then, after the ascension of Christ, he was joined to Barnabas his uncle, and to Paul — as Lucas commemorates in the same book, and as Paul indicates, making mention of him in the epistle to the Colossians and in the second to Timothy. [2] Lastly — as Papias in the first book of The Dominical Words, and Clemens in the sixth book of the ὑποτυπώσεις [Hypotyposes, Outlines], write — he gave himself to Peter, the prince of the apostles, as companion, disciple, and interpreter: which the former epistle of Peter also demonstrates, in which he himself called Marcus his son according to the spirit. [3] Being asked therefore at Rome by the brethren, he wrote a brief gospel in the Greek speech [4], according to that which he had heard Peter relating — agreeing in all things so closely with those which Matthaeus had written a little before, that he seemed to be his follower and abbreviator. When Peter had heard this, he approved it, and by his own authority delivered it to the church to be read; whence also by some it has been called the gospel of Peter. [5] But Marcus, taking his own gospel, went on into Aegypt; and there, first of all announcing Christ at Alexandria, he established a church of such doctrine and continence of life that Philo, the most eloquent of the Jews, wrote a most lauded book about it. He died in the eighth year of Nero, leaving behind the codex of his gospel, which — after the tenth year from the assumption of the saviour, as Chrysostom says — he had published abroad in Aegypt. [6] Our countrymen divide this gospel into 16 chapters; the Greeks, in Suidas, into 48 titles and 56 chapters; in Ammonius and Eusebius, into 235 chapters; in Oecumenius and Euthymius, into 48 chapters — of which the last, fore-noted OF THE ASKING FOR THE BODY OF THE LORD, ends in these words: Trembling and fear had seized upon them; and they said nothing to any man: for they were afraid [7] — but the rest which follow, up to the end, they do not enumerate. It is said that some things besides these were written by Marcus, which are noted in the following volume.

LUCAS

LUCAS the Evangelist — whom Paul, writing to the Romans, called Lucius [8] — Antiochene by country, physician by profession, most skilled in the Greek speech [9]: first, as Origen writes, he adhered to Christ with the other seventy disciples, and received from him the seeds of piety; but afterward, made a follower of Paul and the inseparable companion of all his peregrination, he wrote — fifteen years after the assumption of the Saviour, by the permission of Paul, to Theophilus, a man most faithful and most loving of God — a gospel in the Greek tongue: of whom the same Paul says, We have sent with him our brother, whose praise is in the gospel through all the churches [10]; and to the Colossians, Lucas, the most dear physician, saluteth you [11]; and to Timothy, Only Lucas is with me [12]. There are nevertheless those who think that Lucas was not with the lord in the flesh, and wrote not according to the things which he had seen, but as he had learned from Paul and the other apostles — which he himself seems thus to have shown in his preface: ACCORDING as they have delivered them unto us, who from the beginning themselves saw, and were ministers of the word. [13] Chrysostom judges that as often as Paul in his epistles says, ACCORDING TO MY GOSPEL [14], he signifies the volume of Lucas. But Origen, in the dialogue Of the right faith in God, writes that Paul learned the narration of the evangelical history from Lucas and Marcus. Lucas lived eighty-four years, having no wife; and when he had preached the gospel to the Alexandrians, and to the whole region which lies adjacent to it, as far as Pentapolis, he died at Alexandria; and there he was buried in Bucolis with Ictas [cum Ictare — so printed], who was the first martyr in Lycia; whom Alexander the bishop translated, and laid where all the bishops are buried. His bones were translated to Constantinople in the twentieth year of Constantius. Simon Metaphrastes wrote his life in Greek. Oecumenius and Euthymius distribute this gospel into eighty-three heads; Ammonius and Eusebius into 343 chapters; Ambrose into one hundred sixty-four titles; Beda into 93 chapters; but the more recent Latins dissect it into twenty-four chapters.

JOANNES

JOANNES, Apostle and Evangelist, brother of James the greater, son of Zebedee, from the village of Bethsaida of the region of Galilaea, a fisherman by trade, learned letters neither before nor after his vocation [15]: but when at the supper he reclined upon the breast of the lord, he drank in such knowledge as no one of mortals has ever obtained. [16] He therefore, the last of all, many years after the taking of Jerusalem, wrote a gospel in the Greek speech, being asked by the bishops of Asia, against Cerinthus and other heretics, and chiefly against the dogma of the Ebionites then rising up [17], who asserted that Christ was not before Mary — whence he was even compelled to declare his divine nativity. But they report also another cause of this writing: that, when he had read the volumes of Matthaeus, Marcus, and Lucas, he approved indeed the text of the history, and confirmed that they had spoken true things, but [saw] that they had woven the history of one year only — that in which he also suffered — after the imprisonment of John. Passing over, therefore, the year whose acts had been set forth by the three, he narrated the deeds of the earlier time, before John was shut up in prison — as can be manifest to those who shall diligently read the volumes of the four gospels. Which thing also takes away the dissonance which seems to be between the other evangelists and the gospel of Joannes. This gospel our men distinguish into 21 chapters; Oecumenius and Euthymius — not counting the title of the woman taken in adultery — distribute it into eighteen chapters or titles; Ammonius and Eusebius, the same title being passed over, divide it into 232 chapters. He lived almost a hundred years, of which he passed nearly forty at Ephesus, down to Domitian, by whom he was banished to the island of Pathmos; on his being slain, and his decrees rescinded, under Nerva he returned to Ephesus, and there persevering until Trajan, he founded and ruled all the churches of Asia; and, worn out with old age, he died in the 68th year after the passion of the lord, and was buried near the same city. [18] Many of the ancient Greeks judge that he is still alive, on account of those words which the lord spoke: THERE ARE some of them standing here that shall not taste death, till they see the son of man coming in his kingdom [19]; and, SO I will have him to remain till I come; what is it to thee? [20] Simon Metaphrastes, a Greek author, wrote his life. Josephus the Jew, the Tiberine Count [Count Joseph of Tiberias], found his gospel, translated into the Hebrew speech by an uncertain author, in the treasury [gazophylacium] of Tyberias, and delivered it to the church in the year from the birth of Christ 370. But of the remaining writings, if any have been put forth under his name, we shall speak in the second volume of this work.

THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES

[→ acta] it contains the acts of the holy spirit [1]: so that, as the gospels comprehend the actions of Christ, so this book narrates the actions which the holy spirit wrought through the apostles after he descended into them — fulfilling that vaticination which Christ had promised in the gospel, saying: AMEN I say to you, he that believeth in me, the works that I do, he also shall do, and greater than these shall he do. [2] Which indeed this book testifies to have been fulfilled in the apostles: whose tongue converted the whole circle of the earth to the true worship of God, and the very shadow of whose body, and whose half-girdles [aprons], put forth unheard-of miracles. [3] Moreover, the greatest part of the things which are treated here are the acts of Paul, who labored more than all, and underwent greater perils than the rest [4]: which Lucas, knowing exactly — as one who had journeyed together with him and lived in his company — wrote most diligently [5], from the beginning of his conversion down to the two years of Paul's abiding at Rome; that is, down to the fourth year of Nero, which was the sixty-first from the birth of Christ. This book — translated into the Hebrew tongue — Josephus the Jew, the Tiberine Count, found in the Treasury of the Jews of Tyberias, in the year from the birth of Christ three hundred and seventy. The Greeks distinguish this volume into forty chapters; but the Latins into twenty-eight chapters. There is a report that Lucas wrote some things beyond these, to be noted in the following book.

THE EPISTLES OF PAUL

PAULUS the Apostle — who before was Saul, outside the number of the twelve apostles; of the tribe of Benjamin, from Gischala, a town of Judaea; brought up at Tarsus of Cilicia; erudited in the law at Jerusalem by Gamaliel; and compelled to the faith by Christ through an unlooked-for revelation [6] — wrote the thirteen epistles written below.

TO THE ROMANS, one, sent from Corinth by Phoebe, a minister of the church of Cenchrae: in which he strives to recall to mutual concord the Romans, lately converted from the Jews and from the gentiles, who were contending with grave and perilous altercation among themselves about the dignity and merits of those who were to be admitted to the Christian religion and chosen for the ecclesiastical ministries. This epistle is divided among the Greeks into 20 chapters; among the more recent Latins into sixteen chapters; but among the old Latins — as appears from the commentaries of Ambrose — into 50 chapters.

TO THE CORINTHIANS, two. Of which he wrote the former from Ephesus, by Stephanas and Fortunatus [printed Fortunarum], studying to allay their dissensions and the diverse factions which certain arrogant professors of worldly wisdom had stirred up, chiefly concerning the preachers of the gospel, concerning the divine sacraments, and the ministers of the sacraments. It has among the Greeks 9 chapters; among the younger Latins sixteen; among the old, seventy-three.

THE LATTER he sent from Philippi of Macedonia, by Titus and Lucas, admonishing them to follow the sincere ministers of the Gospel and dispensers of the sacraments, but to reject the false and evil. It is distinguished by the Greeks into ten chapters; by the neoteric Latins into thirteen; by the ancients into twenty-seven.

TO THE GALATIANS, one, from Rome: in which he gravely chides the Galatians, drawn back to Judaism by false Apostles, and recalls them from the servitude of the Mosaic law, into which they had relapsed, to Evangelical liberty. It contains among the Greeks 12 chapters; among the Latins, six.

TO THE EPHESIANS, one, from Rome, by Tychicus, out of the prisons: in which he briefly prescribes the form of Christian life which they, already built up in the faith, had earnestly asked of him at Ephesus. It has among the Greeks ten chapters; among the Latins, six.

TO THE PHILIPPIANS, one, from the prisons of the city of Rome, by Epaphroditus: exhorting the clergy of the Philippians to mutual concord, and to the guarding of Ecclesiastical unity against the pseudo-apostles who were thrusting in Judaism and contriving the division of the Church. The Greeks divide it into eight chapters; the Latins into 4.

TO THE COLOSSIANS, one, written from Ephesus, out of bonds, by Tychicus: in which he corrects the Colossians, still entangled in many Jewish and Greekish superstitions, showing that there is no access to God from any other quarter than through Christ. In Greek it is divided into ten chapters; in Latin into four.

TO THE THESSALONIANS, two. Of which he wrote the former from Athens, by Tychicus, animating them that, as they had stood firm in the faith once received, so they should bear the persecutions brought upon them for Christ with an eager and unbroken spirit. It has among the Greeks seven chapters, and among the Latins likewise.

THE LATTER he wrote from the same place, and by the same man: again confirming their souls to the manly toleration of afflictions for Christ's sake, promising that neither should the reward be wanting to them, nor vengeance to their adversaries. It has among the Greeks five chapters; among the Latins, three.

TO TIMOTHY, two. Of which he sent the first from Laodicea of Phrygia, by Tychicus the deacon, instructing him in the things which become a master and pastor of the church. It has among the Greeks eighteen chapters, but six among the Latins.

THE SECOND, however, from Rome, out of bonds: confirming him, detained in the Church; and at the same time admonishing him not to be cast down by the storms of persecutions, but by his [Paul's] example to prepare his soul for martyrdom. The Greeks part it into 9 chapters; the Latins into four.

TO TITUS, one, from Nicopolis of Macedonia: instructing him how — the ministers of the church being ordained, and the false Apostles hissed off — he should govern the sheep entrusted to him. The chapters of the Greeks are four; of the Latins, three.

TO PHILEMON the Phrygian, one, from the bonds of the city of Rome, by Onesimus: in which he reconciles the same Onesimus — the fugitive slave of Philemon, and a pilferer — to his master, demonstrating the duties of a lord toward his slave and of a slave toward his lord. The Greeks divide it into two chapters; the Latins into none.

PAULUS the Apostle DIES in the city of Rome — after he had preached thirty-five years, from Jerusalem even into Spain — beheaded in the thirteenth year of Nero, that is, in the seventieth year from the advent of the Saviour, on the twenty-ninth day of the month of July. [7] And he is reported, besides these, to have written very many things, which are reviewed in the second book of this work.

THE CATHOLIC EPISTLE OF PETER

[→ EPI-] SIMON PETRUS, son of Joannes, of the province of Galilaea, of the village of Bethsaida, brother of Andrew the Apostle, and prince of the Apostles — after the episcopate of Antioch, bishop of the Roman Church and first pontiff of the whole Christian church — wrote, by Sylvanus, a faithful brother, one epistle, which is named Catholic, to the Christians of the dispersion of Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia, who had lately come from Judaism to the faith of Christ: confirming them in the faith, and admonishing them that, their former life being left behind, they should enter upon a new one, and, as strangers and pilgrims, abstain from carnal desires, prepared to render an account of all things in the day of judgment. This epistle the Latins divide into four chapters, but the Greeks into eight. He dies at Rome, when he had held the pontifical chair for twenty-five years, in the last year of Nero: by whom he was fastened to a cross with his head turned to the ground and his feet raised on high, asserting that he was unworthy to be crucified in the same manner as his lord. And he was buried at Rome in the Vatican, beside the triumphal way, in the year from the birth of Christ the seventieth. Writings of various kinds are cited by the ancient fathers under the name of Peter, noted by us in the following book.

THE CATHOLIC EPISTLE OF JOHN

JOANNES, Apostle and Evangelist, whom our Lord Jesus Christ loved exceedingly, wrote one epistle, which is styled Catholic, to every age of Christians — boys, young men, and old men. In it he treats Theologically of the eternal word, teaching the causes of his advent and manifestation; and he discourses most copiously of the charity of God toward us, and of the mutual love to be exercised among us. It is divided among us into five chapters, but by the Greeks into seven chapters. The divine Augustine, in the second volume of the Evangelical Questions, seems to indicate that this epistle was sent by Joannes to the Parthians, writing thus: IT WAS SAID by Joannes in the epistle to the Parthians: DEARLY BELOVED, now we are the sons of God, and it hath not yet appeared what we shall be; we know that when he shall appear we shall be like to him, because we shall see him as he is [1] — which words indeed are read in the third chapter of this epistle. This same thing Higinus, the seventh pontiff of the Roman Church after Peter, insinuates in his first epistle to all the faithful of Christ, where he has these words: AND AGAIN Joannes the Evangelist himself to the Parthians: THERE ARE THREE, saith he, that give testimony in heaven — the Father, the Word, and the Holy Spirit; and these three are one [2] — which words are contained in the 5th chapter of this epistle.

OF THE DIVINE SCRIPTURES AND WRITERS of both Testaments belonging to the second order of the Canon — SECTIO SECUNDA

SINCE in the first Section of this work we have enumerated the Protocanonical authors of the books of both Testaments, which pertain to the First order of the sacred canon, it follows that in this second Section we should briefly designate the Deuterocanonical writers of the books as well of the old as of the new Testament, which are placed in the Second order of the same canon: beginning from the books of the old Testament, concerning which the orthodox fathers of old entertained doubts, and which the Hebrews — the book of Esther excepted — do not receive among the divine writings. Of these the index is this:

1	ρήθσΈ אסתר,	Esther.
2	τίβωΤ טוביה,	Tobias.
3	θίδυοὶ יהודית,	Judith.

4	χύοραΒ ברוך,	Baruch.
5	Ἐπιστολὴ Ἰερεμίου	The Epistle of Jeremias.
6	Σοφία Σαλομῶντος,	The Wisdom of Salomon.
7	Σοφία Σειράχ,	The Wisdom of Sirach, or Ecclesiasticus.
8	The supplement of Daniel, that is: Προσευχὴ Ἀζαρίου, Ὠδὴ τριῶν παίδων, Σωσάννης Ἱστορία, Περὶ Δράκοντος τοῦ Βήλ,	The Prayer of Azarias. The Hymn of the three children. The history of Susanna. Of the Dragon Bel.
9	Μακκαβαίων α′.	The first of Maccabees.
10	Μακκαβαίων β′.	The second of Maccabees.

ESTHER

THE BOOK of ESTHER אסתר, as Isidore supposes, Esdras wrote. [3] Eusebius in the Chronicles judges that the author of this book was later than Esdras, and that the history which is described in this book happened after the death of Esdras: because it is not likely that Esdras would have passed over so [cele- →]

[→ cele-]brated a history, if it had happened in his own times. Philo the Jew, in the volume of his chronography, asserts that the writer of this book was Joachim, Pontiff of the Hebrews, son of Jesus the high Priest: who — Mardochaeus the Hebrew, the adoptive father of Esther herself, exhorting him by letters — committed this history to writing; and instituted the solemnity of פורים Purim, that is, of Lots, in memory of the Judaic liberation, which the present history commemorates to have been wrought by the counsel and prayers of Esther. [1] Very many of the Latins hand down that this volume was written in Hebrew by Mardochaeus; whom those words of the ninth chapter of this book also seem to favor: And so Mardochaeus WROTE all things, and, comprehending them in letters, sent them to the Jews; and a little below, And the Jews RECEIVED the things which Mardochaeus had commanded by letters to be done... and all the deeds which are contained in the volume of the epistle — that is, of this book. [2] Now Mardochaeus wrote all the things which are had from the beginning of the book down to those words which are set at the beginning of the tenth chapter in this manner: Mardochaeus, of Judaic race, was second from king Assuerus, and great among the Jews, and acceptable to the people of his brethren, seeking good things for his people, and speaking the things which pertained to the peace of his seed. [3] But the remaining six chapters, to the end of the book, were added by an uncertain Greek writer out of diverse histories, but chiefly out of the eleventh book of the Antiquities of Josephus — from which the copy of the letters of Aman, and the copy of the epistle of king Artaxerses, which are recited in the thirteenth and sixteenth chapters of this book, were taken word for word. The beginning of this book, according to the Hebraic verity and our vulgate edition, stands thus: In the days of king Assuerus, who reigned from India even unto Aethiopia, etc. But in the [Greek] vulgate translation, thus: ἔτους δευτέρου βασιλεύοντος ἀρταξέρξου τοῦ μεγάλου, τῇ μιᾷ τοῦ νισὰν, ἐνύπνιον εἶδε μαρδοχαῖος — that is, In the second year, Artaxerxes the great reigning, on the first day of the month Nisan, Mardochaeus saw a dream, etc. — which things in our codices are contained in the whole eleventh and twelfth chapters; after which are straightway subjoined the words already set down, In the days of king Assuerus, who reigned from India. Now the end of this book among the Hebrews is concluded in that sentence, Seeking good things for his people, and speaking the things which pertained to the peace of his seed — which sentence in our exemplars is the beginning of the tenth chapter. But among the Greeks this book receives its end where the eleventh chapter of our edition begins — namely in those words, In the fourth year, Ptolemaeus and Cleopatra reigning, etc., as far as, son, in Jerusalem. Our codices, however, interpose six chapters from this place to the end of the volume. And it came to pass that, on account of these rags of appendices, inserted here and there by certain writers ■■■■ [a word inked out by the censor], this book — although Hebrew, and received by the Hebrews — very late received canonical authority among the Christians. [printed margin: Why the book of Esther was for a time not received by all catholics (Cur aliquando liber Esther non fuerit ab omnibus catholicis receptus). MS note in ink: the whole book is canonical according to the Tridentine synod (integer liber est canonicus iuxta Tridentinam).] Whence neither Melito, bishop of Sardis, nor Gregory Nazianzen enumerated it among the sacred books; and Athanasius cast it out by name from the catalog of the canonical volumes as spurious [nothum]. At last the third council of Carthage computed it among the sacred volumes. Mardochaeus was famous together with Joachim, son of Jesus the high priest, under Artaxerses, king of the Persians and Medes; [4] and he died in the 198th year of his life, about the year from the founding of the world ter 1600 [thus mixed in the print; i.e. three thousand six hundred].

TOBIAS

TOBIA טוביה — which sounds among us the Goodness of the lord — son of Tobiel, grandson of Hannanael, of the tribe and city of Nephthalim, which is in Galilaea toward the western border (as is had from his history, which goes about, put forth in the Hebrew speech): at the command of Raphael the Archangel, who cured him of his blindness, he wrote his book in the Chaldaic tongue; [5] in which he digested the calamities and the divine consolations which he, a captive with all his family, experienced in Ninive, in the time of Salmanasser, king of the Assyrians — who, in the ninth year of Osee, king of Israel, and the sixth year of Ezechias, king of Juda, Samaria being taken, carried Israel over to the Assyrians, and placed them in Hayla and in Abor, beside the river Goza, in the cities of the Medes. The divine Jerome translated this book out of the Chaldee speech into Latin, with the labor of a single day; and the third council of Carthage — at which Augustine was present, about the year of the Lord CCCCX — received it into the canon of the holy scriptures: although long before, the most holy pontiffs Clemens the first, Roman, Anacletus, and Alexander had used its testimonies for the proving of the dogmas of our faith. We saw in former years, under the name of TOBIAS, a book written in Hebrew letters and tongue, brought from the city of Constantinople; [6] in which Tobias himself, speaking of himself in the first person from the beginning to the end of the volume, narrated his own history; and its beginning was of this fashion: זה ספר טובי בן טוביאל בן חננאל בן אריאל בן נכאל בן עשאל — that is, This is the book of Tobi, son of Tobiel, son of Hannanael, son of Ariel, son of Gabeel, son of Hasael, etc. Which when we had read through, we found that many things abound in it which are not in our canonical book of Tobias, and that far more are lacking in it which are had among us. This hebrew book seems to have some similitude with the greek volume of Tobias, in which Tobias, speaking of himself in direct narration, is brought in through many chapters; and the exordium of the history has the same words, written in this manner: Βίβλος λόγων Τωβὶτ τοῦ Τωβιήλ, τοῦ Ἀνανιήλ, τοῦ Ἀριήλ, τοῦ Γαβαήλ, τοῦ Ἀσαήλ — that is, The Book of the words of Tobi, son of Tobiel, etc., as above. Tobias lived, according to the vulgate edition of the Latins, CII years; but according to the translation of the Greeks, CLVIII years; and he died and was buried honorably in Ninive, about the year from the founding of the world ter 1370 [thus mixed in the print; i.e. three thousand three hundred and seventy]. In his volume, the things which are read concerning his death and burial are believed to have been superadded by Tobias the son of Tobias, and are not had in the hebrew exemplar. The Greeks divide the present book into nine hundred and three chapters [nongenta tria — so printed; perhaps for nonaginta tria, ninety-three], the Latins into fourteen.

JUDITH

JEHUDITH יהודית: [7] Philo the Jew, in the volume of his Chronography, asserts that this book was written by Joachim the high priest, son of Jesus the high priest; who described in it the victory of Jehudith the Bethulian, of the tribe of Ruben — a rare and incomparable woman — and the liberation of the besieged fatherland, which was wrought through her in the 13th year of Artaxerses the first; who in the divine scripture is surnamed Assuerus, and Nabuchodonosor; and who with his colleague Cyrus first held empire over the Medes, Persians, and Assyrians [impe- →] [→ impe-]rium, as is read in the first book of Esdras and in the volume of Daniel. This book Jerome made Latin from the Chaldee; and — it having been put forth before in greek by an uncertain interpreter — the sacrosanct synod of Nicaea had adopted it into the canon of the holy scriptures, about the year of the Lord CCCXXIIII. Judith lived, as Philo witnesses, a hundred and twenty-five years: of which she persevered for a hundred and five years, after the fatherland had been liberated by her, in holy widowhood, departing from human affairs about the year from the founding of the world ter 1560 [thus mixed in the print; i.e. three thousand five hundred and sixty]. Joachim the priest, the writer of her history, is believed to have survived her by a little. The beginning of this book, which among us is, Now Arphaxat, king of the Medes, had subjugated many nations to his empire, in the vulgate codices of the Greeks begins in these words: ἔτους δωδεκάτου τῆς βασιλείας Ναβουχοδονόσορ ὃς ἐβασίλευσεν ἐν νινευῆ τῇ πόλει τῇ μεγάλῃ, ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις ἀρφαξὰδ, ὃς ἐβασίλευσεν μήδων ἐν ἐκβατάνοις — that is, In the twelfth year of the reign of Nabuchodonosor, who reigned in Assyria in Ninive the great city, in the days of Arphaxad, who reigned over the Medes in Ecbatana, etc. Many things also are had scattered here and there in the same Greek exemplars which our vulgate edition does not acknowledge. The Greeks cut this book into sixty chapters, the Latins into sixteen.

BARUCH

BARUCH ברוך, that is, Blessed, prophet, son of Neerias, grandson of Maasias, [1] great-grandson of Sedechias, great-great-grandson of Sedei, disciple and scribe of Jeremias the prophet: when after the overthrow of the city he had come into Babylon from Aegypt — whither he had been carried off with Jeremias — he wrote in the Hebrew speech a prophetic book, in which he bewept the calamity of the Chaldaic captivity and the causes of that same calamity — namely the incredulity and ingratitude of the Judaic people — with vaticinations intermixed concerning the happy return of the Jews into their fatherland, concerning the promise of the New testament, and concerning the coming of the son of God into flesh. Which book when he himself had read — the whole people which was captive in Babylon hearing and weeping — before king Jeconias and his nobles, it pleased them all that the book, together with moneys, should be sent to Jerusalem (or rather to the ruins of Jerusalem, already burnt) to Joachim, son of Helchias, and to the other priests who remained in the city from the remnants of the captivity: that with assiduous prayers they might supplicate God for the salvation of the captive people and for the safety of king Nabuchodonosor. The book was put forth, read, and sent to Jerusalem in the fifth year of the devastation of Jerusalem and of the Babylonian captivity, in the first month, on the seventh day of the month. This book the council of Florence and the council of Trent enumerate in the canonical catalog; Cyril likewise, bishop of Jerusalem, a thousand and two hundred years ago, reviews the same among the divine writings of irrefragable authority, in the fourth of the orations which are had among his catecheses. Hilary, in the fourth book Of the trinity, cites the testimonies of this book under the name of Jeremias [2] — which others of the ancients also are wont to do, attributing, namely, what is the disciple's to the master.

THE SECOND EPISTLE OF JEREMIAS (IEREMIAE PISTOLA II. [so printed, for EPISTOLA])

THE LITTLE BOOK — whether admonition, or second epistle, of Jeremias the prophet — which is annexed to the volume of Baruch in the vulgate edition, Jeremias dictated, Baruch his scribe taking it down; and after the overthrow of the city he delivered it to the people, soon to be led away into captivity by the Chaldaeans: that by this writing he might admonish them, lest, having entered Babylon, when they should see the golden gods of that region, they should desert the worship of their own God and adore the idols of the Chaldaeans. The author of the second book of the Maccabees remembers this writing, in chapter 2, in these words: [3] IT IS FOUND in the descriptions of Jeremias the prophet, that he commanded those who were transmigrating to take fire; and he gave them a law, that they should not forget the precepts of the lord, and that they should not err in their minds, seeing the idols of gold and silver, and their other ornaments. This also is numbered among the other Testamentary writings.

THE WISDOM OF SALOMON

THAT the author of the BOOK of Wisdom was Salomon is established from those things which the author himself wrote of himself in the ninth chapter of this volume, saying: BUT THOU, O LORD, hast chosen me to be king of thy people, and judge of thy sons and daughters; and hast said that I should build a temple in thy holy mount, and an altar in the city, a similitude of thy tabernacle which thou preparedst from the beginning. It appears also that the sentences of this book, although founded by Solomon, were nevertheless collected by a greek writer, and written down in greek in this volume. [4] Augustine at one time judged the writer of this book to have been Jesus, son of Syrach; which afterward, inquiring more diligently, he retracted in the second volume of the Retractations. There are those who think the work to be of Philo the Jew the younger, a man most celebrated for greek eloquence, who discharged an embassy on behalf of his nation to the emperor Caius. Others judge it to be of the other, the elder Philo the Jew, who flourished almost a hundred and seventy years before the advent of our Saviour, in the times of Onias the high priest. With whose opinions not only do the aforesaid words of this volume seem to conflict, but Josephus himself also most openly protests, when in the first book against Apion he reviews the elder Philo not among the Jews, but among the ethnic historians — and those especially who never read the sacred books. But of this matter it shall be spoken by us more fully, God approving, in the eighth book of this work. The third synod of Carthage, the great council of the Lateran, and Pope Gelasius fitted it into the order of the canonical volumes.

ECCLESIASTICUS

THE WISDOM of Syrach is inscribed Ecclesiasticus for this cause, [5] because, as Augustine says, it merited to be received into the Authority of the Church, and to be numbered among the prophetic books; but by the Greeks it has been called Πανάρετος [All-virtuous], from every virtue which is contained in it. This book Jesus, son of Syrach, of Jerusalem, wrote in the Hebrew tongue; and Jerome testifies, in the preface of the Proverbs to Chromatius, that he found it written in Hebrew. But his grandson, himself also called Jesus — and, as Damascene hands down in the fourth book of the Orthodox faith, having Syrach for father — turned the volume from hebrew into Greek. Isidore, in the sixth book of the Etymologies, judges that the interpreter of this book, who in the preface [calls himself] the grandson of Jesus, [nomi- →]

[→ nomi-]nates himself the grandson of Jesus the high priest, lived in the times of Aggaeus and Zacharias — which indeed seems absurd to very many, because three hundred years intervened between this man and that. For the interpreter of the present work, the grandson of Jesus, was famous when Ptolemaeus Euergetes was reigning as king of AEgypt, in the year from the founding of the world three thousand seven hundred. The third Council of Carthage, in chapter 43, received the present volume among the canonical writings — yet under the name and title of SALOMON; [1] inscribing it so, perhaps, either because, as Augustine noted in the book Of the city of God, the custom of those times prevailed that it should be called by the appellation of Salomon; or because the volume itself either had been collected out of the sentences of Salomon, or at least seemed not unworthy of Salomon. Subscribing to the decree of this council, the most blessed pontiffs Innocent and Gelasius inserted the same book among the canonical scriptures.

THE SUPPLEMENT OF DANIEL

THE SUPPLEMENT of the book of Daniel — which is not had in the Hebrew, but was transcribed by Jerome out of the Greek edition of Theodotion — contains four things: namely the prayer of Azarias and the hymn of the three children (which among us are read in the third chapter of Daniel); the history of Susanna (which the Greeks set at the beginning of the book of Daniel); and the narration of Bel, placed at the end of the volume as well in our codices as in the Greek. Concerning these there was of old a huge altercation among the highest nobles of the church. [2] Athanasius, in the Synopsis, teaches that this whole appendix was written by the prophet Daniel himself, and received among the canonical scriptures. Origen, in tractate 31 on Matthew, witnesses that the same was of old retained in the church with the highest veneration. Eusebius and the younger Apollinarius judge that this matter pertains not at all to the prophecy and deeds of Daniel the prophet, of the tribe of Juda, which are had in the sacred canon; but that it is part of a certain history or prophecy which Abakuk, son of Juda, of the tribe of Levi — a different man from him who is numbered among the twelve prophets — wrote concerning another certain Daniel, a priest, son of Abda. Which thing they confirm from the title and beginning of the history of Bel, which among the seventy interpreters is set down in the manner that follows: Προφητεία τοῦ ἀββακοὺμ υἱοῦ τοῦ Ἰουδᾶ, ἐκ φυλῆς Λευί — that is, The Prophecy of Abbakum, son of Juda, of the tribe of Levi. After which title the exordium of the book begins thus: ἄνθρωπός τις ἦν ἱερεὺς ὀνόματι Δανιήλ, υἱὸς τοῦ Ἀβδᾶ, συμπότης τοῦ Βασιλέως τῆς Βαβυλῶνος — that is, There was a certain man, a priest, by name Daniel, son of Abda, table-companion of the King of Babylon. Julius Africanus conjectures this part to be the fabrication of a Greek writer, on account of the words which are contained in the history of Susanna, where Daniel answers the elders — ἀπὸ τοῦ σχίνου σχίσαι, ἀπὸ τοῦ πρίνου πρίσαι [from the mastick tree, to cleave; from the holm oak, to saw] — which etymologies cohere so with the Greek speech that they cannot be accommodated to the Hebrew tongue. [3] But of this kind of controversy we have discoursed enough and more in the 5th and 8th books of this work. The Catholic Church — from the times of the Apostles even until now chanting daily the hymn of the three children among the divine praises, and every year repeating the prayer of Azarias, together with the history of Susanna and of Bel and of Abakuk the dish-bearer, in the sacred mysteries of the forty-day fast — has won canonical authority for this appendix. There have also been feigned certain things, written under the title of DANIEL, to be reviewed in the following volume.

THE FIRST AND SECOND BOOKS OF THE MACCABEES

THE HISTORY of the Maccabees — whom the Jews call חשמונאי Chasmonai, that is, born of Asamoneus — comprehended in two volumes, seems to have been written by three diverse authors. [4] That its first book is of a Hebrew author, and written in Hebrew, the very phrase indicates; and Jerome, in the Preface of Kings, confirms that he read it written in the Hebraic tongue. The second book — which, its first chapter and half of the second being removed, begins thus: Of Judas Machabaeus, and his brethren, etc. — a Greek writer, from thence to the end of the whole Work, contracted into an epitome out of the five books of Jason of Cyrene; which he himself confesses in the Preface, saying: The five books comprehended BY Jason of Cyrene we have attempted to abridge in one volume. [5] This abbreviator Jerome, in the second volume against the Pelagians, judges to have been Josephus, son of Mathathias; but Honorius, presbyter of Autun, in the book Of the Ecclesiastical writers, thinks it was Philo the Jew. The Third part of this history — which is compressed into the two epinician [victory] epistles from the beginning of the second book to the middle of its second chapter — the Senate of Jerusalem wrote: one of these epistles being sent to the Jews inhabiting Aegypt, the other to Aristobulus, preceptor of the King of Aegypt. And these, since they touch upon the victories described in the two books of the Maccabees, were deservedly placed by the Fathers after the end of the former volume and before the beginning of the latter, as looking equally to both. That these books, as well the first as the second, were received by the Church of God into the sacred Canon a thousand two hundred years ago, [6] Augustine asserts in the 18th [book] Of the City of God: The books OF THE MACCABEES, he says, not the Jews, but the Church holds for Canonical, on account of the vehement and wondrous passions of certain Martyrs, who, before Christ had come in the flesh, contended for the law of God even unto death, and endured evils most grievous and horrible. Thus he. Josephus nevertheless, at the close of the book which he inscribed Of the Maccabees, most constantly affirms that the martyrdoms of the old man Elezar, and of the seven sons with their mother, comprehended in the second volume of this history, are held even among the Hebrews among the sacred letters. Now the first book of the Maccabees contains the wars which, against the impious nations, [7] on behalf of the people of God, four most valiant captains of the Hebrews — namely Mathathias the priest, great-grandson of Asamoneus the priest, and thereupon his three sons, Judas, Jonathas, and Simon, one after the other — waged through two-and-forty continuous years: namely from the year of the founded world ter 1788 [thus mixed in the print; i.e. three thousand seven hundred eighty-eight] — which is the year CLXXIV before Christ, and the CXXXVII of the kingdom of the Greeks noted at the beginning of this book — down to the year from the founding of the world three thousand eight hundred and thirty, which is the year [annus →]

[→ annus] the year before the birth of Christ 132, and 178 of the kingdom of the Greeks: in which year Simon was slain by the fraud of Ptolemaeus; in whose death the whole canonical history of the Maccabees is concluded. For the history which is narrated in the latter book [1] is almost nothing else than a broader and fuller repetition of the things done by Judas Maccabaeus under the two Antiochi, father and son, down to the first year of king Demetrius and the slaughter of Nicanor — which are narrated in the first seven chapters of the first of Maccabees. But since these two volumes have taken their title from the illustrious surname of the Maccabees, it is pleasing here briefly to subjoin what I myself have read concerning the origin of this surname in the commentaries of Rabbi Isaac ben Schola; it stands thus: JUDAS, son of Mathathias, when he was about to enter battle against Antiochus, the enemy of the Jews, gave to his soldiers, as a watchword of war, that sentence of Moses in Exodus, chapter 15: מי כמוך באלים יהוה Mi chemocha baelim Iehoua — that is, Who is like unto thee among the strong, O lord? — and he commanded it to be inscribed on the standards of each of the ranks, as an omen of certain victory, by these four letters מכבי, that is, M, C, B, I; which are the initials of the four words aforesaid, and signify their sense entire. [2] But when the common run of the soldiers had begun, for brevity's sake, to pronounce these four letters not according to the entire sentence which they render, but according to the single word only which first results from their combination — namely MACCABAEI — little by little the military custom prevailed, that the author of this watchword, Judas, and their posterity, should be called by the surname of MACCABEES.

THE SUM, therefore, of all the books of the old testament embraces the number of three thousand eight hundred and thirty years, that is: [3]

FROM the beginning of Genesis to the death of Moses, described at the end of the Pentateuch, two thousand four hundred ninety-two years.

THENCE to the construction of the first temple, which is had in the third of Kings, chapter six, four hundred and forty years.

HENCE to the restoration of the second temple, which is read in the volume of Esdras, 125 years [so printed].

THENCE to Christ, according to the supputation of the weeks of Daniel, there are four hundred and ninety years: that is, from the restoration of the second temple to the death of Simon — which imposes the end upon the canonical writings of the ancient testament — three hundred fifty-eight years; and from the death of Simon to Christ, 132 years.

THERE ARE therefore, from the founding of the world to Christ, three thousand nine hundred sixty-two years. [4]

OF THE SECOND ORDER of the Scriptures of the new Testament

THUS FAR of the Second order of the scriptures of the old testament, which the Jews reject; there follows now the Second order of the scriptures of the new testament, concerning which there was at one time controversy among orthodox Christians. Their catalog is this:

1	The last chapter of Mark.
2	Luke's history of the bloody sweat of Christ, and of the angelic consolation to him; which is contained in the twenty-second chapter of the same gospel.
3	John's history of the woman taken in adultery; which is read in the eighth chapter of the same gospel.
4	Paul's epistle to the Hebrews.
5	The epistle of James.
6	The second epistle of Peter.
7	The second epistle of John.
8	The third epistle of John.
9	The epistle of Jude.
10	The Apocalypse, that is, the Revelation of John.

THE END OF MARK

THE END of MARK — that is, the last chapter of his gospel, namely from that place, AND JESUS RISING EARLY THE FIRST DAY OF THE SABBATH, [5] to the end, in which the apparition of Christ to Magdalen and his ascension into heaven is narrated — as appears from the monuments of the ancients, was not straightway from the beginning of the nascent church received among the canonical scriptures. [6] Jerome, in the third question to Hedibia, dissolving the contradiction which seems to be between Matthew, saying that Christ rose on the evening of the sabbath, and Mark, saying that Jesus rose early on the first day of the sabbath, writes thus: OF THIS question the solution is twofold: for either we do not receive the testimony of Mark, which is carried in but few gospels — almost all the books of Greece not having this chapter at the end — especially since it seems to narrate things diverse and contrary to the other Evangelists; or this must be answered: that both speak true — Matthew showing when the lord rose, on the evening of the sabbath; but Mark, when Magdalen saw him. Thus Jerome; to whom Euthymius subscribing, in the explanation of the same chapter, immediately after those words of Mark, THEY SAID NOTHING TO ANY MAN, FOR THEY WERE AFRAID, etc., speaks thus: CERTAIN of the interpreters assert that in this place the gospel of Mark was completed, and that the things which follow are a more recent addition; yet it behooves to explain this also, since it is in no way repugnant to the truth. I judge that this last chapter was at one time suspect to some of the fathers on account of certain apocryphal periods, rashly inserted by an uncertain author; of which Jerome, in the second dialogue against the Pelagians, cites certain words in this manner: IN CERTAIN exemplars, he says, and chiefly in the Greek codices, according to Mark, at the end of his gospel it is written: AFTERWARD, when the eleven had sat down at table, JESUS appeared to them, and upbraided their incredulity and the hardness of their heart, because they had not believed those who had seen him rising again. And they made satisfaction, saying: THIS AGE is the substance of iniquity and incredulity, which suffereth not, through the unclean spirits, the true virtue of God to be apprehended; therefore even now reveal thy justice, etc. Which addition indeed — because it smacks of the dogma of the Manichaeans — has deservedly been cut away and cast out of all exemplars, as well Greek as Latin. Augustine, in the third book Of the consent of the Evangelists, receives the present chapter from beginning to end with the same veneration as the whole gospel of Mark, [7] and under the name of Mark the Evangelist harmonizes this same with the sayings of the other Evangelists. Beda, near the end of the fourth book of the commentaries on Mark, [says] this [hoc →]

THE HISTORY OF THE BLOODY SWEAT OF CHRIST, and of the Angel's consolation to him, from the Gospel of Luke, Chap. XXII

THE HISTORY of the bloody sweat of Christ, and of the Angelic consolation to him, which Lucas describes in the 22nd chapter of his gospel, is placed in the second order of the canonical scriptures for this reason: that some of the ancients at one time entertained doubts about it, [2] and that many very old codices of the catholics did not have it — as Hilary testifies in the tenth [book] Of the trinity, in these words: NOR indeed must we be ignorant that in very many codices, both greek and Latin, nothing is found written either of the coming of the Angel or of the bloody sweat of Christ. For those in doubt, therefore, whether these things in the various books are either lacking or superfluous, this is left uncertain to us because of the diversity of the books. This Jerome also, in the second dialogue against the Pelagians, seems to indicate, saying thus: IN certain codices, as well greek as Latin, it is found, Luke writing: There appeared to him an Angel from heaven, comforting him — no doubt, the lord Saviour. By which form of speech the divine Jerome intimates that not all codices had those words. But I suspect that this history was of old rejected by certain orthodox men with a zeal pious indeed, but simple, [3] because it seemed to favor the Arrian heretics, who from this and testimonies like it built up [the claim] that the son of God is not in the same nature of the impassible God with the father. For another testimony also, concerning the weeping of Christ, similar to this one, was for this cause removed from the gospel of Luke by some catholics — Epiphanius plainly shows it in the book Anchoratus, writing these things: Christ WEPT also, as it is had in the Gospel according to Luke in the uncorrupted exemplars; and holy Irenaeus uses that testimony in the work against heresies, against those who say that Christ appeared in appearance [only]. But certain of the orthodox took the word away, fearing, and not understanding its end and force and strength. For Christ, set in anxiety, sweated; and his sweat was as drops of blood; and an Angel was seen comforting him. Thus Epiphanius. It is established that this history — which Dionysius the Areopagite cites and approves in the book Of the celestial hierarchy — was received into the canon of the sacred volumes by the common consent of the whole Church; and it was provided by ecclesiastical sanction, under pain of anathema, that no one should dare to contemn its authority. Whence also among the other ecclesiastical anathematisms which are enumerated by Athanasius in the sixth volume Of the beatitude of the son of God, this one too is reviewed: IF ANY MAN SHALL DENY THAT THE TRUE MAN, WHOM THE SON OF GOD ASSUMED, SWEATED BLOOD — ANATHEMA TO HIM.

THE FORMER PART OF THE EIGHTH CHAPTER of the Gospel according to John

THE HISTORY of the WOMAN taken in adultery, [4] which is had in the eighth chapter of John, the Church received into the canon many years after the Gospel of John, and declared it to be part of the Gospel of John — although before, it was not extant in many exemplars of the Greeks and Latins; as Jerome writes in the second volume against the Pelagians, and as Euthymius, in the commentaries on the same chapter, has left witnessed in these words: But it BEHOOVES TO KNOW that the things which are had from this place up to that where it is said, AGAIN THEREFORE JESUS SPOKE TO THEM, SAYING, I AM THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD [5], in the more exact exemplars either are not found, or are pierced through with the obelus, because they seem illegitimate and added; and the argument for this is, that no one has interpreted them. To us nevertheless the mind is to declare these things also, because they are not without utility — as also the Chapter concerning the woman taken in adultery, which is placed among them. Thus he. But certain of the more ancient judge that the present history was translated hither out of a certain Apocryphal Gospel according to the Hebrews, in which Eusebius, in the third [book] of the Ecclesiastical history, indicates from the testimony of Papias that such a narration was described, in these words: PAPIAS at the same time also subjoins a certain history of an adulterous woman, who was accused by the Jews before the lord; and this parable is had, written in the Gospel which is called ACCORDING TO THE HEBREWS. But the sacrosanct Church — every year, in the time of the Quadragesimal fast, chanting this history in the sacred mysteries under the name of the Gospel — has conferred on it an authority equal with the other chapters of the same Gospel; and the divine Ambrose, in the second epistle to Studius, asserts that this same [history] was always celebrated in the Church, and chanted by the mouth of all the faithful as an evangelical writing of John.

THE EPISTLE TO THE HEBREWS

THE EPISTLE to the Hebrews effects two things chiefly. [6] First, against certain hebrews lately converted, who thought the observance of the law was to be mingled with the Gospel, it shows that from the advent of Christ the shadows of the Mosaic law have ceased, and that in place of the old testament a new and far more excellent one has succeeded. Then it consoles those who, for the faith of Christ, were bearing persecutions and various afflictions [per- →]

[1] He is impious who doubts the authority of the last chapter of the Gospel of St. Mark [2] Some of the ancients doubted about the bloody sweat of Christ the Lord [3] Why the history of the bloody sweat of Christ was suspect to the ancient Doctors [4] There was once doubt about the history of the woman taken in adultery [5] John 8 [6] The argument of the epistle to the Hebrews [→ per-]severingly bearing. Concerning this epistle — its author as much as its authority — there was of old no light controversy between the Greek and Latin fathers [1]: very many of the Latins asserting that it is not Paul's, and for this cause not receiving it among the canonical scriptures; as appears from the writings of Jerome, who, making mention of its authority on the sixth chapter of Esaias, says thus: PAULUS, in the epistle to the Hebrews, which the Latin custom does not receive, etc.; and on chapter 8 of Esaias: The BLESSED Apostle, in the epistle which is written to the Hebrews, although the Latin custom does not receive it among the canonical scriptures, etc. Of the author also the same Jerome, in the catalog of illustrious men, writes thus: The EPISTLE which is carried to the Hebrews is believed even to this day not to be Paul's, on account of the distance of its style and speech; but either Barnabas's, according to Tertullian, or Luke the Evangelist's, according to some, or even Clement's, of the city of Rome. Yet it must be known that the most ancient nobles of the church, of the Latin as well as of the Greek church, venerated this epistle as a writing of Paul — even as Jerome, in the epistle to Dardanus, confesses in these words [2]: The EPISTLE which is inscribed to the Hebrews is received as [the epistle] of Paul the Apostle, not only by the churches of the Orient, but by all writers of the Greek speech — although very many judge it to be either Barnabas's or Clement's. But it matters nothing whose it is, since it is of an ecclesiastical man, and is celebrated daily in the reading of the churches. And if the custom of the Latins does not receive it — neither indeed do the churches of the Greeks receive the Apocalypse of John with the same liberty [3] ; and nevertheless we receive both, by no means following the custom of this time, but the authority of the ancient writers, who for the most part use the testimonies of each, not as they are sometimes wont [to use] the apocrypha, but as ecclesiastical and canonical. Thus Jerome, of the author and authority of this epistle — of which we shall discourse most copiously in the seventh book of this work. Paul therefore wrote, or dictated, this epistle in the hebrew speech [4]; but Lucas the Evangelist, or Clemens the Roman Pontiff, adorned it in the greek speech, yet not in its senses. This epistle the most sacred synod of Nicaea received among the sacred volumes as written by Paul the Apostle; and the council of Laodicea, the third of Carthage, and the council of Orange [Aurusicanum] referred it into the sacred catalog. It was sent from the city of Rome, out of bonds, by Timothy; and it is divided among the Latins into thirteen chapters, but among the Greeks into 22 chapters.

THE EPISTLE OF JAMES

JACOBUS the Apostle, son of Alphaeus, by surname the Just (whom Paul, writing to the Galatians, calls the brother of the lord [5], and Mark calls the less [6]), was the first bishop of Jerusalem [7]. Him Epiphanius thinks to have been the son of Joseph, the spouse of the virgin Mary; but Jerome [thinks him] begotten of Mary, the sister of the lord's mother, the wife of Alphaeus. He wrote to the twelve tribes of the dispersion, then first converted to Christ, one epistle — of the variety of temptations; of faith justifying out of works; of the things which become as well the rich as the poor; of the utility of patience; and of the priests to be brought in over the sick. [8] Which epistle was neither believed, immediately in the very times of the apostles, to be James the Apostle's, nor taken up among the canonical writings — Eusebius, in the second volume of the ecclesiastical history, and Jerome, in the catalog of ecclesiastical writers, affirm it; but long afterward it was numbered among the canonical books by the sacrosanct councils of Laodicea, of Carthage, and the others following. This epistle the Latins have distinguished into five, the Greeks into seven chapters. Jacobus the Apostle dies, cast headlong from the highest summit of the temple of Jerusalem, in the seventh year of Nero, when he had presided over the church for thirty years; and he was buried beside the temple, where he had been cast down, in the year from the birth of our Saviour the sixty-third [9]. Jerome, on the seventeenth chapter of Esaias, indicates that some of the ancient authors exempted this Jacobus, the brother of the lord, from the number of the twelve apostles whom Christ first chose, and called him the thirteenth apostle — as also [they called] Paul the fourteenth. There are extant under the name of this Apostle diverse writings, which shall be reported in the book next following.

THE SECOND EPISTLE OF PETER

SIMON PETRUS, the author of that epistle which is placed in the former order of the canon, wrote also another epistle to those Hebrews who had lately believed [10]: Of the faith of Christ, fore-announced by the prophets through the Holy Spirit; Of seducers to be avoided; Of the time to be passed not negligently; Of the preparation for the imminent day of judgment. The argument and order of which epistle Peter himself explains in its third chapter [11], saying thus: BEHOLD, this second epistle I write to you, my dearly beloved; in which I stir up by way of admonition your sincere mind, that you may be mindful of those words which I foretold, [spoken] by the holy prophets, and of the precept of us, who are apostles of the lord — and the rest which follows. Concerning the author and authority of this epistle, Origen, Eusebius, and Jerome hand down that there was at one time doubt; the sacrosanct synod of Laodicea and the council of Carthage decreed that it should be inserted among the canonical volumes under the name of Peter. The Latins have dissected it into three, the Greeks into four chapters.

THE SECOND AND THIRD EPISTLES OF JOHN

JOANNES, Apostle and Evangelist, besides that first epistle always approved by all the churches, wrote also two other epistles [12]: the one, of the right faith to be kept, and of heretics to be shunned, to Gaius; the other, Of hospitality, to Electa. Which [latter], as Jerome indicates, certain of the orthodox judged to be of another certain John, a presbyter, whose sepulcher was shown in the city of Ephesus — because in these he wrote himself "the presbyter," and wrote to one woman and to a single Gaius, against the custom of the catholic epistles; which for this reason are called catholic, that is, universal, or encircling [13], because they were written not distinctly to one person, nation, or city, but universally to all the faithful. Both, how-[-ever (men →)] [→ men] the aforesaid most sacred councils received both into the canon as John's. Of these the Greeks divide the former into two chapters, the latter into three.

THE EPISTLE OF JUDE

JUDAS the Apostle — who is also Thaddaeus, or Lebbaeus; brother, as he himself testifies in the salutation of his epistle, of James the less, and the same, as Matthaeus writes, a brother of our Lord Jesus Christ, born of Alphaeus and Maria of Cleophas, sister of the virgin Mary — wrote to those who had already believed a certain small epistle, Of the faith once received, to be manfully defended, and Of seducers to be fled from, over whom a great punishment hung. [1] Which epistle — because its author took up a testimony out of the apocryphal book of Enoch, and brought forth, out of another obscure volume which is inscribed the Ascension of Moses, the history of Michael disputing with the devil about the body of Moses — very many of the ancients, as Jerome and Eusebius testify, cast out of the canon; but by its antiquity and use it earned authority even to the times of Jerome, and was computed among the holy scriptures by the aforesaid holy synods. The greeks distinguish it into three chapters, the Latins into none. This apostle died at Berytus, and there was buried, in the year of the lord LX [2], after he had for a long time preached the gospel to the Edessenes and to all Mesopotamia.

THE APOCALYPSE

THE APOCALYPSE — that is, the Revelation — of Joannes the Evangelist, which contains a prophecy of the future tribulations of the church, from the beginning of the nascent church to the end of the world: certain of the most ancient greek fathers thought it should be cast off from the canon as foreign to the diction and tongue of Joannes the Evangelist, referring it to Joannes the presbyter, who obtained a monument at Ephesus not far from the sepulcher of Joannes the Evangelist. Yet Dionysius the Areopagite, Papias, Justinus, Irenaeus, Dionysius bishop of the Corinthians, Basil, Epiphanius, Gregory the Theologian, and with these the universal assembly of the Latin fathers, counted it among the legitimate and genuine writings of John the apostle; and the aforesaid most sacred councils reviewed it among the canonical volumes. Andreas, Archbishop of Caesarea of Cappadocia, dissected the book — according to the mystery of the four-and-twenty elders who are described in it — into four-and-twenty parts, and distinguished each of these, in honor of the most blessed Triad, into three chapters, so that the sum of all the chapters is LXXII; which among the Latins XXII chapters comprehend. Eusebius in the chronicles noted that the Apocalypse was put forth in the fourteenth year of the emperor Domitian, by whom Joannes the apostle was banished into the island of Pathmos, [where] he saw the revelations described in this book, in the year from the birth of Christ 97. [3] Yet Andreas and Arethas, bishops of Caesarea, following the opinion of Tertullian and Epiphanius, hand down that the Apocalypse was written about thirty-eight years before this time, under Nero (in the second year of whose empire Joannes, after the martyrdom of Peter and Paul, was carried off to Pathmos); and that in this volume are contained many visions and vaticinations of the future destruction of Jerusalem, and of the everlasting casting-away of the Judaic nation.

OF THE APOCRYPHAL SCRIPTURES INSERTED INTO THE DIVINE SCRIPTURE — SECTIO TERTIA

WE HAVE RUN THROUGH, in the two preceding Sections, all the canonical writings as well of the first as of the second order — which the Greeks call Διαθηκόγραφα, that is, Testamentary, and which all catholic doctors profess to be true, native, and genuine. It remains that in the third and last Section of this book I should run through certain Apocryphal scriptures — that is, of obscure author and of ambiguous authority — which many of the ancient fathers reproved as illegitimate, and mingled among the sacred volumes by uncertain writers. Their catalog is this:

1	The Accession of the second book of Paralipomenon.
2	The third book of Esdras.
3	The fourth book of Esdras.
4	The Appendix of the book of Esther.
5	The Appendix of the book of Job.
6	The Augment [Auctarium] of the Psalter.
7	The Addition to the book of Ecclesiasticus.
8	The little Preface of the Lamentations of Jeremias.
9	The third book of Maccabees.
10	The fourth book of Maccabees.

THE APPENDIX OF THE SECOND BOOK OF PARALIPOMENON

THE APPENDIX of the second book of Paralipomenon [4] — which some think was copied out of the books of Hozai, a most ancient writer — contains the prayer of Manasses, king of Jerusalem, when he was detained captive in Babylon; which is had neither in the hebrew nor in the greek vulgate exemplars. Yet it is most certainly established that this king, in the bonds of Babylon, offered to God a prayer from his inmost heart — the divine scripture witnessing this in the latter volume of the annals, in these words: THE PRINCES of the king of the Assyrians took Manasses, and bound with chains and fetters they led him into Babylon; who, after he was straitened, prayed to the lord his God, and did penance exceedingly before the God of his fathers; and he entreated him, and besought him intently; and God heard his prayer [5]; and a little after: But his prayer, and the hearing thereof, are written in the words of Hozai [6] — although the greek edition, in place of Hozai, has ἐπὶ τῶν λόγων τῶν ὁρώντων, that is, In the words of the seers. But whether Manasses brought forth this prayer or another, nothing certain is had. The Latin fathers received it among the holy writings, and, as appears from the ordinary gloss, illustrated it with annotations applied. This prayer is said to be extant in Greek in the Bibles of the library of Saint-Victor of Paris [bibliothecae Victorinae Parisiorum].

THE APPENDIX OF THE BOOK OF ESTHER

[→ LIBRI] THE APPENDIX of the book of Esther [1] — which embraces the seven later chapters, that is, from about the beginning of the tenth chapter to the end of the book — is woven of various rags and patchworks [centones]; of which nothing at all is extant in the exemplars of the Hebrews, but in the Greek these are had, namely:

THE EPISTLE, OR EDICT, OF ARTAXERXES FOR THE DESTROYING OF THE NATION OF THE JEWS: which our edition has transferred from the third chapter of the Greek codex (according to our supputation) into the thirteenth chapter.

THE PRAYER OF MARDOCHAEUS; THE LAMENT OF ESTHER, AND HER ENTRANCE, TERRIFIED, TO THE KING: which among us are had in the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth chapters; in the Greek codices they are had near the end of the fourth chapter, immediately after those words, Καὶ βαδίσας Μαρδοχαῖος ἐποίησεν — that is, And Mardochaeus, going, did all things which Esther had commanded him.

LIKEWISE THE EDICT OF ARTAXERXES FOR THE LIBERATION OF THE JEWS: which our codices report in the sixteenth chapter; in the Greek exemplars it is placed a little before the end of the eighth chapter, immediately after those words, Now the sum of the epistle was this.

LIKEWISE THE DREAM OF MARDOCHAEUS, OF THE LITTLE FOUNTAIN GROWING INTO A GREAT RIVER: which among us is contained in the tenth chapter; and the rest, up to those words of the eleventh chapter, In the second year, Artaxerxes reigning, etc., are had among the Greeks at the end of the whole volume.

THE DREAM ALSO OF THE TWO DRAGONS: which is narrated from about the beginning of the eleventh chapter — that is, from those words, In the second year, Artaxerxes reigning — to the end of the twelfth chapter, has been borrowed from the first chapter of the Greek edition.

JOSEPHUS, in the eleventh book of the Hebrew Antiquities, chapter six, recites the two aforesaid epistles, or edicts, of king Artaxerxes in the same words, from head to foot, so faithfully that it is uncertain to us whether he received these from the vulgate edition of the Greeks, or whether the author of the Greek edition copied the same out of Josephus.

BUT IT COMES TO MIND in this place at once to admonish and to exhort the pious and benevolent Reader, that he not accuse me of temerity because I have removed these seven last chapters from the canonical writings and reduced them into this last order of the Apocrypha [2] — as if I had forgotten the decree of the Holy synod of Trent, which under the threat of anathema commands all the books to be received entire, as they have been accustomed to be read in the Catholic Church and are had in the old vulgate Latin edition. For that canon is to be understood of the true and genuine parts which look to the integrity of the books, not however of certain torn Appendices and ragged additions, rashly set on by some unknown author and sewn on anyhow. And of such a sort, surely, are these last chapters — which not only Hugo the Cardinal, Nicolaus of Lyra, Dionysius the Carthusian, and the other more recent interpreters deny to be canonical, but the divine Jerome also cuts them away from the whole volume of Esther as a vitiated part, and (that I may use his own words) one patched together out of ragged endings of words — out of things which could be said and heard on the spur of the moment, as scholars in the schools are wont to devise upon a theme taken up: "which words he could have used who suffered the injury, or he who did the injury." Origen also, in the epistle to Julius Africanus, hisses off these same additions. [MS note in ink beside this passage, in a cursive hand, apparently: This opinion — let it not conflict with the Council of Trent, which the author wrongly twists and interprets (Haec sententia ne repugnat Concilio Tridentino, quod autor male torquet, et interpretatur).]

THE THIRD AND FOURTH BOOKS OF ESDRAS

THE THIRD BOOK of Esdras [3] — in which almost all the same things are repeated which are narrated in the first and second volumes of Esdras — is not had among the Hebrews, but is extant only among the Greeks, distinguished into one hundred and nine chapters, or titles. But the fourth book, embracing the visions and chiefly the nocturnal dreams of Esdras himself, is neither among the Greeks nor among the Hebrews. Jerome, in the preface of that same work, rejects both among the Apocrypha, as writings as much of obscure author as of uncertain authority, and calls the things which are narrated in them dreams. The Greeks however not only receive the third book in the sacred canon, but even place it before the two legitimate and undoubted volumes of Esdras and Nehemias in the catalog of the divine scripture, for the cause which was spoken above. [4] Among whom Athanasius, writing the third book against the Arrians, brings in the testimony of Zorobabel, noted in the third chapter of this volume, as of a scripture of solid authority, against the followers of Arrius. But among the Latins, Augustine, acknowledging this same third book as genuine [a book] of Esdras, writes thus in the eighteenth [book] Of the city of God: ABOUT THE SAME time of the liberation of the people from the Babylonian servitude, Esdras also wrote — who has been held a writer of deeds rather than a Prophet; unless perhaps he is to be understood to have prophesied in this, that, a question having arisen among certain young men as to what was of most avail in things — when one had said KINGS, another WINE, the third WOMEN, which for the most part command kings — yet that same third demonstrated that truth is victorious over all things. For, the Gospel being consulted, we know that Christ is the truth. The divine Ambrose also thinks the fourth book was put forth by Esdras himself not without divine revelation, asserting that Paul the Apostle followed the opinion of Esdras in those things which, near the end of the former epistle to the Corinthians, he had written of the diverse orders of the brightness and glory of the elect rising again. And this opinion Ambrose himself received as a testimony of the weightiest authority for confirming the dogma of the dwelling-places of holy souls after their separation from the body, writing thus in the book Of the good of death: But that there are dwelling-places of souls is strongly proved by the testimonies of scripture; since in the books of Esdras also we read that, when the day of judgment shall have come, the earth shall give back the bodies of the departed, and the dwelling-places shall give back the souls which were commended to them. These are the habitations of which the lord says that there are many mansions with his father. And I have used the writings of Esdras, that [the gentiles] may know [cant →]

[1] What the Appendix of the book of Esther contains [2] This opinion of Sixtus is not to be approved, since it conflicts with the fourth session of the Council of Trent, which he himself twists so that he may not seem to conflict with it — a printed marginal annotation in the later edition, hostile to Sixtus, paralleling but distinct from the Spanish censor's manuscript note recorded below [3] The arguments of the third and fourth books of Esdras [4] What the Doctors of the Church report concerning the third and fourth books of Esdras

[→ cant] the Gentiles that those things which are admired in the books of philosophy have been translated from ours. And below he adds: WHICH was the earlier, Esdras or Plato? For Paulus followed the sayings of Esdras, not of Plato: for Esdras revealed, according to the revelation conferred upon him, that the just shall be with Christ and with the saints. Hence also that famous Socrates says that he hastens to those his own Gods. Ours, assuredly, are the things which stand supreme in the letters of the philosophers. Let us not therefore fear that end owed by all, in which Esdras found the remuneration of his devotion, the Lord saying to him: FOR THOU shalt be received up with men, and shalt converse with the residue, with my son, and with those like thee. Thus Ambrose; who also, in the second commentary on Luke, alleges out of the seventh chapter of this book a prophecy of the time of the advent of Christ, and of his death, and of the future conversion of the world to Christ. And the words of the vaticination are these: MY SON JESUS SHALL BE REVEALED, with those who shall rejoice with him, who are left, in four hundred years; and it shall be after these years, and my son Christ shall die, and the world shall be converted. Finally, in the epistle to Horontianus, which is the twenty-first in number, he persuades that the fourth book of Esdras should be read, because in it the soul is demonstrated to be of celestial substance, and the trifles of the philosophers concerning its substance are confuted. From these things it appears of how great authority this book was with Ambrose: out of which, many years before, the divine Cyprian seems to have taken what he wrote against Demetrianus — namely that the world is growing old, and is now hastening to its imminent end; and that this is easily perceived from the decrement of all things, since the powers of the elements, of plants, and of animals have been diminished and weakened, and the bodies of men especially are now smaller and feebler than they were of old. Which opinion, indeed, there is no doubt that Cyprian drew from the fifth chapter of this book, where these words are read: THE WORLD now draweth near to old age. Ask her that beareth, Wherefore they whom thou hast now brought forth are not like to those who were before thee, but lesser in stature? and she herself shall say to thee: Some there are who were born in the vigor of youth, and others who were born under the time of old age, when the womb was failing. Consider therefore thou also, that ye are of lesser stature than those who were before you, and those who come after you [shall be] lesser than you, as of creatures now growing old, and passing beyond the strength of youth. [1] The Catholic Church also venerates this book: she who, every single year, on the third day [Tuesday] of Pentecost, begins the sacrosanct mysteries of the mass from that sentence which is read in the second chapter of this volume: RECEIVE the delight of your glory, giving thanks to God, who hath called you to the celestial kingdoms [2]; and in the solemnities of martyrs she chants out of the same chapter, concerning the rewards of those who have valiantly fallen for Christ, that verse: NOW they are crowned, and receive the palm. [3] From the authority, therefore, of these witnesses and testimonies I judge it to have come about that this book was joined to the divine scriptures; which afterward, more diligently examined, the common consent of almost all the fathers judged should be held among the Apocrypha [4] — and that, as I suppose, on account of certain suspect dogmas handed down in it, which seem openly to contradict the rules of the orthodox faith. Of which sort are these:

IN THE FOURTH CHAPTER he says that the souls of the saints are detained in certain hidden store-chambers in the lower world [5], until the number of all the elect be fulfilled, and the day of the last and supreme judgment come, in which all shall be led out thence together. And in the fifth chapter, pursuing the same opinion, he likens the day of the last judgment and retribution to a crown: in which, as there is neither first nor last, but all things at once, so in the retribution of eternal felicity the swiftness of the former souls shall not outstrip the tardiness of the last, but all together, and at the same time, shall obtain the awaited beatitude. Which opinion, although the divine Ambrose, in the book already cited, seems to have approved, yet the later fathers, in the council of Florence, reproved.

LIKEWISE, chapter 6, he relates that God on the fifth day, among the other animals, created two greatest living creatures, the one called Henoch [Behemoth], the other Leviathan; whose immense masses of body since not even the seventh part of the earth could hold together in fellowship, God disjoined them in place: and he placed Henoch in one of the seven parts of the earth, in which there are a thousand mountains; but Leviathan he set in another of the seven parts of the earth, in which are all the waters which God on the third day commanded to be gathered into one place; and there he keeps him, that he may prepare food out of him for whom he will, and when he will. Which narration indeed seems to have affinity with that fable of the Jews [6] which I remember to have read of old in the Thalmudic books, in the fourth order, third tractate; in which the Rabbins write that God on the fifth day created two fishes of well-nigh boundless magnitude, called Leviathans; the vastness of whose bodies when he weighed with himself in his mind — fearing lest every kind of fish should be swallowed down by such great beasts, and lest by them the whole sea should be rendered impassable to ships, and thus the commerce of the human race be utterly taken away if offspring were propagated from them — he slew the female, and out of her salted flesh prepared most delicate salt-meats, to be eaten by the just and his elect after this life; but the male he reserved alive for himself, that he might play with him daily in six hours of the day, according to that sentence of the hundred-and-second psalm [so this edition prints — psalmi centesimi secundi; the correct citation is Psalm 103:26 (= Hebrew Ps 104:26), which the alternate edition gives as centesimi tertij, with the margin Psal. 103. 26]: THAT DRAGON, whom thou hast formed to mock him — for which the Hebrews read לויתן זה יצרת לשחק בו Leuijathan ze iatsartha lesachek bo, that is, this Leviathan, whom thou hast created, that thou mightest play with him. [In this primary scan the type is damaged just here: the Hebrew is broken and gapped, the transliteration drops the word lesachek (printing only "Leuijathan zeia-zaretha … hekuo"), and the gloss leaves a blank where eo should stand ("ut cum ■ luderes"). The complete reading given above is supplied from the alternate copy, its PDF p. 46, where the sentence prints entire and undamaged.]

LIKEWISE, in the fourteenth chapter, teaching at what time the world shall have its end [7], he hands down that the last old age of the world is at hand, and the end of mundane duration; whose whole time is divided into twelve parts: of which, since ten parts and the half of the eleventh part have already passed, nothing remains beyond, save what is left after the half of the eleventh — that is, the residue of the eleventh part, with the twelfth part, the last of all. Which things, if they were true, the world must needs have ceased a thousand five hundred years ago. For if the time which intervened from the creation of the world to Esdras contains, according to the supputation of the divine scripture, about three thousand four hundred and seventy years, and this sum of years embraces ten parts and a half of the twelve parts of the whole mundane age, it follows that the residue of time from Esdras to the end of the world should not exceed the number of 500 years; whereas nevertheless from Esdras even to the pre-[-sent] [sentem →]

[→ sentem] year MDLX, in which we write these things, almost two thousand years have flowed by. Besides these things, Jerome, in the declamation against Vigilantius, objects to Vigilantius himself that in confirmation of his heresy he brought forth a certain Apocryphal book of Esdras, in which it was written that after death no one may dare to pray for another. I suspect that the book cited by Vigilantius is this very one; because there is reported in it a certain sentence not altogether unlike that other sentence of John in the sixth chapter of the Apocalypse — from which Vigilantius, as Jerome testifies, strove to build up [the claim] that after death no one's prayer for another is to be heard; especially since John asserts that the souls of the holy martyrs, set beneath the altar of God, could not obtain even for themselves the judgment and retribution which they earnestly sought, crying with a great voice: HOW LONG, O lord, dost thou not judge and avenge our blood? — and it was said to them that they should wait until the number of their fellow-servants should be fulfilled. [1] To which place plainly very similar is another place, in the sixth chapter of this book, in which it is narrated how the souls of the saints, shut away in their store-chambers, demand of God the day of judgment and retribution, saying: HOW LONG, O lord, do we hope thus? and when shall come the fruit of our reward? [2] — and answer is made to them that they should wait until the number of the elect among them be fulfilled, and the measure of the times of the whole age be fulfilled; before whose completion their bodies are not to be raised. It is likely that Vigilantius coupled this testimony with the aforesaid authority of John, and twisted both to his own purpose. For these causes, therefore, I should believe this book was rejected by the fathers. Some also judge it to be of another Esdras than he who is the author of the first book: since this one, at the beginning of this book, writes that he descended from Aaron through nineteen generations; but that one, in the seventh chapter of his book, writes that he was begotten from Aaron through only fifteen generations.

THE APPENDIX OF THE BOOK OF JOB

THE BOOK of Job, in all the exemplars of the Greeks, as well ancient as recent, has at its very end — immediately after the last period of the volume — annexed, out of the edition of the seventy interpreters, a certain genealogy of Job and of his friends, alluding not a little to the genealogy of the sons of Esau described in the book of genesis; which is read neither in the Hebrew nor in the latin codices. Its words are these: γέγραπται δὲ αὐτὸν πάλιν ἀναστήσεσθαι μεθ' ὧν ὁ κύριος ἀνίστησιν. οὗτος ἑρμηνεύεται ἐκ τῆς συριακῆς βίβλου, ἐν μὲν γῇ κατοικῶν τῇ αὐσίτιδι, ἐπὶ τοῖς ὁρίοις τῆς ἰδουμαίας καὶ ἀραβίας. προϋπῆρχε δὲ αὐτῷ ὄνομα ἰωβάλ. λαβὼν δὲ γυναῖκα ἀράβισσαν, ἐγέννα υἱόν, ᾧ ὄνομα ἐννών. ἦν δὲ αὐτὸς πατρὸς μὲν ζαρὲ τῶν ἡσαῦ υἱῶν υἱός, μητρὸς δὲ βοσόρρας· ὥστε εἶναι αὐτὸν πέμπτον ἀπὸ Ἀβραάμ. καὶ οὗτοι οἱ βασιλεῖς οἱ βασιλεύσαντες ἐν ἐδώμ, ἧς καὶ αὐτὸς ἦρξε χώρας· πρῶτος βαλὰκ ὁ τοῦ βεώρ, καὶ ὄνομα τῇ πόλει αὐτοῦ δενναβά. μετὰ δὲ τὸν βαλὰκ ἰωβὰλ ὁ καλούμενος ἰώβ. μετὰ δὲ τοῦτον ἀσὼν, ὁ ὑπάρχων ἡγεμὼν τῆς θαιμανίτιδος χώρας. μετὰ δὲ τοῦτον ἀδὰδ υἱὸς βαδὰδ, ὁ ἐκκόψας μαδιὰν ἐν τῷ πεδίῳ μωάβ, καὶ ὄνομα τῇ πόλει αὐτοῦ γεθθαίμ. οἱ δὲ ἐλθόντες πρὸς αὐτὸν φίλοι, ἐλιφὰζ τῶν ἡσαῦ υἱῶν, θαιμανῶν βασιλεύς· βαλδὰδ ὁ σαυχαίων τύραννος· σῶφαρ ὁ μιναίων βασιλεύς. The sense of which narration, that I may render word for word, is this: Now it is written that he shall rise again with those whom the Lord raiseth up. This man is interpreted out of the Syriac book [as] dwelling in the region Ausitis, on the borders of Idumaea and Arabia; and his name before was Jobal. Taking therefore an Arabian wife, he begot a son by name Ennon. And he was himself the son, by his father, of Zare, of the sons of Esau; by his mother, of Bosorra; so that he is himself the fifth from Abraham. And these are the kings who reigned in Edom — over which region he himself also ruled: first Balach, son of Beor, and the name of his city was Dennaba; and after Balach, Jobab, who is called Job; and after these Ason, who was captain of the Thamanitid region; after him Adad, son of Badad, who smote Madian in the region of Moab, and the name of his city was Getthaim. And the friends who came to him: Eliphaz, of the sons of Esau, king of the Themanites; Baldad, tyrant of the Sauchaeans; Sophar, king of the Mynaeans. And these words, although they are extant neither among the Hebrews nor among the Latins, yet all the Greek Fathers receive them with the highest veneration, and very many even expound them diligently. There are still read — in the Greek catena of explanations on Job, which, written by hand, I keep in my own Library — various annotations upon this genealogy, by Origen, Chrysostom, Julianus, Severus, Euagrius, and Olympiodorus.

ORIGEN, at the end of the commentaries on Job, which the royal Library of the French [Bibliotheca regia Gallorum] lately sent forth into the light, after the aforesaid context of the genealogy subjoins another addition, out of the thirty-third chapter of Genesis [so printed], taken over in almost the same words; and he expounds it with a brief little annotation. The words of the addition are these: ἀπέθανε δὲ ἀδὰδ, καὶ ἐβασίλευσεν ἀντ' αὐτοῦ σαμαδὰ ἐκ μασσεκάς. ἀπέθανε δὲ σαμαδὰ, καὶ ἐβασίλευσεν ἀντ' αὐτοῦ σαοὺλ ἐκ ῥοβεὼθ τῆς παρὰ ποταμόν. ἀπέθανε δὲ σαούλ, καὶ ἐβασίλευσεν ἀντ' αὐτοῦ βαλλαενὼν υἱὸς ἀχοβώρ. ἀπέθανε δὲ βαλλαενὼν υἱὸς ἀχοβώρ, καὶ ἐβασίλευσεν ἀντ' αὐτοῦ ἀρὰδ υἱὸς βαράδ, καὶ ὄνομα τῇ πόλει αὐτοῦ φογώρ. ὄνομα δὲ τῇ γυναικὶ αὐτοῦ μετεβεήλ, θυγάτηρ ματραΐθ υἱοῦ μαιζοώβ. That is: And Adad died, and Samada of Masseca reigned in his stead. [And Samada died,] and Saul of Robooth, which is by the river, reigned in his stead. And Saul died, and Ballaenon, son of Achobor, reigned in his stead; and he being dead, Arad, son of Barad, reigned in his stead, and the name of his city was Phogor; and his wife was called Metebeel, daughter of Matraith, son of Mazoob. Then follow these things also: θεμὰν υἱὸς ἐλιφὰζ ἡγεμόνος ἰδουμαίας. οὗτος ἑρμηνεύεται ἐκ τῆς συριακῆς βίβλου, ἐν μὲν γῇ κατοικῶν αὐσίτιδι, ἐν πέρασι τοῦ εὐφράτου· προϋπῆρχε δὲ αὐτῷ ὄνομα ἰώβ, καὶ ἦν αὐτῷ πατὴρ ζαρὲ ἀπὸ ἀνατολῶν ἡλίου. That is: Theman, son of Eliphaz, captain of Idumaea. This man is interpreted out of the Syriac book [as] dwelling in the land Hussitis, within the bounds of the Euphrates; and his name before was Job, and his father was Zare, from the rising of the Sun. Thus far the Addition of the genealogy of Job; which Jerome rejects as uncertain and foreign to the Hebraic verity, writing thus in the questions upon Genesis: THE FIRSTBORN [Na- →]

[→ Na-]chor, the brother of Abraham, by Melcha his wife: of his daughter was born Huz, from whose stock Job descends — even as it is written in the exordium of his volume: THERE WAS A MAN in the land of Huz, by name Job. Wrongly, therefore, do certain men suppose Job to be of the race of Esau; since that which is had at the end of his book — namely, that it was translated out of the Syrian speech, and that he was the fourth from Esau — and the rest of the things which are contained there, are not had in the Hebrew volumes. Thus he [Jerome].

THERE IS EXTANT also, in certain ancient [Bibles] of the Latins, and in all the Bibles of the Greeks, a certain little speech [oratiuncula] of the wife of Job, expounded by well-nigh all the Greek interpreters; which Origen, in the epistle to Julius Africanus, denies to pertain to the verity of the Hebraic scripture. It is contained in the second chapter of this book, in these words: χρόνου δὲ πολλοῦ προβεβηκότος, εἶπεν αὐτῷ ἡ γυνὴ αὐτοῦ, μέχρι τίνος καρτερήσεις λέγων, ἰδοὺ, ἀναμένω χρόνον ἔτι μικρὸν, προσδεχόμενος τὴν ἐλπίδα τῆς σωτηρίας μου. ἰδοὺ γὰρ, ἠφάνισταί σου τὸ μνημόσυνον ἀπὸ τῆς γῆς. υἱοὶ καὶ θυγατέρες, ἐμῆς κοιλίας ὠδῖνες καὶ πόνοι, οὓς εἰς τὸ κενὸν ἐκοπίασα μετὰ μόχθων. σύ τε αὐτὸς ἐν σαπρίᾳ σκωλήκων κάθησαι, διανυκτερεύων αἴθριος. κἀγὼ πλανῆτις καὶ λάτρις, τόπον ἐκ τόπου περιερχομένη, καὶ οἰκίαν ἐξ οἰκίας, προσδεχομένη τὸν ἥλιον, πότε δύσεται, ἵνα ἀναπαύσωμαι τῶν μόχθων μου καὶ τῶν ὠδίνων, αἵ με νῦν συνέχουσιν. ἀλλὰ εἰπέ τι ῥῆμα πρὸς κύριον, καὶ τελεύτα.

That is: Now when much time had gone before, his wife said to him: How long wilt thou persevere, saying, Behold, I await yet a little time, receiving the hope of my salvation? For behold, thy memorial is blotted out from the earth — the sons and daughters, the pangs and labors of my womb, whom in vain I brought forth laboriously, with vexations; and thou thyself sittest in the rottenness of worms, passing the night under the open sky; and I, a wanderer and a drudge, going about from place to place and from house to house, awaiting the sun, when it shall set, that I may rest from my labors and my pangs, which now hold me fast. But speak some word against the lord, and die.

THE APPENDIX OF THE PSALTER

THERE IS EXTANT in the Greek Psalters, according to the edition of the seventy interpreters, immediately after the end, a psalm inscribed to David outside the number of the hundred and fifty psalms; of which I have hitherto been able to find some mention in no explanator of the divine scripture — whether Greek, or Hebrew, or Latin — save in the one divine Athanasius; who, in the Synopsis of the divine scripture, reviewing this psalm by name among the canonical writings, writes thus: AGAINST GOLIATH, PSALM 151. This psalm is inscribed peculiarly to David, and outside the number of the rest, when in single combat he had laid low Goliath. And the same [Athanasius], at the end of the same work, the testimony of the book of Paralipomenon being cited, adds that David put forth three thousand psalms; out of which the friends of king Ezechias selected only a hundred and fifty, but hid away the rest. And it is possible that this is one of those; which, because it is short, it has pleased [me] to insert here, as well in Greek as in Latin, together with its own inscription.

Οὗτος ὁ ψαλμὸς ἰδιόγραφος τοῦ Δαβὶδ ἐστι, καὶ ἔξωθεν τοῦ ἀριθμοῦ τῶν ἑκατὸν καὶ πεντήκοντα ψαλμῶν, ὅτε ἐμονομάχησε πρὸς τὸν Γολιάθ.

Μικρὸς ἤμην ἐν τοῖς ἀδελφοῖς μου· καὶ νεώτερος ἐν τῷ οἴκῳ πατρός μου, ἐποίμαινον τὰ πρόβατα τοῦ πατρός μου.

Αἱ χεῖρές μου ἐποίησαν ὄργανον, καὶ οἱ δάκτυλοί μου ἥρμοσαν ψαλτήριον.

Καὶ τίς ἀναγγελεῖ τῷ κυρίῳ μου; αὐτὸς κύριος, αὐτὸς εἰσακούει.

Αὐτὸς ἐξαπέστειλε τὸν ἄγγελον αὐτοῦ, καὶ ἦρέ με ἐκ τῶν προβάτων τοῦ πατρός μου, καὶ ἔχρισέ με ἐν τῷ ἐλαίῳ τῆς χρίσεως αὐτοῦ.

Οἱ ἀδελφοί μου καλοὶ, καὶ μεγάλοι, καὶ οὐκ εὐδόκησεν ἐν αὐτοῖς ὁ κύριος.

Ἐξῆλθον εἰς συνάντησιν τῷ ἀλλοφύλῳ, καὶ ἐπικατηράσατό με ἐν τοῖς εἰδώλοις αὐτοῦ.

Ἐγὼ δὲ σπασάμενος τὴν παρ' αὐτοῦ μάχαιραν, ἀπεκεφάλισα αὐτὸν, καὶ ἦρα ὄνειδος ἐξ υἱῶν Ἰσραήλ.

TRANSLATION

This psalm was written by David himself, outside the number of the hundred and fifty, when in single combat he had engaged with Goliath.

LITTLE was I among my brethren, and younger in the house of my father: I pastured the sheep of my father.

MY HANDS constructed an instrument [organum], and my fingers fitted together a psaltery.

AND WHO shall announce [it] to my lord? the lord himself — he himself hears.

HE HIMSELF sent his angel, and took me from the sheep of my father, and anointed me with the oil of his anointing.

MY BRETHREN [were] fair and great: and the lord was not well pleased in them.

I WENT OUT to meet that alien [Goliath]: and he cursed me by his idols.

BUT I, wresting from him his own sword, beheaded him, and took away the reproach from the sons of Israel.

EVTHYMIVS touched upon this Psalm in passing, in the Preface of the commentaries on the Psalms.

THE APPENDIX OF THE WISDOM OF SYRACH [the heading's italic Y is worn and prints almost as a T: "S■RACH"]

THERE IS FOUND, in almost all Latin codices, after the end of the Wisdom of Syrach, or Ecclesiasticus, a certain prayer of Salomon; which is nothing else than a fragment, or the former part, of that prayer which Salomon put forth at the dedication of the temple, copied word for word out of the eighth chapter of the third book of Kings. Which prayer, although it has a certain author, one of irrefragable credit, and is not apocryphal, yet — since it has been cut off from thence by some unknown author, lopped like a limb from its proper body, and has been added into this place superfluously and rashly, against the credit of the Hebrew and Greek exemplars — it has pleased [me] to cast it back among the apocryphal additions. It is likely that the adder of this fragment, whoever he was, added to this volume just so many lines out of the aforesaid prayer of Salomon as would suffice to fill up the space which, on the last [leaf], as gener-[-ally]

THE LITTLE PREFACE OF THE LAMENTATIONS OF JEREMIAS

THE LITTLE PREFACE of the Threni [Lamentations], which the Latin codices carry before the beginning of the Lamentations of Jeremias, is not among the Hebrews; who begin this book — written throughout in a fourfold alphabet [four alphabetic acrostics] — from the word אכה [so printed, lacking the yod of איכה] Eca, that is, How, commencing from א Aleph, the first letter of the Hebrew Alphabet; and from this word they name the book אכה Ecà. But the other words which are read before this word were added, as is believed by many, by the seventy interpreters, wishing to connect the lamentation of the devastated city with the narration of the devastation of the same city, which is described at the close of the book of Jeremias. Now these are the words of this preface among the seventy interpreters: Καὶ ἐγένετο μετὰ τὸ αἰχμαλωτισθῆναι τὸν ἰσραὴλ, καὶ ἱερουσαλὴμ ἐρημωθῆναι, ἐκάθισεν ἱερεμίας κλαίων, καὶ ἐθρήνησε τὸν θρῆνον τοῦτον ἐπὶ ἱερουσαλὴμ, καὶ εἶπεν — that is: And it came to pass, after Israel was brought into captivity, and Hierusalem was made desert, Jeremias sat weeping, and wailed this lamentation over Hierusalem, and said. The Hebrews do not receive this argument, because it does not seem to them likely that Jeremias wrote, or saw in the spirit, these Threni after the destruction of Hierusalem, but before the destruction: for it is a prophecy. Whence they also hand down that king Joachim read these Threni before the overthrow of the city; and, some verses out of them having been read, cast the book into the fire: which the prophet a little afterward wrote out again much more copiously; even as he himself testifies in the 36th chapter of his own prophecy.

THE THIRD BOOK OF MACCABEES

THE THIRD BOOK of Maccabees [1] — whose argument is the marvelous and ever-memorable liberation of the Jews, whom, bound in troops with chains, Ptolemaeus Philopater, fourth king of Egypt, exposed in the Hippodrome of the city of Alexandria, to be trampled down by maddened elephants — is utterly unknown to the Hebrews; although Josephus, in the second volume against Apion, touched briefly, in passing and quite summarily, on the sum of this history. Yet it is had everywhere in almost all the codices of the Greeks, and even in very many volumes of the Latins. Athanasius makes mention of this book in the Synopsis; and Eusebius in the chronicles: which [book] Clemens, the third Roman pontiff after Peter, in the book of the apostolic canons, canon 84, had long before numbered among the canonical books. There are those who judge it to have been put forth by Josephus, from the similarity of the style. But the things which are narrated in it were done before those which are reported in the first and second books of Maccabees, by almost fifty years — that is, under Antiochus the great, most friendly to the Jews, about the year from the founding of the world three thousand seven hundred and thirty-eight [ter millesimum septingentesimum trigesimum octauum]; and it pertains not at all to the history of the Maccabees, although they [these copies] carry its inscription. The beginning of the book is: Ὁ δὲ Φιλοπάτωρ μαθὼν παρὰ τῶν ἀνακομισθέντων τὴν γενομένην τῶν ὑπ' αὐτοῦ κρατουμένων τόπων ἀφαίρεσιν ὑπὸ Ἀντιόχου — that is: But Philopater, learning from those who had returned that the places which he himself had held had been taken away, Antiochus [being the taker] [as printed in the italic Latin: At Philopater, cognoscens ex his, qui redierant, locos, quos ipse tenuerat, Antiochum abstulisse — "But Philopater, learning from those who had returned that Antiochus had taken away the places which he himself had held"].

THE FOURTH BOOK OF MACCABEES

THE FOURTH [book] of Maccabees, [2] which the Synopsis of Athanasius reviews among the apocryphal writings, contains a history of one-and-thirty years — that is, the deeds of Joannes Maccabaeus, who from the conquered Hyrcanus received the surname of Hyrcanus. He, after his father Simon had been slaughtered by the fraud of Ptolemaeus, obtained the pontificate of his nation together with the principate; and immediately led out an army against his father's striker-down. Then he joined a league with Antiochus, king of Syria; upon whose death he took many cities of Syria by force. First of all the captains of the Jews, he hired foreign soldiery at his own pay [3]: he dug out three thousand talents from the sepulcher of David. He renewed the league with the Romans, already entered upon by his father: he routed Antiochus Cizygenus [Cyzicenus], king of Syria, conquered in war: Samaria, the rival of the city of Hierosolyma, captured after a whole year of siege, he leveled to the ground; and, torrents having been led into it, he removed by the flooding of the waters even the very ruins of the destroyed city, and all its traces: the walls of Hierosolyma, collapsed with age, he restored. Which things happily accomplished, he dies in the thirty-first year of his rule — a man most illustrious under a threefold name, that is, in priesthood, in principate, and in prophecy — namely in the hundredth year before the birth of Christ. In which [year] the fourth and last book of Maccabees leaves off: whose beginning, out of a Greek codex which we read at Lyons, written by hand, in the Library of Sanctes Pagninus, a most learned man, among the preachers [the Dominicans], runs thus: Καὶ μετὰ τὸ ἀποκτανθῆναι τὸν Σίμωνα ἐγενήθη Ἰωάννης υἱὸς αὐτοῦ ἀρχιερεὺς ἀντ' αὐτοῦ — that is: And after Simon was slain, Joannes his son was made high priest in his stead. The series of the history and the narration is almost the same as that in Josephus, in the thirteenth book of the Antiquities; but the style, abounding in Hebraic idioms, is far unlike. It is likely that this [book] was translated by an unknown interpreter out of the book of the days of the priesthood of Joannes; of which, at the close of the first of Maccabees, it is written thus: [4] THE REST of the discourses of Joannes, and of his wars, and of the good virtues in which he bore himself bravely, and of the building of the walls which he erected, and of his deeds — behold, these are written in the book of the days of his priesthood and principate.

From these things it is gathered, not obscurely, that they are deceived who think the fourth book of Maccabees to be that one in which Josephus described the agony of the Maccabee mother and of her seven sons; which also is had in some Bibles of the Greeks, with the inscription ἰωσίππου εἰς τοὺς μακκαβαίους [of Josippus (Josephus), On the Maccabees].

THE FIRST PARTITION OF THE BOOKS OF THE DIVINE SCRIPTURE

THE FIRST PARTITION of the books of the divine scripture — pertaining as well to the first as to the second order of the sacred canon — was dissected by the divine Augustine, in the second book Of Christian doctrine, into two sections: the one of the old, the other of the new testament. Of which the former contains the four-and-forty old books, distinguished into two classes, that is, the Historical and the Prophetical; the latter contains the eight books of the new testament.

Now indeed run through the mysteries of the new law.

Matthaeus gave to the Hebrews the miracles of Christ;

Marcus wrote for Italy; for thee, Graecia, Lucas:

heaven-wandering Joannes scattered his writings for all [Caeliuagus — the italic type could also be read Calinagus; caelivagus, "sky-wandering," renders the Greek οὐρανοφοίτης*].*

Joined to these, thou shalt presently discern the famous apostolic deeds.

Next number the twice-seven little books of Paul;

the seven Catholic [epistles], among which the first is of Jacobus, and the twin ones of Peter: then follow the three of Joannes;

seventh after these succeeds the epistle of Jude.

They will hardly be legitimate, if any writings be carried about outside these.

THE SECOND PARTITION OF ALL THE BOOKS OF HOLY SCRIPTURE

THE SECOND PARTITION of all the books of holy Scripture — pertaining as well to the first as to the second order of the sacred canon — was distinguished by the scholastics into two Sections: the one of the old, the other of the new testament; of which each is digested into four classes of volumes, that is, into the Legal, Historial, Sapiential, and Prophetal books.

OF THE BOOKS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT — SECTIO PRIMA

Legal books, five.		Sapiential books, five.
1	Genesis	23	Proverbia
2	Exodus	24	Ecclesiastes
3	Leviticus	25	Cantica
4	Numeri	26	Sapientia
5	Deuteronomion	27	Ecclesiasticus
Historial books, XVII.		Prophetal books, XVII.
6	Josue	28	David
7	Judicum	29	Esaias
8	Ruth	30	Hieremias with the Threni, & Baruch
9	Regum primus	31	Ezechiel
10	Regum secundus	32	Daniel
11	Regum tertius	33	Oseas
12	Regum quartus	34	Joël
13	Paralipomenon primus	35	Amos
14	Paralipomenon secundus	36	Abdias
15	Esdras primus	37	Jonas
16	Esdras secundus	38	Michaeas
17	Tobias	39	Nahum
18	Judith	40	Abacuch

Legal books, five.		Sapiential books, five.
19	Esther	41	Sophonias
20	Job	42	Aggaeus
21	Maccabaeorum primus	43	Zacharias
22	Maccabaeorum secundus	44	Malachias

THE SECOND SECTION, OF ALL THE BOOKS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT, digested into the same four Classes

LEGAL, FOUR BOOKS; that is: Matthaeus, Marcus, Lucas, Joannes.

HISTORIAL, ONE BOOK; that is: The Acts of the Apostles.

SAPIENTIAL, TWO BOOKS; that is: The fourteen epistles of Paul the Apostle, The seven Catholic epistles.

PROPHETAL, ONE BOOK; that is: The Apocalypse of Joannes.

[→ HÆC] THESE THINGS, in sum, we have had to say concerning the holy scriptures comprehended in the vulgate codex of the Bibles; hereafter, in the following book, we shall narrate the writers and writings which are cited by the divine authors of the sacred volumes — concerning which Origen, in the first homily on the Canticle of Canticles, writes thus: IT IS LABORIOUS, if we should wish to inquire how great a commemoration of many books is made in the divine scriptures, of which no reading at all has been handed down to you; nay, not even among the Jews have we found the use of readings of this kind. Which [books] — whether because they contained some things above human intelligence, it pleased the holy spirit to take them out of the midst; or because they were of those scriptures which are called Apocrypha, inasmuch as many things are found in them corrupted, and handed down by the elders against the true faith — it did not please them that place be given them, nor that they be admitted to authority. It is above us to pronounce concerning such things. Yet this is manifest: that many examples have been brought forth, whether by the Apostles or by the Evangelists, and inserted into the new testament, which we never read in these scriptures which we hold canonical; yet they are found in the Apocrypha, and are evidently shown to have been taken up out of them. Thus far the words of Origen; with which it is fitting to set an end to the present book.

BIBLIOTHECA SANCTA — BOOK II

Of the books, writers, and writings of which mention is made in the holy volumes

English translation — Bibliotheca Sancta, Book II

Note on the Latin sources. This English version is drawn from two copies of Sixtus's Bibliotheca Sancta. The front matter and pages 6–108 were translated from the 1586 Cologne edition (Maternus Cholinus), which carries few marginal notes; the marginal glosses were then supplied from a second, more heavily annotated copy of the same work. From page 109 onward the translation is made directly from that margin-rich copy. The printed leaf- and page-numbers in both copies are frequently misprinted, so pages are aligned by content and scan sequence rather than by the printed folios.

LIBER SECVNDVS — BOOK TWO

OF F. SIXTUS OF SIENA, OF THE ORDER OF PREACHERS: THE SECOND BOOK OF THE HOLY LIBRARY — of the books, writers, and writings of which mention is made in the holy volumes

PREFACE

IN THE FIRST volume of this work we reviewed the number, order, partition, authority, authors, and arguments of all the books of the divine scripture: now, in this second book, we are going to collect the volumes, books, writers, and writings — all of them, extant and not extant, as well undoubted as doubtful and uncertain — which are commemorated here and there by the authors in the sacrosanct Bibles. Now these are distinguished from one another by a threefold discrimination: by collection, by understanding, and by authority. And first, according to the division which arises from collection — that is, from the various modes of collecting — all the scriptures which we have gathered together here are divided into the Transcribed, the Abridged, and the Alleged [in Transcriptas, Abbreuiatas, & Allegatas].

THE TRANSCRIBED are those which have been faithfully copied out of other more ancient writings; and, just as they had once been put forth by their own authors, have been inserted word for word into the sacred letters: such as are the many epistles of the kings and princes of the Assyrians, Medes, Persians, Egyptians, Greeks, Romans, Jews, and other nations, which have been mingled into the divine volumes for the completion of the sacrosanct history.

THOSE SCRIPTURES ARE CALLED ABRIDGED which — since they had earlier been written by their own authors with a profuse abundance of speech, and extended into many volumes — were afterward contracted into a compendium by the divine writers, and fitted in among the holy books. Such, it is established, are the 5000 books of the Canticles of Salomon; the 3000 books of his Parables; and also his immense work of Natural disputations; the 3000 Psalms of David, which the divine Athanasius affirms to be cited in the books of Paralipomenon; the four-and-two-hundred [204] books of Esdras; the commentaries of Nehemias; the Volumes of the histories of Samuel, and of Nathan and Gad the prophets; the Divinations of Ahias the Silonite; the Vaticinations of Iddo the prophet; the discourses of Chozai, and of Semeias, and of Jehu [Hieu] the prophets; the Books of the days of the kings of Juda and of Israel; the Descriptions of Jeremias; the Com[mentaries] of Judas Maccabaeus [Com. Iudae Maccabaei, so abbreviated]; the Ephemeri-[-des]

[→ das] the Ephemeri-des of the priesthood of Joannes [Hyrcanus]; the 5 books of the histories of Jason of Cyrene; and many other volumes of this kind — out of whose fountains chiefly the greatest part of those things which are now had in the sacrosanct letters is believed to have been drawn.

THOSE SCRIPTURES ARE CALLED ALLEGED [Allegatae] of which, in the divine books, either the authors' names alone, or only the titles of the books, are commemorated; or only the arguments of the works are touched upon most briefly; or at least some testimonies out of them are cited and alleged: such as are the Book of Henoch, the Book of the wars of the lord, the Book of the Just, the Book of the words of the ancients, the Annals of the kings of the Persians & Medes, the Commentaries of Assuerus, the Commentaries of Cyrus, the sacred Books of the Spartans, the Phaenomena of Aratus, the poems of Callimachus, the [work] of Epimenides on oracles, the comedies of Menander, and very many other most ancient monuments of antiquity like to these: all of which, together with countless others of the writings of various nations, partly the injury of time consumed, partly the incursions of barbarians and the madness of tyrants destroyed, in the overthrows of kingdoms — and above all in the very destruction of the holy city, in which so many thousand volumes of that sacrosanct Library of Hierosolyma were burnt up, first by the Assyrians, then by the Greeks, and last of all by the Romans.

MOREOVER, the second division of the scriptures, taken from their understanding and sense, contains two varieties of scriptures: namely, the Historical, and the Mystical or Symbolic.

THOSE ARE NAMED HISTORICAL which signify only the order of things done or written; or in which, beyond the historical knowledge, nothing of a more secret or symbolic sense needs to be searched out for the understanding of them. Of this number are very many epistles of the princes and kings of the Chaldaeans, Egyptians, Jews, and Romans, inserted into the sacred books: in which only the outer sense of the letter is to be regarded.

MYSTICAL AND SYMBOLIC are those which, under visible or imaginary symbolic images and showings of books, volumes, codices, and scriptures of every kind, represent hidden and sublime mysteries: such as the Sealed Book, the Rolled-up Book, the Flying Book, the Book of life, the Book of the life of the Lamb, the book of the seven seals, the Volume of the book written within and without, the Devoured Book, the Book of the memorial, the Book of the divine repudiation [bill of divorce], the Book of death, the Scripture of the two woods, the Killing Letter, the Handwriting of the decree [chirographum decreti], the Adamantine Scripture, the Epistle of Christ, the Scripture of the house of Israel, and many other writings of this kind: into which, unless thou look through to the mystical and latent senses, thou shalt understand nothing at all.

THE THIRD DIVISION of the scriptures is distributed into the Undoubted, the Apocryphal, and the Pseudepigraphal writings.

UNDOUBTED [Indubitata] are those which it is most certainly established to be of those by whose names and titles they are entitled: as the Scripture of king Ezechias [Hezekiah, Isa. 38], the prophecy of Agur [Prov. 30], the Institutes of Samuel [1 Kings 10:25], the Epistle of the apostolic Council [Acts 15], and very many such, which — with the names of their authors prefixed — have been mingled into the sacred volumes.

APOCRYPHAL, that is, obscure and ambiguous, are those concerning whose authors and authority there is doubt, or concerning whom it is disputed whether they ought to be attributed to the writers who are mentioned in the sacred letters: as the Gospel of the Hebrews, the gospel of Bartholomaeus, the Mass of Jacobus the apostle, the three books of Hermas — that is, the Pastor, the Church, the Similitudes; the epistle of Barnabas, the vaticinations of Heldad and Medad, the epistles of Clement, the prayer of Joseph, the Canons of the Apostles, the Testament of the 12 patriarchs, the preaching of Peter, the altercation of Jason and Papiscus, and very many other volumes of this kind — inscribed with [the names of] men celebrated as illustrious in the divine scripture; which are also called Ecclesiastical, for this reason, namely, that in the beginning of the nascent church they were read publicly in the temples and in the common assemblies of Christians for the edification of the people, and were taken up in the writings of the ancient Doctors for the instruction of morals, and sometimes also for the confirmation of the faith.

PSEUDEPIGRAPHAL, that is, falsely entitled, are those which divers heretics — under the name of men as much illustrious as obscure, whom the divine letters name here and there — maliciously feigned, that out of their counterfeit titles they might win credit and authority for their errors: of which sort are the Books of Seth the son of Noe [so printed; Seth was son of Adam — apparently a misprint for filii Adae], the Scripture of Cham the son of Noe, the revelation of Abraham, the ascension of Moses, the volume of Jamnes and Mambres, the Apocalypse of Elias, the ascension of Esaias, the incantations of Salomon, the books of Jesus Christ concerning hidden wisdom, to Peter and Paul, the rapture of Paul, the acts of Pilate, the gospel of Judas Iscariot, and the rest of the execrable inventions of impiety of this kind.

ALL THESE KINDS, therefore, of writers and of writings I have determined to fit together in the present volume under the alphabetical order of the letters (since no more convenient plan of arranging the work presented itself): and to indicate the authors, arguments, occasions, and times of the writings of every single kind whatsoever; and to explain very many places in them that are obscure, clearly and briefly, as far as it can be done.

[Α΄ καὶ → — the catchword is a Greek mark opening the alphabetical catalog; the letter-A section begins on the next leaf.]

(printed p. 37 [PDF p. 50], recto — the alphabetical catalog of Book II begins with letter A: Alpha & Omega, Abacuk, Abraham, Adam, and the Adamantine Scripture. Running head: LIBER SECVNDVS.)

Α καὶ Ω — ALPHA, AND OMEGA — is one of the sacred surnames of our lord Jesus Christ [1], by which indeed he himself calls himself, in the beginning and at the end of the Revelations of Joannes [2], saying: Ἐγώ εἰμι τὸ Α, καὶ τὸ Ω, that is, I AM the Alpha itself, and the Omega itself. Tertullian, in the book Of the prescriptions of heretics, relates that Marcus and Colarbasus, heretics, took occasion from this place to devise a new heresy upon the Greek Alphabet: for these men said that no truth at all is found without these letters [3] — nay, that the whole plenitude and perfection of truth is disposed in the numbers which these letters signify; and for this cause also they affirmed that Christ had pronounced I AM α & ω, that by this saying he might provoke us to search out the most hidden mysteries of divine things, which are concluded in the several letters of the Alphabet and in the numbers of the letters. Epiphanius, in the book Anchoratus, judges that by the figures of these letters is signified the twofold nature of Christ — namely, by the A, which is open below, the human nature; but by the Ω, which is open above, the divine Word. [4] Origen, in Tome 1 on John, writes many things concerning the mystical signification of each letter, which, consulting brevity, I pass over. The true interpretation of this name is that which Christ himself in the same place gives, saying: I AM α & ω*, the beginning and the end.* For by these letters he compares or expresses himself [5]; because, as α is the beginning of all the elements, and ω the end and terminus, so he alone is the beginning whom none precedes, and the end without end whom no end succeeds; the beginning also of all things, from whom are all, and the end for whose sake all things were created; and likewise the terminus to which all things tend and aspire, and in which at last all things rest.

ABACVK [Habakkuk], Apocryphal — Athanasius reviews in the Synopsis, indicating (if I mistake not) a certain hidden prophecy, of which Epiphanius also makes mention in the life of Abakuk; or perhaps a history which Abakuk — not he who is placed among the twelve prophets, but another, of the tribe of Levi, son of Iuda — wrote concerning Daniel the priest, son of Abda. See above, in Book 1, in the Appendix of Daniel the prophet.

THE APOCALYPSE OF ABRAHAM — the Sethian heretics invented, as Epiphanius writes in the first [book] of the Panarion. Origen, in homily 35 on Luke, takes a testimony from a certain apocryphal scripture of Abraham, in which are brought in angels of iniquity and of justice, disputing about the salvation and the destruction of Abraham. In the Synopsis of Athanasius, a book which is called the ASSUMPTION OF ABRAHAM is enumerated among the rejected books. There is reported among the Hebrews a book under the name of Abraham the patriarch, whose title is יצירה Iezirà [Yetzirah], that is, OF CREATION; which not a few learned men assign to Rabbi Akiba.

ACHIAS THE SHILONITE — or אחיה השילוני, Achiiah ha-Shiloni [printed Asceloni], of the tribe of Iuda, sprung from Silo, where once had been the tabernacle and the ark of the Lord — he is that same prophet who, to Jeroboam, prefect of Salomon, going out from Hierusalem, met [him] on the way [6]; and, his new cloak (in which the prophet himself went clothed) being torn, and ten parts of it given to Jeroboam, prophesied that not long after it would come to pass that the kingdom of Salomon — who, having forsaken his God, had worshipped the idols of his harlots — would be rent into twelve tribes; of which ten, the empire of Roboam son of Salomon being cast off, would attach themselves to Jeroboam as king; whose whole family and entire progeny God, after some years, would utterly overthrow for his sins. This prophet, therefore, wrote of the deeds done by king Salomon one book, of which the second book of the sacred annals makes mention in the ninth chapter [2 Par. 9]. [7] He lived in Silo, and there ended his day; and not far from a huge oak which was in that place he obtained a sepulcher, in the year from the founding of the world 2990 [bis millesimo nongentesimo nonagesimo; printed hongentesimo]. The Hebrews hand down that this man was most long-lived, and say that he was one of the seven men who were the continuers of the whole of human life; concerning which matter, see below in [the entry] Helias.

THE GENEALOGY OF ADAM — or ספר תולדת אדם, Sepher Tholdoth Adam, that is, the Book of the generations of Adam; or, as the seventy interpreters rendered it, βίβλος γενέσεως ἀνθρώπων, that is, the Book of the generation of men — the same which is the enumeration, or catalog, of the posterity of Adam, set down by Moses in the fifth chapter of Genesis [8]; in which thou shalt observe two things. First, that in it the generations which are from Adam through Cain down to Noe are passed over in silence, as reprobate and unworthy to be inscribed in the sacred volumes and preserved in the memory of men. [9] But the genealogy from Adam through Seth down to Noe is described entire, because from this holy stock descend Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, the progenitors of Christ Jesus, who is the end of all scripture. Secondly, thou shalt note that the translation of the LXX interpreters, in computing the years of those who are contained in this catalog, is opposed to the Hebrew scripture: for whereas Moses, in it, reckons from Adam down to the flood only 1656 years, the seventy interpreters superadd 786 years [so printed — but 1656 + 786 = 2442, whereas the total is next given as 2242, which would require an addition of only 586; the printed figures are inconsistent], so that the sum of years from Adam down to the flood is 2242. From which diversity of computations arose the controversy concerning the reckoning of the years of the world between the Hebrews and the Greeks. [10] For the Hebrews number, from the founding of the world down to Christ, 3954 years; but the Greeks and Latins, 5199 years. But concerning this we shall speak somewhat more fully in the fifth book of this work, when we shall have come to the annotations on the fifth chapter of the book of Genesis.

THE REVELATION OF ADAM — which Adam himself saw, when God sent a sleep upon him, the Gnostic heretics first of all devised, as Epiphanius is author in the first [book] of the Panarion. Augustine, against Faustus, writes that the Manichaeans attached [to Adam] a book concerning the Genealogy, or the sons and daughters of Adam; which Gelasius, in the fifteenth distinction — together with another book, which is called the Penitence of Adam — enumerates among the damned scriptures.

THE ADAMANTINE SCRIPTURE — concerning this Jeremias speaks in these words: THE SIN of Iuda is written with a pen of iron, with a point of adamant [diamond], graven upon the table of their heart, and on the horns of their altars [11]. The irremissible sin, of which the prophet here speaks, is not only idolatry, but the death of Christ and the putting to flight of the apostles [12]; which sin [-tum → peccatum]

[1] A & Ω, one of the surnames of Christ the Lord [2] Apoc. 1:8 & 22:13 [3] Certain heretics thought that no truth can be found without the letters of the Greek alphabet [4] The twofold nature of Christ the Lord is signified by the letters A & Ω [5] Why Christ the Lord expressed himself by the letters A & Ω [6] 3 Kings 11:29-31 [7] Achias wrote a book of the deeds done by Salomon; 2 Par. 9:29 [8] Gen. 5 [9] The generations from Adam through Cain down to Noe are passed over as reprobate [10] Whence arose the disagreement between Hebrews and Greeks about the reckoning of the years of the world [11] Jer. 17:1 [12] The irremissible sin in Jeremias is the killing of Christ and the putting to flight of the Apostles

(printed p. 38 [PDF p. 51], verso — pagination back on track (37→38). The Adamantine Scripture concludes; the Gospel of the Egyptians; and the long entry on the Wisdom of the Egyptians. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

[→ tum] which [sin] is remitted neither in this world nor in the world to come, as concerns certain obstinate pharisees. Now it is said to be "Written" in a threefold manner. [1] First, in the heart of the Jews, because that sin of hatred against Christ and his cross sits very deeply in their most tenacious, hard, and impenitent heart. For even unto this present day the cross is a scandal to the Jews, and they curse it, approving the sin of their fathers. Secondly, it is said to be "Written on the horns of the altar," because the sin of idolatry had so settled in the hearts of the Jews that, as often as they stood by the altars, they exasperated God; for still the love of idols and of the high places sat in their minds, and only from fear did they abstain from worshipping them, and they longed rather to serve vain idols than the true God. So also now, in their synagogues and rites, the sin is "on the horns of the altars," for this reason: that the memory of the slain Christ is pleasing to them, and their inborn hatred still clings to the mind, and is as it were fresh in the hand; and by recollecting the ancient abominations of their fathers they delight themselves, blaspheming Christ in their prayers, and imprecating dire execrations upon Christians — though vain and without any effect. Thirdly, it is "Written with a point of adamant," that is, in the eternal memory of God, engraved in an indelible kind of writing; and the punishment of that very sin is incised, in perennial sculpture, in the immovable determination of the divine will.

THE GOSPEL OF THE EGYPTIANS — or According to the Egyptians — was in use among the Valentinian heretics. Clement of Alexandria, in the third [book] of the Stromata, refuted certain testimonies which, out of this work, Julius Cassianus and other followers of Valentinus brought to the confirmation of their dogmas. Epiphanius, in the second book of the Panarion, testifies that the Sabellians attempted, out of this gospel, to build up that the person of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit is one and the same.

THE WISDOM OF THE EGYPTIANS — in Hebrew חכמת מצרים, Chochemath Mizrijm; in Greek Σοφία Αἰγυπτίων. This Stephen the protomartyr, in the Acts of the apostles, attributed to Moses, the leader of the Jews, for great praise, saying: AND MOSES WAS LEARNED in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, and was mighty in works and in words [Acts 7:22]. The Wisdom of the Egyptians, Diodorus, Diogenes Laertius, Iamblichus, Philo the Jew, and Eusebius of Caesarea indicate to have been divided into four parts, namely into the Mathematical, the Natural, the Divine, and the Moral. [2]

Now the Mathematical — which is distinguished into Geometry, Astronomy, Arithmetic, and Music — the ancient Egyptians exercised very greatly. For they cultivated Geometry out of necessity: since they especially had need of it, when, the bounds of the fields being disturbed as the Nile rose, after the river had returned into its own bed, each man's own [land] had to be restored to him; nor could the measurement of the fields hold good by any other means than by employing that [art] which, grown together out of fixed principles, could not deceive skilled measurers. Geometry, therefore, is so named as though [it were] "the measure of the earth." [3] To Astronomy they gave themselves for [this] advantage: that — since they always had serene nights, and beheld the tract of heaven lying widely open, disturbed by no clouds and no mists [4] — they could easily observe the risings, settings, progressions, and regressions of the stars; which thing was both most delightful for knowledge, and most fruitful for life, and worthy of the exercise of human wit. To these two arts, Geometry and Astronomy, was added Arithmetic, the knowledge of numbers — serving, as it were, both, and by whose ministry these two cannot go without. [5] But Music they only tasted, so far as seemed to them enough for chanting the praises of the gods, and of kings, and of heroes.

THE SECOND part of Egyptian Wisdom — which handles the principles, causes, elements, and works of natural things, called Physics — differs not much from the Peripatetic philosophy. [6] For they too lay down that Matter is the principle of all things, and out of it thereafter the four distinct elements, from which all mixed things and living creatures arise; that Heaven is round, after the likeness of a sphere; that all the Stars have a certain fiery heat, by whose tempered commixtures all things upon the earth are born; that the Planets, or wandering stars, have their own souls; that rains come to be from the mutations of the air; and likewise very many other things similar to these.

THE THIRD part of this Wisdom, embracing the divine [matters], which is called Theology, has divers dogmas [7]: namely, that the World is begotten, and by its own nature mortal; that Men, in the first origin of all things, were first produced in Egypt — partly because of the temperateness of the climate, partly because of the Nile (for the region is oppressed neither by wintry colds nor by the ardors of the summer Sun, and the land is so fruitful by the irrigation of the Nile that no land is more fertile for the supply of nourishments); that the Human soul is perennial, and migrates from body into body; that God is one, the father and prince of all the gods, but that from him [come] the other gods, and that the Sun and the Moon are gods — the one called Osiris, the other Isis; that Temples, moreover, and statues are to be fabricated for the divers gods with divers images, because the true image of the gods is unknown; that Many of the gods were at first mortal men, but afterward, on account of their virtues and the outstanding benefits conferred upon men, attained divinity, and were honored by men with divine honors; that Images of animals — engraved by the leaders and emperors of the Egyptians upon their helmets and shields, and wont to be borne in battle against the enemy — [these], victory being thereafter obtained, they referred among the gods: the animals whose effigies the victorious leaders had borne, as though by them they had repelled the onset of war from the enemy.

THE EGYPTIAN THEOLOGIANS ALSO HAD a certain peculiar kind of writing, mystical and secret [8], in which they hid the more sublime mysteries of Theology and of divine worship, which they were above all unwilling to have divulged. Concerning which matter Clement, speaking in the fifth book of the Stromata, distinguishes the whole sum of Egyptian writing by a threefold discrimination: namely, into the Ἐπιστολογραφική, that is, the Epistolary, apt for writing common letters; into the Ἱερογραμματική, that is, the Sacerdotal, which they use who write of sacred things; and into the Ἱερογλυφική, that is, the Sacred, which is engraved. [9] Of which last there are indeed two kinds: the one Κυριολογική, that is, Properly-speaking, which is written by the letters themselves and the alphabetic elements, but with mystical and figured words; as, for example, "the Ibis partakes of the beauty of the Hawk from the Scarab" — that is, the Moon partakes of the beauty of God from the Sun, namely light, which is the image of the divine beauty. [10] But the other [kind is] Συμβολική, that is, Symbo-[lic]

[1] The sin of the Jews who killed Christ is said to be written in a threefold manner [2] The wisdom of the Egyptians was divided into four parts [3] The Egyptians cultivated Geometry [4] The sky in Egypt is disturbed by no clouds [5] Arithmetic serves Geometry and Astronomy [6] The part of Egyptian wisdom called Physics differs not much from Peripatetic philosophy [7] The theological dogmas of the Egyptians [8] The Egyptian theologians had a peculiar kind of writing [9] Egyptian writing is threefold: epistolary, sacerdotal, and sacred [10] What the "properly-speaking" writing was among the Egyptians

[→ lica], that is, Symbo-lic, or signifying by signs: which is threefold — namely, the Imitative, the Tropical, and the Aenigmatic. [1] Of which the Imitative is that which designates things by characters very like the things themselves: as they who wish to write "the Sun" draw a circle; and, wishing to signify "the Moon," they paint the image of two lunar horns. The Tropical, or Translative, is that which transfers the various forms and figures of divers things — especially of animals — to signify the dignities, fortunes, manners, virtues, vices, affections, and actions either of gods or of men. According to which signification, among the Egyptian theologians, the image of a Hawk signifies God; the figure of a Scarab, the Sun; the picture of an Ibis, the Moon; the form of a Man, prudence and skill; a Lion, fortitude; a Horse, liberty; a Crocodile, shamelessness; a Fish, hatred. [2] The Aenigmatic is that which results from the conjunction and mutual mingling of these images — in which manner the Sphinx, an image composed of a human head and a lion's body, is engraved upon temples, altars, and other sacred things, to signify that all divine things are to us aenigmatic and obscure. [3] The Sun stamped upon a Crocodile — which is nourished no less in water than on land — signifies that the Sun, after the likeness of the Crocodile, takes its nourishment for the meteoric things partly from water, partly from earth. The royal Scepter, upon whose top an eye and an ear stand, signifies God moderating, seeing, and hearing all things. They report that with this symbolic kind of writing the Scythians also were delighted [4]; whose king Idanthyras — as Pherecydes the Syrian relates — when king Darius, having crossed the river Ister, threatened war by letters and the devastation of the region unless the Scythians should obey him, sent back to him, in place of letters, a symbol: a mouse, a frog, a bird, an arrow [iaculum], a plough. And when, as was fitting, a doubt had arisen concerning these things, Orontopagas, a tribune of the soldiers, said that they [the Scythians] would deliver their empire to Darius — [reading] habitations out of the mouse, waters out of the frog, air out of the bird, arms out of the arrow, and fields out of the plough. But Xyphodres, interpreting to the contrary, said: *Unless forthwith, like the birds, we fly away; or, like the mice, go under the earth; or, like the frogs, enter the water — we shall not escape their arrows [iacula]; but their fields, being slain, we shall fatten, or, being taken and sent under the yoke, we shall cleave with the plough.* [5]

THE FOURTH and last part of Egyptian Wisdom looks to morals and to the political manner of living; whose laws and institutes Laertius refers to Mercurius — whom the Greeks called Trismegistus, that is, Thrice-greatest, because he was both a greatest philosopher, and a greatest priest, and a greatest king. Under whose name there now are extant two Dialogues, the Pimander and the Asclepius; in which he brought forth so many oracles worthy of admiration concerning God, the Trinity, the advent of Christ, and the last judgment, that he seems not a philosopher only, but a prophet foreknowing things to come. [6] Iamblichus, in the book Of the mysteries of the Egyptians, relates that this Mercurius was the author and prince not only of philosophy, but of the whole of Egyptian Wisdom; and he produces the testimony of Seleucus and of Manetho [Menetus], ancient authors, asserting that he wrote, concerning the whole wisdom of the Egyptians, thirty-six thousand five hundred and twenty-five books [36,525]; in which are reviewed, part by part, Of the empyrean gods a hundred books, Of the aethereal gods a hundred books, Of the celestial gods [→] a thousand books. [7] Of which the most part have been translated out of the Egyptian tongue into Greek by men not unskilled in Philosophy; and for this cause they seem written in the Greek style. Of these, Clement, in the sixth [book] of the Stromata, writes that in his own age there were extant among the Egyptians the books written below — that is: Of the whole philosophy of the Egyptians, thirty-three books; Of medicine, six books; Of the sacerdotal [matters], ten; Of astrology, four books.

AND LET THESE THINGS have been said concerning the Wisdom of the Egyptians; in which Philo, in the first book Of the life of Moses, affirms that Moses was most fully instructed [8], writing thus: MOSES, therefore, took from the Egyptian teachers numbers and geometry, and the whole of music — rhythmic, harmonic, metric, whether contemplative or bringing itself forth in divers manners by voices and instruments; but above all the occult philosophy, described by the letters which they call hieroglyphic, that is, by the marks of animals, which they themselves venerate for deities. And the Chaldaeans, called out from the neighboring regions, taught the science of the stars; and this too he [Moses] learned from the Egyptians. Justin, philosopher and martyr, dissenting somewhat from Philo, in the book of Questions set forth by the Gentiles, asserts that Moses, the study of all the Mathematics (which were then common and cheap in Egypt) [9] being laid aside, applied his mind to the Hieroglyphic disciplines alone — which then among the Egyptians alone were in honor and price, and were delivered secretly, in hidden places, not to any whomsoever, but to chief and most approved men. These, when Moses had learned them, nevertheless he never said or did anything according to them which was contrary to the worship of the one true God. For that which Stephen, immediately after those words, MOSES WAS LEARNED IN ALL THE WISDOM OF THE EGYPTIANS, added — AND HE WAS MIGHTY IN WORKS AND IN WORDS [10] — is not so to be understood that we should believe Moses to have worked any miracles by the power of Egyptian wisdom, but to have accomplished wondrous works by the power of the true God alone. Clement, in the fifth [book] of the Stromata, writes that Moses, according to this custom of the hieroglyphic doctrine, delivered many precepts of the moral life hidden under the tropical and mystical symbols of animals, open only to the lovers of the divine law: such as are, NEITHER OF THE SWINE, NOR OF THE EAGLE, NOR OF THE HAWK, NOR OF THE RAVEN IS ONE TO EAT. [11] For the Swine, because it is an animal given to pleasure and unclean, is a symbol of gluttony and of lust, signifying the greed of foods, and intemperance in the venereal act, and a life defiled, lying in the mire of vices — which is fattened unto slaughter and destruction. [12] But by the interdict of the Eagle, the Hawk, and the Raven, he shows that those are not to be imitated who, by labor and virtue, neither know nor will to provide themselves a living, but live by rapine and iniquity: for the Eagle signifies rapine, the Hawk injustice, the Raven avarice.

AGVR the Jew, son of Iake [Jakeh], at the exhortation of his friends Ithiel and Uchal, put forth a certain parenetic [hortatory] prophecy [13] — Of two things to be sought from God; Of the four kinds of worst men; Of the four difficult things; Of the four smallest living creatures, endowed with exceeding wisdom; Of the four animals that go well — the sum of which is reported in the thirtieth chapter of Proverbs. [14] Aben Ezra thinks this Agur [→ Agurem]

[→ Agurem] this Agur to have been a certain man of upright life and of great wisdom, whose sayings and sentences Salomon translated into the book of his Proverbs. Kubenaki [so printed — a Hebrew authority; the name is uncertain] of the Hebrews thinks this [Agur] to have been Salomon himself. For אגור Agur sounds "the Gatherer"; and Salomon gathered together the words of Wisdom, and drew them forth — which is what יקה Iake [Jakeh] signifies. And he called it a prophecy on account of איתיאל Ithiel, that is, the Wives, of whom he had very many. But אכל Vchal signifies "I shall be able"; for Salomon presumed many things, and was able [to do them]. And to this opinion our vulgate edition seems to favor, which, in place of that which is read in the Hebrew — אבל ... המשא נאם הגבר לאיתיאל לאיתיאל ואכל ... דברי אגור בן יקה, dibre Agur ben Iake, ha-massa neum ha-gever le-Ithiel, le-Ithiel ve-Vchal — that is, The words of Agur, son of Iake; the Prophecy which that man spoke to Ithiel — to Ithiel, I say, and to Vchal — thus translated [it]: The words of the Gatherer, son of the Vomiter; the vision which the man spoke, with whom is God, and who, God abiding with him, was strengthened. And this sense Jerome, or rather Beda, follows in the commentaries on the Proverbs. Lyranus adds that there are some among the Jews who think this to be a prophecy of the penitent Salomon, after he had returned to his senses from the error into which, now an old man, he had slipped through love of his concubines; whose opinions the same Lyranus confutes with many arguments. [1]

ALEXANDER, king of the Macedonians, surnamed the Great — whose deeds are most briefly touched at the beginning of the book of Maccabees [2] — gave pains, no less accurate than pleasing, in writing letters to his friends; in which, however (as Plutarch writes in [the life of] Phocion), after Darius had been conquered by him, and the surname of Great had been taken up, he bade no mortal "health," except Phocion the Athenian and Antipater the Macedonian [3]: whom two, for honor's sake, he bade to be greeted at the beginning of his letters. Plutarch, in [the life of] Alexander, reviews the letters of Alexander written below:

• TO ANTIPATER the Macedonian, concerning things done by himself in Asia and India, very many letters; which the writers of Alexander's history used as commentaries.

• TO DARIUS, king of the Persians, whom he invited kindly to himself, two letters.

• TO PHOCION, refusing his gifts, a lamentatory letter.

• TO PHILOXENUS, the prefect of his fleet, studious of a preposterous lust, an upbraiding letter.

• TO LEONIDAS, his pedagogue, a letter.

• TO OLYMPIAS, his mother, concerning the hidden oracles and vaticinations of Hammon, a letter.

• TO THE ATHENIANS, one letter.

• TO PEUCESTES, one letter.

• TO HEPHAESTION, one letter.

• TO MEGABYZUS, that he should offer no violence to one fleeing to the sacred temple, a letter.

• TO ATTALUS and Alcetas, concerning the conspiracy of Hermolaus, a letter.

• TO ALEXIPPUS the physician, a Eucharistic [thanksgiving] letter.

• TO PAUSANIAS the physician, one letter.

• TO ARISTOTLE, his preceptor, concerning the books of the Metaphysics published by him, a letter; of which this is the extant copy:

ALEXANDER TO ARISTOTLE, FELICITY.

Not rightly hast thou done, that thou hast published the speculative disciplines. For in what shall we excel the rest, if those things in which we have been instructed begin to be common to all? For I had rather excel in singular learning than in power. Farewell.

This desire for glory Aristotle so consoled, that he excused the books as being published just as if they had not been published. Cyprian, in the treatise On the vanity of idols, relates that Alexander wrote to his mother a notable volume, in which he signified that it had been revealed to him by a certain priest in what manner the men of the [pagan] gods had been. Augustine, in books 8 and 12 Of the city of God, makes mention of the letter of Alexander to Olympias; in which is recited the narration of a certain high-priest of the Egyptian rites, who, among the other things which he brought forth out of the secret Egyptian letters concerning the hidden mysteries of the gods, laid this also open concerning the times of the kingdoms: namely, that the kingdom of the Assyrians preceded the kingdom of the Persians by five thousand years; but that the empire of the Persians and Macedonians, down to Alexander (to whom the priest was speaking), had lasted more than eight thousand years. Which narration Augustine there shows to be fabulous and false, not only from the sacred letters, but from the histories of the nations also. Alexander dies in the 31st year of his age, before the birth of Christ 323, on the 28th day of the month of June, about sunset. [4]

ALEXANDER the King, son of Antiochus king of Syria [Alexander Balas], wrote, for entering a league with the Jews, to Jonathan the pontiff of Jerusalem, one letter; whose copy thou hast in 1 Macc. 10. [5]

THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLE ANDREW — reproved by Gelasius in distinction 15, as Innocentius writes in the decretal epistle to Exuperius — Nexocharidas and Leonidas the Philosophers forged. [6] Philastrius, in the catalog of heresies, chapter 48: THE MANICHAEANS have, he says, the Apocrypha of the blessed Apostle Andrew, that is, the acts which he did coming from Pontus into Greece; which his disciples then wrote down, following the Apostle. Augustine, in the book On faith, against the Manichaeans, narrates that Leucius the Manichaean committed to writing certain Acts of Andrew, in which, concerning Andrew the Apostle and Maximilla the wife of Egeas, many things worthy of laughter are read; which there, if thou be at leisure, thou canst see in chapter 38. Eusebius, in the 3rd [book] of the Ecclesiastical History, chapter 25: OF ANDREW, he says, and of the other Apostles, the Acts are nowhere at all mentioned in the writings of the ancients who succeeded the Apostles; in which the very style is found much diverse from the ecclesiastical custom; the sense too, and all the things which are inserted in them, are far dissonant from the apostolic faith. Whence they are proved to be fictions of heretical depravity; wherefore they are not to be placed even among those writings of which we have said there is doubt, but, as utterly alien and discrepant from the rule of piety, to be driven away. Thus Eusebius.

ANTIOCHVS, by surname Epiphanes — that is, illustrious, or noble — the eighth king of Syria and Asia, after he had violated the treaty which he had entered with the Jews, and had despoiled the holy city of its riches and the temple of its votive-gifts and all its ornaments, sent into Judaea books published by himself, Of transferring the Jewish worship into the Greek religion; and compelled all the Jews to live according to the laws prescribed in them. Of which the chief chapters, gathered by us out of the books of Maccabees and of Josephus, were these: [1]

1. Let all the JEWS, the worship of their God being abjured, henceforth worship the deities of the Greeks; and, the laws and institutes of their fathers being cast off, let them transfer themselves to the laws, rites, and manners of the Greeks. They who shall have done otherwise, let them be afflicted with the utmost and greatest punishments. 2. Let the VOLUMES of the Jewish law, wheresoever they shall have been found, together with those with whom it shall have happened that they be found, be burnt up with flames. 3. Let the TEMPLE which is in Jerusalem be dedicated to Jupiter Olympius, and be called by his name. But the temple which is situated on the Garizite mount of Samaria [Mount Gerizim], let it receive the dedication and appellation of Jupiter Hospitalis [Ξένιος, the God of guests]. 4. Let the HOLOCAUSTS, the propitiations, and the rest of the sacrifices of the Jews — the Sabbaths also, and their other feasts, whether monthly or annual — be utterly abrogated. 5. Let an ALTAR be placed in the midst of the Jerusalem temple; and, the image of Jupiter Olympius being erected upon it, let swine's sacrifices — most alien from the Jewish superstition — be offered daily upon it. 6. Let there be BUILT, town by town throughout all Judaea, [altars] upon temples and altars sustaining the statues of the Greek deities; and let swine victims be slaughtered upon them on every single day. 7. IF ANY men or women shall, after these things, have dared to circumcise their infants, let them, tortured with most cruel torments, while yet alive and breathing, be affixed to crosses; and their children, strangled, be hung from the necks of the parents.

THE SAME Antiochus, when, for the unjustly afflicted nation of the Jews, he was divinely tormented with an intolerable disease [2], wrote a little before death a suppliant letter to the Jews; in which, with all submission of words, he besought them that, mindful of the benefits which they had formerly received from the kings of Asia, they would keep inviolate faith and obedience toward Antiochus the king, his son and successor. Which writing, amid horrible torments, worms flowing from his whole body, he miserably perished, in the year before Christ was born 161. [3]

ANTIOCHVS Eupator, son of Antiochus Epiphanes, the ninth king of Syria and Asia, wrote two letters: one to Lysias, the procurator and overseer of his affairs; the other to the senate of the Jews — by which he magnificently restored to the nation of the Jews the worship of God, the use of the temple, and the observance of the ancestral law, taken away by his father — in the year before Christ was born 161. The copy of each is read in the second book of Maccabees, chapter 11.

ANTIOCHVS Sedetes [Sidetes], the thirteenth king of Syria and Asia, who, adopted as a son by his brother Demetrius, succeeded him in the kingdom, wrote to Simon the high priest, and to the senate of the Jews, one letter, asking in it that it might be lawful for him to lead his army against his enemies through the regions of the Jews without any harm, in the year before Christ was born 137.

THE VARIOUS WRITINGS OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES, as well received as rejected, are cited among the ancient authors [4]; of which, those that now come to our memory are these:

THE EPISTLE OF THE APOSTLES, written from the third [council] of Jerusalem to the brethren of Antioch of Syria and Cilicia, is had in Luke, Acts chapter 15. See below, letter C, under the word Concilium.

THE SEALING [OR ATTESTATION] OF THE LIVES OF THE APOSTLES, or of all the disciples — a scripture of honorable antiquity, which Cyril, bishop of Jerusalem, in the fourth catechesis reviews by name among the canonical Scriptures of the new testament. There are those who think this "sealing" to be nothing else than the Symbol of the Apostles, of which we shall speak soon. [5]

SOME CANONS OF THE APOSTLES, published through Clement, John Damascene, in the fourth book Of the faith, chapter 18, places in the catalog of the divine Scriptures of the new testament.

THE FIFTY CANONS OF THE APOSTLES, written by Clement — of which the first is, Let a BISHOP be ordained by two or three bishops — Pope Leo IX, against the epistle of Nicetas the Abbot, receives among the writings of orthodox faith; but Isidorus, in the preface of the Councils, rejects among the Apocrypha. See below in [the entry] Clemens.

THE SIXTY CANONS OF THE APOSTLES Pope Zephyrinus approves, in his first epistle, in these words: SIXTY sentences the Apostles prescribed, together with very many other bishops, which they judged ought to be kept.

THE EIGHTY-FIVE CANONS OF THE APOSTLES the third Constantinopolitan council — which is called the Sixth synod — confirms and wills to be ratified, in the second chapter.

THE CONSTITUTIONS AND TRADITIONS OF THE APOSTLES, brought forth in writing, Epiphanius frequently alleges, especially in the 3rd book of the Panarion; where he recites three canons in particular: the First, of Pascha not to be celebrated on the fourteenth Moon; the Second, by which, under penalty of anathema, the fasting of the Lord's day is forbidden; the Third, by which priests are forbidden to cut off the beard. See in [the entries] Audiani and Massaliani.

THE SYMBOL OF THE APOSTLES [the Creed] — which Erasmus, in the preface of the Paraphrase on Matthew, most openly says he knows not whether it was brought forth by the Apostles — all orthodox fathers affirm to have been founded by the Apostles themselves. [6] Among the rest, Rufinus, presbyter of Aquileia, in the preface of the exposition on the Symbol of the Apostles published by him, writes thus about this matter: OUR ELDERS hand down, that after the ascension of the Lord, when, through the advent of the Holy Spirit, tongues of fire had settled upon each one of the Apostles, that they might speak with divers speeches, this precept was given them by the Lord: to preach the word of God, and to set out each to the several nations. About to depart, therefore, from one another, they first constitute for themselves in common a norm of the future preaching, lest perchance some, led elsewhere, [should teach] a diverse [→ diversum]

[→ sum] [lest perchance some, led elsewhere, should teach a diver]se something to those who were being invited to the faith of Christ. All of them, therefore, being set in one place, and filled with the Holy Spirit, by conferring into one that brief token — as we have said — of their future preaching, compose that which each one felt; and they establish that this is to be given to believers as a rule. And they willed this to be called the Symbol, for many and most just causes. Thus Rufinus. [1] But the divine Augustine, in the second sermon of Palm Sunday, expounding what part of the Symbol each several Apostle [the print reads quinque, "five" — apparently for quique, "each"; the clauses below are twelve, one per Apostle] contributed, speaks in this manner: That which in Greek is called Symbol, in Latin is named Collation [a bringing-together]. It is therefore called a Collation, because the faith of the whole catholic law, brought together into one, is gathered in the brevity of the Symbol; whose text we shall now tell you, God assenting:

- PETER said: I believe in God the Father almighty.
- JOHN said: Creator of heaven and earth.
- JAMES said: And in Jesus Christ, his only Son, our Lord.
- ANDREW said: Who was conceived by the Holy Spirit, born of the Virgin Mary.
- PHILIP said: Suffered under Pontius Pilate, crucified, dead, and buried.
- THOMAS said: He descended into hell; the third day he rose again from the dead.
- BARTHOLOMEW [said]: He ascended into heaven, sitteth at the right hand of God the Father almighty.
- MATTHEW said: Thence he shall come to judge the living and the dead.
- JAMES [son] of Alphaeus [said]: I believe also in the Holy Spirit, the holy Catholic Church.
- SIMON Zelotes said: The communion of Saints; the remission of sins.
- JUDAS [son] of James said: The resurrection of the flesh.
- MATTHIAS completed: Life everlasting. Amen.

THE BOOK OF THE APOSTLES, which they, gathered together at once in Jerusalem, wrote, the Christian Ethiopians — translated into the Ethiopic tongue — venerate with equal honor as the divine volumes. Witness is Francisco Alvarez, in the Ethiopic itinerary, chapter 81.

THE EIGHT BOOKS OF THE APOSTOLIC CONSTITUTIONS, written in Greek, Carolus Capellus the Venetian lately found in Crete, and translated their Greek epitome into Latin; which is inserted in the first tome of the councils. But the whole and entire books Joannes, bishop of Osma [Ostuniensis], a man notable for piety and erudition, translated.

SOME CANONS OF THE APOSTLES, published by heretics, Gelasius reproves in the Decretals, distinction 15; and Isidorus, in the decretals, distinction 16.

CERTAIN ACTIONS OF THE APOSTLES Clement is testified to have written, by the eighty-fourth canon — which is had under the name of Clement at the beginning of the first tome of the councils.

ACTS OF THE APOSTLES ACCORDING TO EBION, stuffed with error and impiety, Epiphanius reviews among the writings of the Ebionites, book 1 against the heresies.

ACTS OF THE APOSTLES, devised by Leucius the Manichaean, Augustine refutes in the book Of faith, against the Manichaeans.

ACTS OF THE APOSTLES under the name of Luke, full of fables, a certain Asian presbyter, studious of Paul, forged; whom Jerome, in the book Of illustrious men, reports to have been convicted of the fraud. See below in [the entry] Paulus.

THE DOCTRINE OF THE APOSTLES is rejected by Athanasius in the Synopsis, and by Eusebius in the 3rd [book] of the ecclesiastical history, chapter 25.

THE GOSPEL OF THE APOSTLES, or the gospel which is entitled According to the Twelve Apostles, Origen, in the 1st homily on Luke, enumerates among the Apocrypha. Jerome, in the 3rd book against the Pelagians, indicates that the Gospel According to the Apostles is the same as that of the Nazarenes, or the Gospel of the Hebrews.

THE ITINERARY OF THE APOSTLES is repudiated in the fifth Action of the second Nicene council.

THE MEMORIAL OF THE APOSTLES was a work very familiar to the Priscillianist heretics; which Orosius mentions in the epistle to Augustine, concerning the errors of the Priscillianists.

THE LOTS OF THE APOSTLES are reproved in the Decretals, distinction 15, and in cause 26, question 7, chapter NON OBSERVETIS [Ye shall not observe].

WRITINGS OF THE APOSTLES counterfeited by Dictinnius the heretic, are condemned in the council of Braga [Bracarense], canon seventeen.

THE LIVES OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES. These — as James, Archbishop of Genoa [Jacobus de Voragine], in the book of the annual solemnities, and Peter, bishop of Equilium [Petrus de Natalibus], in the 9th book of the catalog of Saints, report — Abdias, first bishop of Babylon, ordained by the Apostles themselves, wrote in Hebrew; which Eutropius, disciple of Abdias, translated from Hebrew into Greek, and Julius Africanus into Latin — but, as I think, Julius wrote not in Latin, but in Greek. Lately, out of Germany, under the title of this Abdias, came forth ten books Of the history of the Apostolic contest, printed by the types of Oporinus; which Pope Paul IV, as unworthy of credit, rejected among the writings condemned by him. [2]

THE REVELATIONS OF THE GREAT APOSTLE. Of this work Gaius, disciple of Origen, in the dialogue of his disputations, writes thus: CERINTHUS, by certain revelations, which he would have to be thought written as by the Great Apostle and revealed to him through angels, introduces to us such portents [as these]: that after the resurrection the kingdom of Christ shall be earthly, in Jerusalem, and that men shall again have, in the flesh, a manner of life subject to lusts and vices. Against the faith of the scriptures also he designates a thousand years, in which he says there shall be many works of corruption, and festivities of marriages, for the deceiving of those who are given to lust.

THE APOSTOLIC BOOK is a volume gathered by Marcion the heretic out of the testimonies of the epistles of Paul, many of them adulterated and mutilated. Its copy is inserted by Epiphanius in the 1st book against the heresies, in the confutation of Marcion. Epiphanius and Theodoret have recorded that Manes — or Manichaeus the Persian, who said he was the Paraclete [3] — took to himself twelve disciples, whom he called Apostles, each [→ singulos] [→ singu-] [each]-lar one, imposing on each of them one name out of the names of the Apostles of Christ. These, when they had published many volumes of their doctrine with the names of those [Apostles] prefixed, easily obtained that their writings should be believed to be [the writings] of the holy Apostles.

THE INSCRIPTION OF THE ATHENIAN ALTAR. There was once at Athens a certain Altar with an inscription — as Oecumenius reports — of this kind: Θεοῖς Ἀσίας, καὶ Εὐρώπης, καὶ Λιβύης, θεῷ ἀγνώστῳ, καὶ ξένῳ. That is, To the gods of Asia and Europe and Libya, to an unknown and foreign God. From this, Paul the Apostle — when he was about to speak before the assembly to the Athenians in the court of Mars [the Areopagus] — most artfully drew the argument of his speech, in these words (as Luke writes in the Apostolic Acts), beginning: MEN of Athens, in all things I see you as it were superstitious. For passing by, and seeing your simulacra, I found also an altar on which was written, TO THE UNKNOWN GOD. What therefore ye worship in ignorance, this I announce to you: God, who made the world, and all things which are in it, &c. [1] By which words Paul, with a certain color and rhetorical craft, [2] shows that he persuades them nothing else than that they should do what they were already doing of their own accord — that is, that they worship God, whom they already worshipped, and had marked beforehand on an altar under the name of the unknown.

Now Oecumenius reports two causes why that inscription was had, ΑΓΝΩΣΤΩ ΘΕΩ, TO THE UNKNOWN GOD. [3] The one: that when the Athenians had sent messengers to the Lacedaemonians, to pray that they might come to their aid against the army of the Persians invading Greece, a spectre of Pan appeared to the messengers near the Parthenium, accusing the Athenians that, neglecting him, they worshipped other gods; and he promised that he would be a help to them for the future, out of his good will toward them. When therefore the Athenians had obtained the victory, they erected a temple to him, and built an altar; and — as it were taking heed lest the same, or something like it, should befall them, if they should pass over any god unknown to them — they erected that altar, inscribing, TO THE UNKNOWN GOD: as if to say, If any other God is yet unknown to us, in his honor we erect this altar, that he may be propitious to us — although, since he is unknown, he is not [now] worshipped. But the other cause he brings is this: The Athenians once labored under a most grievous plague; and when they had implored the aid of all the gods whom they worshipped, with many vows, prayers, and sacrifices, they felt no help. Understanding therefore that there was perhaps some strong God whom they had left without honor, who, being angry, was sending the plague, they built a new altar, and inscribed it, TO THE UNKNOWN GOD; which done, at once the plague ceased. This inscription, therefore, Paul, having by chance descried it, twisted into an argument of the evangelical preaching — using the artifice of that place which the rhetoricians call from Chance-occurrences [a Fortuitis], when, that is, they turn certain chance events into an argument for the things whereof they are about to speak: as Philostratus writes, in the Sophists, concerning Leo of Byzantium the sophist. [4] Who, when he had come forth to the Athenian people (as he was of a fat and very corpulent body) to persuade concord, and the people, at the sight of the man's enormous bulk, straightway began to laugh, he, nothing moved, said: Ye laugh? — my wife is fatter than I; and yet one little bed holds us, when we agree; but when we disagree, not even the whole house. And when at these words the people had raised a greater laugh, he presently added [the moral]; and thus he turned the chance laughter into [an argument] for persuading concord.

ARATVS, a most learned poet, and physician of Antigonus the Macedonian king, of Soli, a city of Cilicia (which took its name from Solon, son of Lindus, and was afterward called Pompeiopolis), was born of Athenodorus — or, as some prefer, of Mnaseas his father, and Leonodora his mother; and under Dionysius Heracleotes, Aristoteres [Ariston?] the mathematician, and Persius the poet, he gave himself to liberal studies in the city of Athens. He had also three brothers, Myris, Calondas, and Athenodorus; the first of whom is said to have contradicted Zoilus, who wrote against the poesy of Homer. He himself, among the various works of his studies, published an astronomical book, Φαινόμενα — that is, "APPEARANCES foreknown" — in which he most elegantly sang, in heroic verses, the constitution of the whole celestial sphere, and the images, figures, risings, and settings of all the fixed stars. This, into the Latin tongue and hexameter verse, [5] translated M. T. Cicero, Germanicus Caesar (son of Octavius Augustus), Sextus Avienus Rufus (contemporary with the divine Jerome), and very many others, whom it would be long to enumerate. From this [Aratus] Paul the Apostle — as is read in the 17th chapter of the Apostolic Acts, when in the Areopagus, which is the court of the Athenians, he was preaching to the people — took a testimony that we are all of God, saying: IN HIM we live, and are moved, and are; as also certain of your poets have said: [6]

> Τοῦ γὰρ γένος ἐσμέν — that is,
> For we are also his offspring.

Which hemistich the Phaenomenon poet brought forth, in his preface, concerning Jove; for when he had begun the work from that verse, ἐκ Διὸς ἀρχώμεσθα [Let us begin from Jove], a little after he inserted, We are also his offspring. Which [saying] Paul, having observed to have been attributed to Jove perversely and altogether unjustly, restored most justly to God. Aratus flourished in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus, and lived illustrious in the court of Antigonus, son of Demetrius, who took the empire of the Macedonians in the hundred and fifth olympiad. [7]

ARISTOBVLVS, a priest and philosopher, by race a Jew — to whom is extant the letter of the senate of Jerusalem, which is read at the beginning of the second book of Maccabees — wrote to Ptolemy Philometor, his disciple, most learned commentaries on Moses (which Eusebius records in the Chronicles), and a book, to the same, Of the members of God; from which Eusebius produces a testimony, in the 8th book of the evangelical Preparation. See this same thing more fully in the fourth book, in the entry Aristobulus the Younger.

ASSVERVS [Ahasuerus], whom the Greeks [call] Artaxerxes, [and] Josephus hands down [to be] Cyrus, son of Xerxes, wrote various things, of which [some] are cited in the sacred volumes:

- THE COMMENTARIES OF THE DIVINE ACTIONS [Divinarum Actionum commentarij]. Esther 12.
- TO THE PREFECTS of the hundred and twenty-seven provinces of his empire, concerning the utterly destroying of the nation of the Jews, one letter. Esther 8 & 13. Josephus, book 11 of the Antiquities, chapter 6.
- TO THE SAME, for the safety and security of the whole Jewish nation, another letter, revocatory of the former. 1 Esdras 8 & 16. Josephus in the same place.

BALAAM, son of Beor, of the region of Ammonitis, by profession a diviner and soothsayer, whose vaticinations Moses wrote down in the book of Numbers, is believed to have left books of his divinations to his posterity. Concerning which Origen, in the thirteenth homily on Numbers, writes thus [1] [2]: IF the Prophecies of Balaam are inserted by Moses into the sacred volumes, how much more were they written down by those who then inhabited Mesopotamia — among whom Balaam was held in high renown, and whose disciples it is agreed were [masters] of his art? From him, finally, the race and institution of the Magi is reported to flourish in the parts of the Orient; who, having among themselves all the things described which Balaam had prophesied, had also this written, that A STAR SHALL RISE OUT OF JACOB, AND A MAN SHALL ARISE OUT OF ISRAEL. These writings the Magi had among themselves; and therefore, when Jesus was born, they recognized the star, and understood the prophecy to be fulfilled — more than they [themselves knew], since the people of Israel despised to hear the words of the holy prophets. They, therefore, out of these only which Balaam's writings had left, recognizing that the time was at hand, came; and, seeking him, straightway adored him. The author of the Imperfect Work on Matthew, chapter 2, subscribing to Origen, says: I HAVE READ, in a certain author, that these Magi received, out of the books of Balaam the diviner, the knowledge of this star that was to appear — whose divination is placed in the old testament: A star shall rise out of Jacob, and a man shall arise out of Israel, and shall rule over all nations.

THE DOCTRINE OF BALAAM cited in the 2nd chapter of the Apocalypse — this, as some falsely suppose, is not a certain hidden scripture, but the wicked counsel by which he himself admonished king Balac: that, if he wished to destroy the nation of the Jews, he should draw the sons of Israel to fornication and the worship of idols, sending to them most beautiful women who might allure and inflame them to lust, and by this pact lead the allured into the rites of the gentiles. See this history in Numbers, chapter 24.

BARNABAS the Cyprian (who [is] also Joseph the Levite, one of the seventy-two disciples of the Lord, ordained with Paul an Apostle of the gentiles, and afterward separated from Paul on account of John the disciple, who was also called Marcus) [3] exercised the work of evangelical preaching enjoined upon him until the seventh year of Nero; in which he fell, crowned with martyrdom by his own Cyprians. [4] Clement the Roman pontiff, in the first book of the Recognitions, writes that he came into Italy; and Dorotheus, bishop of Tyre, in the Synopsis, testifies that he was the first bishop of the city of Milan. He wrote one epistle pertaining to the edification of the church; out of which, in the Stromata of Clement of Alexandria, I found these fragments, or testimonies, scattered here and there:

Fragments of the Epistle which is attributed to Barnabas

> MORE SIMPLY I write to you, that ye may understand. May God, who is Lord of the whole world, give to us also wisdom and understanding, knowledge, and the cognition of his justification, and tolerance. Before we believed God, the habitation of our heart was obnoxious to destruction, and weak — truly a temple built by hand, because it was full of the worship of idols, and was a house of demons, in that it did whatsoever things are contrary to God. Take heed, that the temple of the Lord may be gloriously built: learn ye to have received the remission of sins, and to have hoped in [his] name. Wherefore in our habitation God dwells; in us is the word of faith, the calling of his promise, the wisdom of the justifications, and the mandates of the doctrine. With your faith, therefore, that ye may have also perfect knowledge — let fear and tolerance be co-adjutors of faith. But those which bring help to these are longanimity and continence; with which, abiding chastely, together with them rejoice wisdom, knowledge, understanding, and cognition.

THESE things out of Clement; whose disciple Origen, in the third book Periarchon [Of principles], writes thus: BARNABAS, in his epistle, declares that there are two ways, one of light, the other of darkness; over which he says that certain angels preside — over the way of light, indeed, the angels of God; but over the way of darkness, the angels of Satan. Thus much concerning the epistle of Barnabas — besides which, Tertullian thinks that [the epistle] which is inscribed under the name of Paul to the Hebrews was composed by him. [5] [6] He also translated the Gospel of Matthew from Hebrew into Greek; of which Theodorus the reader, in the second book of the Collectanea, makes mention in this manner: THE RELICS of Barnabas the Apostle were found in Cyprus, under a carob tree, having under the breast the Gospel of Matthew, written by the hand of Barnabas himself. [7] On which occasion the Cyprians came off victors — that their metropolis should have a free episcopate, and not be subjected to the jurisdiction of the Antiochene bishop. But that Gospel the emperor Zeno reserved in his own palace. There is also another gospel under the name of Barnabas, which, by Gelasius, distinction 15, is computed among the Apocrypha.

BARTHOLOMEW the Apostle, who delivered the Gospel of Matthew, written in Hebrew letters, to the Indians who are called Fortunati [the Fortunate], [8] is thought to have written a Gospel; and out of it Dionysius the Areopagite, at the beginning of the Mystical Theology, is thought to have brought forth a testimony in these words: IF THEREFORE the divine Bartholomew says that theology is both much and least, and the gospel broad and great, and again narrow — to me indeed he seems, understanding [it] supernaturally, [to mean] that [God] is at once the most eloquent cause of all things, and brief of speech, and without word. Gelasius, distinction 15, together with the other Apocryphal writings, decrees that this gospel be avoided.

THE BOOK OF THE WARS OF THE LORD, in Hebrew ספר מלחמת יהוה, called Sepher Milchamoth Iehova, is cited in the book of Numbers, chapter 21; [9] and out of it Moses brought forth a testimony, to demonstrate the things which had been done at the torrents of Arnon, in the borders of the Moabites, in these words: WHENCE it is said in the book of the Wars of the Lord: As he did in the Red Sea, so he did at the torrents of Arnon: the rocks of the torrents were bowed, that they might rest at Arnon, and lie down in the borders of the Moabites. [10] This book Rabbi Menachem says was the narration of God which had been revealed to Moses — to whom [God] had made manifest that he would do the same at the torrents which he had once done at the Red Sea. Aben Ezra thinks it to be the book of Judges, because in it many wars waged against the Amorrheans are read. There are also those among the Jews who suppose this to be the very book of Numbers, because ספר sepher [book], which our interpreter [→ interpres]

[→ pres] [our] inter-preter translated "book," signifies also "Numbering," as Lyranus says it is [there] called — because in it are narrated wars, done by the Lord through the hands of the Hebrews. Augustine, bishop of Chisamum, judges the Book of the Wars of the Lord to be not some volume in which wars are written together, but a certain narration which was then told among the Hebrews by the common mouth and voice of all: because that which Jerome rendered "book" is in Hebrew called ספר sepher — which signifies not so much "book" as "narration" and "enumeration," from the verb ספר sipher, that is, "he narrated," "he numbered." And that word, "It is said" [Dicitur], which with us is put in the present, among the Hebrews is put in the future, יאמר ieamar, that is, "It shall be said" — which indicates that Moses speaks not of a thing already written, but of a thing to be narrated hereafter: so that the sense of his words is, Whence it shall be said in the book of the Wars of the Lord — that is, when the wars of God shall be reviewed by posterity, this also shall be said, that as God did in the Red Sea, so he did at the torrents of Arnon. But the divine Augustine, in the eighteenth book of the City of God, says that it is not to be denied that this book, together with very many others, was written even before the times of Moses.

THE BOXWOOD BOOK, or the Scripture engraved on a boxwood tablet, is commemorated by God himself, who, in Isaiah chapter 30, [1] thus commands the prophet: WRITE for them upon boxwood, and in a book diligently engrave it; and it shall be, in the last day, for a testimony unto eternity. In which words, for that which is in Hebrew על לוח אתם al luach itam, the seventy interpreters translated ἐπὶ πυξίου, that is, "on boxwood"; Symmachus, ἐπὶ πλατεῖ [epi platei], that is, "Upon a very broad tablet"; Pagninus, "On a tablet with them"; but some, "on their tablets." And these think that by these words neither boxwood tablets, nor of any other wood, are signified, but that, by a periphrasis and idiom of the Hebrew tongue, this sacred book of the prophecies of Isaiah is described. [2] Jerome, however, believes that God commanded the prophet to write on tablets, and those especially of boxwood, [3] because the box is a tree of perpetual green foliage, whose wood, on account of its most firm solidity, is almost imputrescible, and remains through many ages: that in these the divine predictions might be extant for everlasting time — by which God threatened perpetual and irreparable destruction to the ungrateful and unbelieving Jews, who would not hear the prophets warning them well, and despised their vaticinations. For God willed them to remain written for eternal time, that after they were fulfilled, the Jews might, to their own great harm, at last perceive those to have been true oracles which he had commanded to be written on the tablets, or in the codices, of his prophets. And let it not escape thee that this precept, concerning the writing of tablets, is expounded by divers expositors in divers ways: some think it was commanded by God to Isaiah the Prophet, as he was entering to his people; others — and the Hebrews especially — judge this to be a precept of God to Jeremiah, that when he shall have entered Egypt with the other fellow-captives, he should write these things. And, lest it seem absurd to any that God speaks to Jeremiah, who was not yet born, [remember that] before God — who calls the things which are not, as though they were, and before whom all times are joined together — even Jeremiah, though he was not yet, was as present. But howsoever that be, it matters not much, since the spirit and sense of the mandate is one and the same, accommodated to whichever of these prophets thou wilt.

THE STONE, or the white pebble, inscribed with a new name. Of this Jesus Christ, the Son of God, in the second chapter of the Apocalypse, [4] says: TO THE CONQUEROR I will give a white stone, and in the stone a new name written, which no one knows, except him who receives it. Which words Arethas, bishop of Caesarea, expounding, in the commentaries on the Apocalypse, writes thus: TO THE CONQUEROR of the devil God promises a white stone — that is, [a reward] shining with reward, honor, and fame. And he put in this place the white stone, because it was known to those who contended in the theatres and stadiums, and was given to the victors. But the new name is the reward of eternal beatitude, which in the present life is unknown: since those goods which God has prepared for those who love him, the eye has not seen, nor has the ear heard, nor have they ascended into the heart of man; [5] but they are new to us, when, after this life, we enter into their possession. Thus Arethas. It is also known that among the ancient Ethnics [pagans] the days of victories, engraved in the public tablets of the fasti, were wont to be marked beforehand with a white pebble, that they might more clearly be discerned from the other days. [6] To which custom alluding, Zoenzonius [so printed — the poet's name is uncertain], a Christian poet, sang the triumphal day of our Saviour in this hendecasyllable:

O day festal to the peoples, and white day, who, returning, makest us blessed — this [day], O Muse, mark every year with a snowy pebble.

CALLIMACHVS the Cyrenean, among the Greeks a noble poet, who lived from [the time of] Ptolemy Philadelphus down to Euergetes, attained every kind of poem. Against an adversary he wrote a most bitter poem, whom, under a feigned name, he called IBIS; whence Ovid the poet borrowed the name and argument of the work in his Ibis. [7] He published elegies, epigrams, and hymns to the gods. Chanting the praises of Jove, he accuses the Cretans, and, as vain and lying, refutes them — because they boasted that they had among them the sepulcher of Jove, who is an immortal God. [8] The sentence of these verses, as Origen is witness, Paul (against the Cretans, in the epistle to Titus) turned [to his own use]. See below, in [the entry] Epimenides.

CAMBYSES, whom Esdras names Ahasuerus and Artaxerxes, son of Cyrus king of the Persians, wrote to Rheum Beelthee[m] [Rehum Beelteem], and the other prefects of Samaria, a letter, by which he ordered the building of the Jewish temple to be entirely hindered. See the first book of Esdras, chapter four.

THE WISDOM OF THE CHALDEANS, in Hebrew חכמת כשדים Chochemath Chasceddim — which is called also Aramaean, and Assyrian, and Syriac, and Babylonian — in which Daniel the prophet writes that he, together with his three companions, was made learned among the Babylonians, [9] in these words: AND the king commanded Asphenez [Ashpenaz], that he should bring in, of the sons of Israel and of the royal seed, boys in whom was no blemish, comely in form, and apt to be instructed in all wisdom, and docile in all discipline, that he might teach them the letters and the tongue of the Chaldeans. [10] And after a few things he adds: But to these boys God gave knowledge and discipline in every book, and wisdom; and every word of wisdom and of understanding which the king inquired of them, he found in them tenfold above all the soothsayers and magi who were in his whole kingdom. [11] These things Daniel; who, in the same volume [→ volumine]

(printed p. 46 [PDF p. 59], verso — leaf stamps "44". The Wisdom of the Chaldeans continues: the five orders of Babylonian sages, with much on Zoroaster and the Magi. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

[→ volumine] testifies that there were then, among the Babylonians, several diversities of wise men, and reports that all these were summoned by the kings Nebuchadnezzar and Balthasar for the interpretation of difficult dreams, saying: THE king Nebuchadnezzar therefore commanded that the soothsayers, magi, malefics, and Chaldeans should be called together, to declare to the king his dreams. [1] And below: THEN there came in to king Nebuchadnezzar the soothsayers, magi, Chaldeans, and haruspices. [2] And in the fifth chapter: THE king Balthasar therefore cried out mightily, that they should bring in the magi, Chaldeans, and haruspices. [3] From which words it appears that the wisdom of the Assyrians, or Chaldeans, was at that time distinguished into five orders of wise men; whose names, written in Chaldee in the book of Daniel, are these: כשדים Chascedim, that is, Chaldeans; אשפים Asaphim, that is, Magi; חרטמים Chartumim, that is, Soothsayers; מכשפים Mecasphim, that is, Malefics; גזרים Gazarim, that is, Augurs, or Haruspices. Concerning which, those things which I have read among various writers, I thought should be here annexed.

CHASCEDDIM, that is, the name of the Chaldeans [4] (under whose appellation sometimes either all, or the several sects of the Babylonian wise men, are designated), properly and particularly in Daniel — as Jerome says — signifies the kind of men whom the common sort calls Mathematicians and Genethliacs [astrologers]. These, Pliny says, had their beginning from Belus Jove [Bel], father of Ninus king of the Assyrians, [5] the first inventor of the sidereal science. [6] These most diligently observed the motions of the heavens, and were occupied about the reckonings of astronomy, and the predictions which are made from the observation of the stars. Of these Philo, in the book On Abraham, makes mention in this manner: THE CHALDEANS, exercised among the first in the sidereal science, attributed all things to the motions of the stars, from which they believed the powers of the world to be dispensed — [powers] which consist of numbers and their proportions. These venerated visible things, not perceiving the invisible and intelligible, but following only their order; and so, from the circuits of the Sun, the Moon, the wandering and the fixed stars, and the distinction of the year into four seasons, and the consensus of celestial and terrestrial things, they thought the world itself to be God — by a profane opinion making the creature like to the creator. These things Philo, concerning the Chaldeans; whom Jerome, in the epistle to the Hebrews [ad Paulinum], says asserted that the matter of this visible world is eternal, and produced by none. [7]

ASAPHIM, [8] who by the ancient interpreter of the Latin edition [are called] Philosophers, by the LXX μάγοι, and by Jerome likewise Magi, philosophized concerning the causes of all things, as well divine as human. Origen thinks their author was Balaam, son of Beor, [9] whom Balac, king of Moab, summoned to execrate the people of the Hebrews with his dire imprecations; by whose vaticination-writings the Magi, admonished after many ages, set out from the east into Judaea, about to adore Christ. Diogenes Laertius, in the first book On the philosophers, writes that Zoroaster the Persian was prince of the Magi; [10] and that the Magi, as priests of the gods, were free for [their] worship, [11] and were wont to offer to them prayers, vows, and sacrifices, as if [the gods] would be heard [entreated] from these alone. Their dress was white, their bed the ground, their food herbs, cheese, and bread; they used a reed for a staff, on whose top a cheese fixed they applied to the mouth and ate.

Now their Dogmas and tenets were these: [12] first of all, that there is One God, the first of all and eternal. And that Zoroaster taught this, Eusebius, in the first book of the Evangelical Preparation, asserts in these words: ZOROASTER the Magus, in the sacred book in which he collected Persian matters, writes thus word for word: GOD is the first of incorruptibles, eternal, unbegotten, without parts, most like to himself, the origin of all goods, expecting no rewards, best, most prudent, the father of right, thoroughly taught justice without instruction, perfect by nature, wise, the sole inventor of the sacred nature. Thus Eusebius. They also posited other second gods, or genii, whose substance they said was either fiery, or watery, or earthy. They reprehended the images and statues of the gods, and reproved the error of those who say that males and females are gods. They said that souls are immortal after this life, and that all things which are here endure by their [the gods'] prayers, and that men shall rise again; and that [it is] wicked and impious to burn the bodies of the dead with flames. Concerning justice also, and the other virtues, they disputed much. They interdicted the use of gold and silver. Philo, in the book Of special laws, thus speaks concerning the wisdom of the Magi: [13] THAT true Magic indeed — that is, the speculative science, by which the works of nature are discerned more clearly — as honorable and to be sought, not only common men follow, but even the greatest kings of kings, especially the Persians, [who are] so curious of these arts that it is not lawful [for one] to reign unless he have dealt familiarly with the Magi. [14] To which subscribing, Jerome, in the interpretation of this place, says: MAGI are those who philosophize concerning individual things. But common custom takes "Magi" for malefics; who are held otherwise among their own nation, in that they are philosophers of the Chaldeans — and to the science of this art the kings also and princes of that nation direct all things. Whence they themselves first, at the nativity of the Lord Savior, understood his rising [birth], and, coming to Bethlehem, adored him.

CHARTVMMIM, [15] who by the LXX interpreters [are called] ἐπαοιδοί, that is, Incantators [enchanters], and by Jerome are named Harioli, [being] given to the excantations of demons, took their origin (as Pliny, Justin, and Augustine hand down) from Zoroaster, the other [a second Zoroaster], king of the Bactrians and a Magus, the first corruptor of true Magic; [16] who alone among all mortals laughed on the day on which he was born, [17] and whose brain so palpitated that it repelled a hand placed upon it — a presage, namely, of his future madness, by which he first drew down that admirable wisdom of the Magi, received from his elders, to the deliriums of incantations. Whence, by the just judgment of God, he was conquered in war by Ninus, king of the Assyrians, and expelled from his kingdom. Those, therefore, who followed him posited two principles (as Laertius reports), [18] the one good, the other evil: [saying] that the good God is [God] of heaven, from whom all goods proceed, but the evil [one is] god of the lower regions, whence they judged all evils [to come]; which dogma the Manichaeans afterward divulged among the Christians. They said that the air is full of demons, which appear to them thinly, and as it were like evaporations; they professed divinations and predictions out of the colloquies of demons; and they thought it just that [a man] be mingled with mother and with daughter.

MECASPHIM, [19] who by the LXX interpreters [are called] φαρμακοί, that is, are called Venefics [poison-workers]. Jerome calls them Malefics; and thinks them to be those who use blood and vic-[tims] [→ victimis]

THESE, THEREFORE, were, under king Nebuchadnezzar, the parts and species of Babylonian Wisdom; in which, although the Prophet Daniel was most fully instructed by his Babylonian preceptors — as also of old Moses had been learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians — nevertheless, as Justin Martyr, in the book of the questions objected by the gentiles, rightly admonishes, he neither ever used these nor ever approved [them], [2] but especially four parts of this wisdom he shuddered at, as contrary to the laws of his God; for which he did not fear to be cast to the lions once and again. There was also another wisdom divinely infused among the Chaldeans, by whose gift the Sibyl of Cumae, daughter of Berosus the Babylonian priest, [3] put forth many prophetic oracles concerning the events of future times, and especially concerning Christ our Savior. Of which thou hast [more] below, in the entry Sibylla.

CHAM [Ham], the Scripture of the son of Noah, is a work of prodigious and malefic impiety, containing the elements and the practice of the necromantic art. [4] Ciccus Asculanus [Cecco d'Ascoli] makes mention of this volume in the commentaries which he published on the Sphere; which, without any doubt, was fabricated by most iniquitous men, and by the same inscribed and divulged under the title of the Scripture of Cham — occasion being taken from those things which Serenus the Abbot reports, concerning the magic arts invented and written by Cham, in John Cassian, in the eighth Conference, chapter 21, in these words: THE SEED of Seth, receiving the science of all natures through the successions of the generations, by paternal tradition even from Adam himself — so long as it remained divided from the sacrilegious stock of Cham — as it had holily received it, so also exercised it, either for the worship of God or for the utility of the common life. But when it had been mingled with the impious generation, it derived, by the instinct of demons, to profane and noxious uses those things which it had piously learned; and curious arts of malefices, and prestiges [illusions], and magic superstitions, it audaciously instituted, teaching its posterity that — that sacred worship of the divine name being forsaken — they should venerate and worship either these elements, or fire, or the aerial demons. This knowledge, therefore, of curious things — how it did not perish in the flood, and became known to the succeeding ages — I think ought to be briefly touched. [5] As far as the ancient traditions report, Cham, son of Noah, who was infected with these superstitions and sacrilegious arts, knowing that he could by no means carry any memorial book about these things into the ark (into which he was to enter together with his just father and his holy brothers), engraved the wicked arts and profane inventions upon plates of divers metals, which forsooth could not be corrupted by the injury of the waters, and upon the hardest stones; which — the flood being over — seeking out again with the same curiosity with which he had hidden them, he transmitted to posterity as a seed-bed of sacrileges and of perpetual wickedness. And by this reasoning, therefore, that opinion of the vulgar, by which they believe that angels delivered malefices to men, is in truth fulfilled [in Cham]. Thus far the words of Cassian. Peter Comestor, in the Scholastic History, writes that Cham, son of Noah — whom he thinks was called Zoroaster by the ancients — [6] when he reigned in Thracia [so printed; Comestor has Bactria], invented the magic art and the seven liberal arts, which he wrote upon fourteen columns: seven of bronze against the floods of the waters, and seven of brick against the burnings of fire. There was also of old another work, entitled THE PROPHECY OF CHAM, from which Isidorus, the disciple of Basilides, received testimonies, as Clement, in the sixth [book] of the Stromata, is author. See below, in the entry Seth.

THE CHARACTER OF THE BEAST is had in the Apocalypse, chapter thirteen, [7] under these words: AND HE MAKES all, small and great, rich and poor, free and bond, to have characters [marks] on their right hand or upon their forehead; that no one may be able to buy or sell, save he who has the character of the beast. And chapter fourteen: [8] THEY HAVE no rest, day and night, who adore the beast and its image, and whosoever receives the character of its name. And in the sixteenth chapter: [9] THERE WAS MADE a grievous sore upon the men who had the character of the beast. And in the Apocalypse, chapter twenty: [10] THEY WHO received not the character of the beast on the forehead and in their hand, lived and reigned with Christ. Arethas, bishop of Caesarea, expounding these, says: THE BEAST is the devil; the Image of the beast is Antichrist; the Character of the beast is the note, sign, and demonstration of the imitation of the devil and of Antichrist in reprobate men — such as those have not who have the sign of the living God upon their foreheads, and who have faces signed with the light of the divine countenance. But that the impious bear the character of the beast impressed upon their hands and foreheads, [11] signifies that their hands are full of evil works; but the forehead — which is above the eyes — [is] encompassed with mist and darkness, so that they see nothing that is right and honest. Or, the Character of the beast upon the hands designates their diabolical actions; but on the forehead, the shameless impudence of the same, when without any concealment or shame they openly show forth what they are, preaching their sins, and esteeming iniquity [to be] glory and praise.

THE HANDWRITING OF THE DECREE, or, as it is read in the Greek exemplars, Χειρόγραφον τοῖς δόγμασι, that is, the Handwriting of the dogmas, ordinances, or decrees, is reviewed by Paul in the epistle to the Colossians in these words [12]: AND YOU, when you were dead in [your] sins, and in the uncircumcision of your flesh, he quickened together with him; forgiving you all sins; blotting out the handwriting of the decree which was against us, which was contrary to us: and this he took out of the midst, affixing it to the cross; and, despoiling the principalities and powers, he led [them] confidently, openly, triumphing over them in himself. Now there is a Handwriting of this kind, as concerns the Jews: that famous promise-bond by which the Jewish people had once bound itself to God in the worship of perpetual servitude. For when God, on Mount Sinai, proposed the law to the people, and promised that he would take up the nation of the Hebrews for his own peculiar [treasure] before the other nations of the earth, if it were willing to receive and to keep that law — the whole multitude of the sons of Israel cried out: ALL things which God has commanded us, we will do. [13] Which accla-[mation] [14]

[→ accla]mation, emitted by the common consent of all, as it were out of a bond [syngrapha], rendered the Jews debtors for the keeping of the whole law. And this bond, lest at any time hereafter the nation of the Jews should deny it to be its own, was noted more than once in the decrees of the divine law, but especially in the book of Exodus, chapter 19 and chapter 24. Again, there is also another Handwriting far more ancient, and binding the whole race of mortals [1] — namely that old decree which God had made to Adam, and had written in his heart: OF THE TREE OF THE KNOWLEDGE OF GOOD AND EVIL THOU SHALT NOT EAT; FOR IN WHATSOEVER DAY THOU SHALT EAT, THOU SHALT DIE THE DEATH. [2] This decree, when Adam had violated it by his disobedience, he made himself and all his posterity obnoxious to sin and to death. And the devil, out of this handwriting, urged the whole race of mortals, and showed them guilty of everlasting punishment, bringing forth against us the handwriting of the divine decree, written by the hand of God in the heart of our first parent. Christ, therefore, pitying our calamity, whatsoever could be exacted from us out of this handwriting, he himself paid on the cross; on which, undergoing punishment for us, he cut apart and tore in pieces that handwriting which was against us; and, lest it should thereafter have any power over us, he utterly took it out of the midst; and Satan — who by this handwriting of the law was making us guilty, and threatening death — that we might no further fear his accusations and threats, he destroyed, dying on the cross; and all the satellites of his principate, and the tartarean powers, he routed and broke, openly triumphing over them, and bearing off rich spoils; of which he suspended a magnificent trophy on the cross, a perpetual monument of his victory, that it might be the more conspicuous to all from on high. Chrysostom, expounding this place of Paul somewhat differently, [3] thus reads: ἐξαλείψας τὸ καθ' ἡμῶν χειρόγραφον, that is, The handwriting which was against us being blotted out; and then, a comma being set, he adds τοῖς δόγμασιν, that is, by the Decrees — finding by this distinction that Christ cut apart that old handwriting by the new decrees promulgated, namely the evangelical pacts and promises, which confer on us the remission of sins and the inheritance of the celestial kingdom. Thou shalt also observe that which is read in Greek in the dative case, χειρόγραφον τοῖς δόγμασι, that is, the Handwriting to the decrees, is to be rendered the Handwriting of the decrees, in the genitive case. For it is an idiom customary to the Hebrews that they frequently use the dative for the genitive: [4] as in the inscriptions of the psalms, in which they put מזמור לדוד, that is, A PSALM TO DAVID HIMSELF, for A PSALM OF DAVID; and as in the second [epistle] to the Corinthians, chapter 12, where Paul says, ἐδόθη μοι σκόλοψ τῇ σαρκί, that is, There was given to me a sting to the flesh, for of the flesh. This phrase I find used also by Cato, who, in the books Of country matters, often wrote Ornaments to the oxen [Ornamenta bobus] for Ornaments of the oxen; and Instruments to the rustics for Instruments of the rustics.

CENSVS, [5] or the Book of the Census of the sons of Israel, is a catalog which Nehemias found in Jerusalem, containing in itself the names, surnames, and number of those who, first dismissed from the captivity of Babylon by king Cyrus, returned under the leader Zorobabel into Judaea; whom it is agreed were chiefly of the two tribes of Juda and Benjamin, besides the priests and Levites who were mingled with these. But thou shalt observe the names of the twelve chiefs, who in this catalog are narrated to have led the people back, to be reviewed somewhat differently in the catalog which is had in 1 Esdras, chapter 2; yet they are the same. For those who here are named Azarias, Raamias, Belsar, Mespharath, Beggoni, and Naum, in the catalog of Esdras are called Saraia, Rahelia, Belsan, Mesphar, Begnai, Reum. But Naamin, who here is numbered among the twelve, is excluded by Esdras, who reviewed only eleven. Moreover, in that enumeration of families and census of heads which follows, so great is the diversity both of the men and of the calculation, that it must be confessed either that the catalog of Nehemias is diverse from the catalog of Esdras, or, if it be the same, that it was vehemently corrupted by the carelessness and unskillfulness of the copyists — which Origen frequently complains to have happened in the other catalogs of divine scripture also. See the catalog of Nehemias, chapter seven.

CEPHAS, who is also Martialis, bishop of Limoges [Lemovicensis], and Apostle of the Gauls. Him Clement of Alexandria, in the fourth book of the Dispositions [Hypotyposes], says was one of the seventy disciples, [6] having a surname the same as Peter the Apostle; and asserts that this is that Cephas of whom Paul, writing to the Galatians, [7] says: BUT WHEN Cephas had come to Antioch, I withstood him to the face, because he was reprehensible. He is reported to be the author of two epistles, which lately, the Lord revealing, were found in the sacrarium of the Basilica of Saint Peter in the city of Limoges [Lemovica], where they had hitherto lain hidden, buried in a stone chest under the earth, which, from their exceeding antiquity, could scarcely be read: of which one is to the Bordelais [Burdegalenses], the other to the Toulousans [Tolosani] — each redolent of the veneration and piety of antiquity. But whether this Cephas be that one reprehended by Paul, see below, in the sixth book, in the annotations on the second chapter of the epistle to the Galatians.

CHOZAI חוזי, a most faithful writer of Hebrew antiquities, wrote concerning the repentance and liberation of Manasses, king of Jerusalem, one book. The author of the sacred annals recalls this work in the 2nd book [of Paralipomenon], chapter 33 [8], thus writing: BUT THE REST of the deeds of Manasses, his prayer also, and its hearing, and all his sins, and [his] contempt, the places also in which he built high places, and made groves and statues before he did penance, are written in the words of Chozai. There still remains, from the monuments of this prophet, a small fragment, containing the prayer of king Manasses; which in certain Bibles is wont to be set immediately after the two books of Paralipomenon. The author of the annotations on Paralipomenon which are attributed to Jerome reports that it has been handed down to memory by some that this prophet Chozai was Esaias himself; who, his name being changed, was called Chozai, that is, My Vision [Visio mea].

CLEMENS (concerning whom the Apostle, writing to the Philippians [1], says: WITH CLEMENT, and the rest of my fellow-workers, whose names are written in the book of Life) was by country a Roman, son of Faustinus, from the region of the Coelian mount. He, when first he had been made bishop of Sardica, and afterward [was] second in the Apostolic chair — or, as some prefer, fourth after Peter — when he had held [it] nine years, at length, after the relegation of exile, crowned with martyrdom, fell in the third year of the emperor Trajan; that is, in the year from the advent of Christ our Savior 103. [2] His writings are said to be these:

- EPISTLE, canonical, to the Corinthians, the first.
- EPISTLE, canonical, the second.
- TO JAMES, the brother of the Lord, epistle the first.
- TO JAMES, the brother of the Lord, epistle the second.
- TO ALL fellow-bishops, one epistle.
- TO JULIUS and Julianus, one epistle.
- TO THE BRETHREN of Jerusalem, dwelling with James, one epistle.
- THE TRANSLATION of the epistle of Paul to the Hebrews, from Hebrew into Greek.
- OF THE APOSTOLIC liturgy, one book.
- OF THE APOSTOLIC canons, one book.
- THE RECOGNITIONS of the former [set], to James the brother of the Lord, ten books.
- THE RECOGNITIONS of the latter [set], to James the brother of the Lord, ten books.
- THE ITINERARIES of Clement, ten books.
- THE EPISCOPAL PRECEPTIONS, eight books.
- THE DISPUTATIONS of Peter with Apion, one book.
- THE RESPONSES of Peter to the interrogations of the Tripolitans, several books.
- HISTORIES, six books.
- OF THE PREACHINGS and Acts of Peter, one book.
- OF APOSTOLIC ACTIONS, one book.
- THE LIFE of Clement, one book.

THESE, inscribed with the name of CLEMENT, I found among divers authors; concerning which, what we think, we shall indicate as briefly as we can.

CLEMENT'S first canonical Epistle to the Corinthians [3] — although it is little known in our times, yet there is no doubt that it is Clement's, who wrote it in the person of the Roman church, as Jerome, Damasus, and especially Irenaeus attest; who, in the third book against the heresies, explains the occasion and argument of the epistle in these words: THEREFORE, under Clement, no small dissension having arisen among those who were brethren at Corinth, the church which is at Rome wrote most powerful letters to the Corinthians, gathering them into peace, and repairing their faith, and announcing the tradition which it had lately received from the Apostles — announcing one omnipotent God, maker of heaven and earth, former of man, who brought on the cataclysm and called Abraham, who led the people out of the land of Egypt, who spoke with Moses, who set forth the law and sent the prophets, who prepared fire for the devil and his angels; and that this is the father of our Lord Jesus Christ, &c. Eusebius, in the 4th book of the Ecclesiastical History, chapter 38, reports that Clement in this epistle made mention of Paul's epistle to the Hebrews, and used its testimonies also. Jerome, in the Catalog of ecclesiastical writers, indicating the style of this epistle, adds: CLEMENT wrote, in the person of the Roman church, to the church of the Corinthians, a very useful epistle, which seems to me to agree with the character of the epistle which is carried under the name of Paul to the Hebrews. And in many senses of the same epistle it even makes use [of it] according to the order of the words. Altogether there is great similitude in each. The same [Jerome] also, in the commentaries on the fourth chapter of the epistle to the Ephesians, citing a testimony from this epistle, says: IT IS BETTER, if we say "the prisoner of the Lord," [to say] "bound in the charity of Christ." Of which thing Clement also, to the Corinthians, is witness, writing: THE BOND of the charity of God — who shall be able to declare it? Clement of Alexandria, in the first, fourth, and sixth volumes of the Stromata, recites many fragments of this epistle.

CLEMENT'S second canonical [epistle]. That this was written by Clement after the first canonical epistle, Pope Damasus testifies in the Pontifical Book: HE, he says, made two epistles, which are called canonical. Epiphanius also, writing against the Ebionites, in the first volume of the Panarion, hands down that not one only, but several encyclical — that is, orbicular, or universal — epistles were written [by him] [4], which in his time were read in the holy churches. Although Eusebius, in the book which we cited a little before, reports that the second epistle of Clement was unknown to him, and Jerome affirms the same to have been reproved by the ancients. I suspect that Jerome, either from this or from the former epistle, brought forth that opinion of Clement concerning the plurality of worlds, when, in the second book of the commentaries on the epistle to the Ephesians [5], he thus wrote: WE INQUIRE what it is that Paul says, ACCORDING TO THE AGE OF THIS WORLD — whether there be also another age which pertains not to this world, but to other worlds; concerning which Clement also, in his Epistle, thus writes: THE OCEAN, and the worlds which are beyond it, &c. Which opinion Origen, long before Jerome, explained no less piously than learnedly, in the second book Periarchon, in these words: [6] CLEMENT indeed, the disciple of the apostles, makes mention of those whom the Greeks name ἀντίχθονας [Antichthones], and of that part of the globe of the earth to which none of ours can approach, nor can any of those who are there cross over to us — which he also called worlds [→ mundos]

[→ he] washed, when he says: THE OCEAN is impassable to men, and those worlds which are beyond it, which are governed by these same dispensations of the Lord God. Concerning this epistle likewise, and the former, I judge Jerome to have been of [the same] opinion, when in the first book against Jovinian he said: CLEMENT, successor of the Apostle Peter, whom Paul the Apostle mentions, writes epistles, and wove together almost his whole discourse on the purity of virginity. [1]

CLEMENT'S first Epistle to James, the brother of the Lord, Damasus commemorates in the Pontifical Book, in the life of Clement — without, however, indicating the name of its author. Anacletus the Pope, alleging a testimony out of it, says its author is Clement, his predecessor. Yet concerning this [epistle] it has been doubted by many, because that seemed absurd which is written in it concerning Clement — namely, that he received the see of the Roman episcopate from Peter [2], before whom it is agreed that Linus and Cletus were bishops of the city of Rome. Wishing to remove this inconsonance, Rufinus, the interpreter of this epistle, in the preface to the Recognitions of Clement addressed to Gaudentius, wrote thus: CERTAIN [persons] inquire how, since Linus and Cletus were bishops in the city of Rome before Clement, Clement himself, writing to James, says that the chair of teaching was delivered to him by Peter. Of which matter we have received this to be the reason: that Linus and Cletus were indeed bishops in the city of Rome before Clement, but while Peter yet survived; that is to say, that they might bear the charge of the episcopate, while he himself fulfilled the office of the Apostolate — as is found to have been done also at Caesarea, where, though he himself was present, he yet had Zachaeus, ordained by himself, for bishop. And in this manner both will appear true: that they too are numbered bishops before Clement, and that Clement nevertheless received the chair of teaching after the death of Peter. Thus Rufinus. John, patriarch of Antioch, in the book On the power of a general council above the Pope, endeavors to show that the Roman pontiff can be deposed by the universal church even apart from the cause of schism and of heresy, alleging the words of Clement — who in this epistle brings in Peter thus speaking to him: FOR IF thou shalt be occupied with mundane cares, thou wilt both deceive thyself and those who hear thee; for thou wilt not be able to distinguish more fully those things which pertain to salvation to whomsoever [needs them]. And from this it comes to pass that thou, as one who hast not taught the things that pertain to the salvation of men, art deposed. Meeting these words, John Torquemada [Turrecremensis], presbyter Cardinal, in the second volume of the Ecclesiastical Summa, chapter 110, rejects utterly the whole authority of this epistle, as obscure and doubtful, denying that it could at all be that Clement wrote this epistle to James — published after the death of Peter — the brother of the Lord, whom Eusebius in the Chronicles testifies to have fallen, stoned by the Jews, nearly ten years before the death of Peter. He adds also that the word Deponaris [thou art deposed] is corruptly had in this epistle, for which puniaris [thou art punished] should be read; yet in such wise that thou understand the pontiff to be punished not by men, but by God alone.

CLEMENT'S four Epistles. Concerning these there is nothing whereof I should here admonish the reader, save that out of that which is the second to James, and that which is directed to the fellow-bishops, and out of the last, which is inscribed to the dwellers of Jerusalem, many things word for word have been excerpted in the decretals of the pontiffs — especially in the distinctions the second, the fifth, the twenty-third, and the thirty-eighth; and in the Causes, the second, question first and seventh; and in the eleventh, question third; and in the twelfth, question first; and in the sixteenth, question seventh. Which surely is no small indication of the antiquity of these epistles.

CLEMENT'S Translation of the epistle to the Hebrews [3] Eusebius reviews in the fourth book of the Ecclesiastical History, chapter 38, in these words: IT IS AGREED that the Apostle wrote the epistle to the Hebrews — as being to be sent to Hebrews — in his native tongue; and, as certain hand down, that Luke the Evangelist, but as others [hold], this same Clement, translated it. Which is also the more true: because the very style of Clement's [own] epistle concords with this, and the sense, forsooth, of each writing bears very great similitude. Thus Eusebius. Clement of Alexandria, in the fourth book of the Stromata, recites a fragment out of Clement's epistle to the Corinthians not unlike those things which are had in the eleventh chapter of the epistle to the Hebrews.

CLEMENT'S Apostolic Liturgy. Concerning this, Proclus, Archbishop of Constantinople, in the booklet On the tradition of the divine Mass, engraved these words: MANY indeed, and other divine pastors, who succeeded the Apostles, and doctors of the church, expounding the reason of the mysteries of that divine Mass, delivered [it] to the Church committed to writings. Among whom the first and most illustrious is blessed Clement, the disciple and successor of that chief of the Apostles: who brought into the light those sacrosanct mysteries, revealed to him by the holy Apostles. [4] Nicolaus, bishop of Methone, in the book On the truth of the body of Christ in the sacrament of the altar, brings forth out of this liturgy a certain prayer which the Greeks use for the consecration of the sacrament of the Eucharist [5]; in which, after those dominical words, This is my body, and this is the chalice, &c. [6] [7] (by which the Latin Church believes the bread and wine to be transmuted into the body and blood of Christ), these deprecatory words are added: Thou, who needest none, vouchsafe, O God, to send thy holy Spirit upon this sacrifice, that it may make this bread the body of thy Christ, and this chalice the blood of thy Christ. Amen. Which words Marcus, [a] Bishop, in the book On the sanctification of the divine gifts, and Nicolaus Cabasilas in the book On the interpretation of the Mass, [8] would have to be so necessary to the form of consecration, that without them the words of Christ, uttered by the priest, would avail nothing to the consecration of the sacrament. Meeting these, Bessarion, patriarch of Constantinople, in the book On the sacrament of the Eucharist, says that the authority of Clement's words could easily be eluded, as deduced from Apocryphal scripture; yet that it is not to be spurned, because the same words were used in their Liturgies by James, the brother of the Lord, [by] Basil, and especially [by] Chrysostom — who, after the dominical words of transmutation recited by the priest, adds: Make this bread the precious body of thy Christ, and that which is in this chalice the precious blood of thy Christ, changing [it] by thy holy Spirit. Amen. Which words indeed seem to contain the form and force of transmuting the bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ. For this cause therefore, that such hesitation may be taken away, It is to be known, he says, that the dominical body is twofold — to wit, the true, and the mysti- [9]

[→ mysti]-cal; and that the former indeed is confected by the words of the Lord himself, whose body it is; but this, which we ourselves are, is completed by the superadded words — whether of Clement, or of Basil, or of Chrysostom — and by the prayers by which, after the consecration of the mystery, the priests suppliantly pray that, through the worthy taking of the Eucharist, we may be made one body with Christ. Which is easy to understand, if one diligently observe the Masses set forth by the aforesaid fathers. Thus Bessarion. Confirming whose opinion, Chrysostom, in the homily On Judas the traitor, manifestly confesses that the bread is turned into the dominical body by the virtue of this discourse of Christ, THIS IS MY BODY, uttered by the priest. Thou hast these things more copiously explained in the 6th book, annotation 3.

CLEMENT'S Apostolic Canons. Of these, some indeed are fabricated under the false title of Clement by heretics, [their] author uncertain, which Gelasius the Pope, in the decrees, distinction 15, utterly rejects; but others are 84 in number, which Clement, having received them from the Apostles, wrote in Greek, beginning with these words: ἐπίσκοπος χειροτονείσθω, that is, Let a bishop be ordained. These a certain Dionysius, an ancient interpreter, moved by the prayers of his brother Laurentius, made Latin [and dedicated] to Pope Stephen. Concerning these it is inquired among the skilled in pontifical law, whether they be canonical or Apocryphal [1]. Gratian, distinction 16, bringing forth divers opinions on this matter, establishes nothing certain. For he says they were approved by the judgment of Adrian the second in the epistle to Tharasius of Constantinople; of which matter, however, Adrian makes no mention in that epistle. For in the fourth Action of the seventh synod, those words by which the sixth synod is commended, and its canon, are Tharasius's, and not Adrian's. Yet at the end of the aforesaid fourth action, that very fourth action is confirmed by the council and by the legates of Pope Adrian — by which the canons of the sixth synod are approved, in the second of which the 85 canons of the Apostles are received [2]. The question here therefore is twofold: the one part concerns the authority of these Canons, the other the number. Now the part of the former assertion is most certain, namely that the authority of the Canons of the Apostles has been received and undoubted. For Athanasius enumerates them among the Hagiographa, and John Damascene, in the fourth book Of the orthodox faith, places them in the Canon of the divine scriptures. Epiphanius, in the third book against the heresies, confuting the Audians, cites the Institution of the Apostles, while he treats of the celebration of the Pascha — although this canon is not found among those which we have. Tertullian, against Praxeas, says these Canons of the Apostles were delivered by [their] hands. But the emperor Justinian also very often introduces mention of these in the Novels, and professes that he frames his laws according to them; and in express words he calls [them] the CANONS of the Apostles. Thus far concerning their authority; now of the number must it be spoken.

ISIDORE reviews only fifty; the sixth synod, in its second canon, approves 85 — although they are but 84; but the twelfth in the Latin is divided into two in the Greek codex. Zephyrinus, five hundred years prior to the fifth synod, admits sixty only. Leo the Ninth, nearly three hundred and fifty years later than the sixth synod, in the epistle to Michael the patriarch, enumerates just as many. In the last Canon of the Apostles the Gospel of John is received, which was written under Nerva. But the Canons are said to have been set forth while Peter was yet living — [Peter] who was slain long before, under Nero — as is gathered from the twenty-eighth Canon, in which it is written, BY ME PETER. This, however, seems very absurd, unless we say that that little clause concerning the approbation of the Gospel of John crept into the text out of the margin of the book, where it had been added by some smatterer [sciolus]. There are also in these sanctions certain [things] which do not agree with the present dogmas of the church — as in canon 52, in which it is commanded that those who eat flesh with the blood be deposed; and in canon 56, in which fasting is forbidden as well on the Lord's day as on the Sabbath. There are [those] who think these canons were contaminated by the Nicolaitan heretics [3], and besprinkled with many other Apocryphal [matters].

CLEMENT'S Recognitions, which are inscribed in Greek ἀνάγνωσις, or ἀναγνωρισμός, that is, Recognition, or ἀναθεώρησις [so read for the printed ἀναθεώρισμος], which is Revision — certain [persons] distinguish by a twofold partition, namely into ten Prior books and ten Posterior books. In the prior [ones], which are now wanting to us, Clement collected, at Peter's precept, whatsoever Peter discoursed at Caesarea of Palestine through three continuous months, and transmitted [them] to James, the brother of the Lord. The several arguments of these are read [4], written in these very words, in the third volume of the posterior Recognitions which are now had:

- THE FIRST book of the Recognitions treats of the true Prophet, and of the property of the understanding of the law, according to that which the tradition of Moses teaches.
- THE SECOND, of the principle [beginning] — whether it be one, or many? and that the law of the Hebrews is not ignorant [of] what immensity is.
- THE THIRD, of God, and of those things which were instituted by him.
- THE FOURTH, that although many be called gods, there is only one true God, according to the testimonies of the scriptures.
- THE FIFTH, that there are two heavens: whereof one is this visible firmament, which shall also pass away; but the other eternal and invisible.
- THE SIXTH, of good and evil, and that all things are subjected to good by the Father; but evil — from what [cause], in what manner, and whence it be; and that it cooperates indeed with good, but not with good as its purpose; and what [are] the signs of good, and what of evil; and what is the difference of duality and of conjunction.
- THE SEVENTH, [of the things] which the twelve Apostles pursued among the people in the temple.
- THE EIGHTH, of the words of the Lord which seem to be contrary to themselves, and are not; and what is the resolution of these.
- THE NINTH, that the law placed by God is just and perfect, and that it alone can make peace.

• THE TENTH, of the nativity of carnal men, and of the generation which is through Baptism; and what is the succession of carnal seed in man; and what [is] the reckoning of his soul; and how in it there is liberty of will: which, because it is not inborn but was made, could not be immovable from good.

THESE, therefore, are the arguments of the Recognitions, which Clement reports himself to have written in the city of Caesarea concerning those things which were discoursed by Peter in the same city. That these books were in great part contaminated by heretics [5], Rufinus is witness, who in the Apology of Origen left these things written: CLEMENT, the disciple of the Apostles, put forth books which are called in Greek ἀναγνωρισμός*, that is, Recognition, in which, when out of the person of Peter the Apostle*

[1] Whether the Canons of the Apostles be canonical or apocryphal is disputed among the jurisconsults [2] The 85 canons of the Apostles were received in the sixth Synod and approved by the ancient Doctors [3] Some think the Canons of the Apostles were contaminated by heretics [4] The arguments of Clement's Recognitions [5] The heretics contaminated the books of Clement's Recognitions

[→ the] doctrine of the Apostle [Peter], as though truly apostolic, is in very many places expounded, in some [places] the dogma of Eunomius is so written [in] that he is believed to dispute nothing other than [what] Eunomius himself [would] — asserting the Son of God to have been created out of things not existing. Then also that adulterous kind [of teaching] is inserted, [namely] that a quality, [and] not the malice of a purposed will, produced the nature of the devil and of the rest of the demons, but [as] an excepted and separated creature. There are also some other [things] inserted in his books which the ecclesiastical rule by no means receives; which perverse men, for the assertion of their own dogmas, inserted under the name of holy men, as [being thereby] the more easily to be believed; which [things] he is to be believed neither to have thought nor to have written. Thus Rufinus.

CLEMENT'S ten Posterior books of the Recognitions, which we now have under the title THE RECOGNITIONS OF CLEMENT TO JAMES, THE BROTHER OF THE LORD, and whose beginning is I, CLEMENT, BORN IN THE CITY OF ROME, are believed to be those which Gennadius testifies were translated by Rufinus; whose preface also is had at the beginning of the whole work, in which — whether Rufinus, or some other under the name of Rufinus — thus writes concerning the manner of his translation, to Gaudentius the bishop: IT IS SURELY fair to thee, who wilt read these things also in Greek, lest perchance thou think the order of translation in some places less kept by us, that I indicate the counsel of our interpretation. I think it does not escape thee that of this Clement's [work] there are had, in the Greek of the same work — the ἀναγνώσεις [Recognitions], that is — two editions, and [that] there are two bodies of the books, in some things indeed diverse, in many nevertheless of the same narration. In fine, the last part of this work, in which the transformation of Simon is related, is had in the one body, in the other is not had at all. There are also certain [things] in each body disputed concerning the unbegotten God and the begotten [Son], and concerning some others; which — that I say nothing more — exceeded our understanding. These therefore, as being above my powers, I chose rather to reserve to others than to bring forth less full. But in the rest, as far as we could, we gave diligence to depart not only not from the sentences, but not even sufficiently from the discourses and locutions. Which thing, although it renders the eloquence of the narration less ornate, yet renders it more faithful. Thus Rufinus concerning the edition of these volumes; whose arguments it pleases [me] here to subjoin, that from the collation of them with the foregoing arguments of the Prior Recognitions it may appear how great is the difference of each work:

• THE FIRST book, [1] then, contains the education of Clement in the city of Rome and his study of the truth; the coming of Barnabas out of Judaea into the city; the fellowship entered into by Clement with Barnabas; the navigation of both into Palestine, and the entrance of both into Caesarea to Peter the Apostle; likewise the colloquy of Peter with Clement — in which Clement testifies that he heard from Peter a few [things] concerning the true prophet, and committed them to letters in a single volume. There is added at the end a brief course of the histories of the Old Testament.

• THE SECOND, [2] Nicea reporting [it], narrates the wisdom, eloquence, miracles, race, and parents of Simon Magus; likewise some [things] of the power of demons over men; then also the first disputation of Peter with Simon held in the same city — in which, in very few words, it is shown that there is one God, author of the world, and not many.

• THE THIRD [3] relates the second meeting of Peter with Simon in the same city; in which some [things] are discussed concerning free will. It is inquired also why God did not make man impeccable; why heaven was made; why it must be dissolved by fire; whether they shall see the true God with the heart of the world [mundi corde]; and whether the soul be truly immortal. Lastly it describes the desertion of Simon by his own, and his flight out of Caesarea into Syria.

• THE FOURTH [4] [narrates] the setting-out of Peter and Clement from Caesarea to Dora, Ptolemais, Tyre, Sidon, [and] Berytus, and their entrance into Tripolis — in which city Peter wintered. It recites also a sermon of Peter held in the same city, in which is a brief course of the ages of the world, from its creation even unto Christ.

• THE FIFTH [5] has another sermon of Peter in the same city.

• THE SIXTH, [6] likewise another sermon of Peter in the same city.

• THE SEVENTH, [7] the departure of Peter out of Tripolis, and his setting-out first to Orthosias, then to Antaradus, then to the island Aradus, to see glass columns of immense magnitude. It reports also the mother of Clement to have been found by Peter in the same island, and then first recognized by her son Clement. Peter sails out again from the island Aradus to Antaradus; thence by a foot-journey he betakes himself to Balnea; thence he passes through Pathos and Gabala; at last he comes to Laodicea, where Clement first recognizes Faustus and Faustinianus, his brothers.

• IN THE EIGHTH book [8] Peter, in a more secret place of the port of Laodicea, disputes against a certain old mathematician [astrologer] asserting that all things are governed by fate.

• THE NINTH [9] pursues the same disputation against the mathematicians, who say that all things come to pass by the impulses of the stars.

• THE TENTH [10] narrates the transmutation of Simon Magus into Faustinianus, the brother [so; father] of Clement. Then it adds some [things] concerning the genealogy of the gods of the gentiles. Lastly it sets in order the departure of Peter from Laodicea, and his coming to Antioch — in which city the people delivered to him the chair of teaching.

So many, therefore, are the volumes of the Posterior Recognitions; concerning which — that I may freely pronounce what I think — I suspect [them] not to be Clement's [11]. For besides that many things in them, under the person of Peter the Apostle, are drawn from the inmost philosophy of Plato and Aristotle, two whole leaves also are recited under the person of Peter in the ninth book of this work, transcribed word for word out of the book On fate, against Abydas, of Bardesanes the Syrian astronomer — who, Epiphanius witnessing, flourished under the emperor Marcus, seventy years after the death of Clement [12]. Which same writing of Bardesanes, Eusebius, in the sixth book On the evangelical preparation, recites in the very same words, not one diction being changed. There are also in these books most things uncertain, many fabulous, some moreover repugnant to catholic dogmas. Out of which Jacobus, Archbishop of Genoa [Jacobus de Voragine], noted some [things] in the life of Clement, inserted by him in the book of annual festivities. Bede, however, in the tract On the reckoning of times, expounding the beginning of Genesis out of the words which are contained in the 6th volume of these recognitions, calls this work The books of the histories of St. Clement, Roman Pontiff, and confesses that he receives that exposition out of the 6th volume of these.

[→ Atha]nasius, in the Synopsis, and Leo the Pope, in the epistle against Nicetas, number [it] among the Apocryphal writings [1]; and Gelasius, distinction 15, reviews [it] among the books reproved by the Church, saying: THE ITINERARY of Peter the Apostle, under the name of Clement, eight books, is apocryphal. This Trithemius divides into ten books, whose beginning is, WHEN IN THE CITY OF ROME, &c. I suspect this work to be the same as that which, among some authors, is inscribed The Peregrinations, or Circuitions, or Circuits, of Peter. Concerning which Epiphanius, in the first book of the Panarion, confuting the heresy of Ebion, says thus: THE EBIONITES use also other books — namely, those called the CIRCUITIONS OF PETER, written by Clement — corrupting many things in them, and leaving few [things] true; even as Clement himself refuted them throughout in the encyclical epistles which he wrote, which are read in the holy Churches; because his faith and his discourse have another character from those things which by them, under his name, were corrupted in the Circuitions. Thus Epiphanius concerning the Circuitions, or Itinerary — which indeed, unless my opinion deceive me, is the very same as the above-mentioned work of the POSTERIOR RECOGNITION, adorned by the copyists with such a title, and transformed by a Preface of Rufinus either fabricated or fetched from elsewhere; that they might render this volume, condemned under the name of Itinerary, commendable to buyers by this artifice — as well from the more gracious inscription of the RECOGNITIONS as from the authority of the interpreter Rufinus. Now that which makes me easily believe this is the very number and context of the books; in which, from head even to heel, almost nothing else is narrated than the peregrination of Peter and Clement out of Italy into Palestine, and from Palestine even into Antioch, through the several cities and places which are between Caesarea of Palestine and Antioch. To this is added that Jacobus, Archbishop of Genoa, who wrote this same peregrination in the life of Clement, testifies that he collected it summarily out of the Apocryphal Itinerary of Clement. Which surely indicates that the books of the Recognitions and the Itinerary of Clement are the same work [2]. This, in the last years, the Senate of the Holy Roman Inquisition commanded to be inscribed in the Index of the volumes condemned by the church.

CLEMENT'S book On the disputation of Peter against Apion Jerome cites in the Catalog, saying: THERE IS CARRIED [ABOUT] also a Disputation of Peter and Apion, composed in a long discourse, which Eusebius, in the third volume of the Ecclesiastical History, refutes [3]. Now this place cited by Jerome is had in Eusebius, chapter 38, book 3, in these words: BUT other little works of Clement, not the least [of them], are reported to be held by some — such as the Disputation of Peter and Apion; which is very little found to have been in use among the ancients, because the rule of Apostolic faith is not perceived to have remained pure and uncorrupted in them.

CLEMENT'S Episcopal Preceptions. Concerning these, at the end of the canons of Clement — where also the book of the ACTS OF THE APOSTLES, put forth by the same author, is commemorated — I found it thus written: Διαταγαὶ ὑμῖν τοῖς ἐπισκόποις δι' ἐμοῦ Κλήμεντος ἐν ὀκτὼ βίβλοις προσπεφωνημέναι, ὡς οὐ δεῖ δημοσιεύειν ἐπὶ πάντων, διὰ τὰ ἐν αὐταῖς μυστικά; that is, Preceptions dedicated to you bishops through me, Clement, in eight books — these it behooves not to divulge to all, on account of the arcane things which are contained in them. These eight books of Apostolic Preceptions, or Constitutions, John, bishop of Osma [Ostuniensis], a man endowed with every kind of learning, lately turned into Latin and illustrated with scho-lia.

CLEMENT'S work On the responses of Peter to the interrogations of the Tripolitans. Of this I have nothing certain to report, save that in the fifth volume of the Posterior Recognitions it is written that Clement collected interrogations of this kind, together with the responses of Peter, in several books.

CLEMENT'S Epitome Κηρυγμάτων τοῦ Πέτρου, that is, Of the Preachings of Peter the Apostle. Of this work Clement of Alexandria makes mention in the sixth book of the Stromata, and Origen, his disciple, in the 13th tome on the Gospel of John — bringing forth from it certain fragments, which thou shalt be able to see below, in [the entry] Peter.

CLEMENT'S Life. Concerning this I have nothing clearly ascertained, besides that which Jacobus, Archbishop of Genoa, affirms in the life of Clement put forth by him — [that] the life of Clement is contained in the ITINERARY which is carried under his name.

THE GENERATION OF HEAVEN AND EARTH, or The Book of the generation of heaven and earth. [4] Although of this book there be no mention in the sacred codices of the Hebrews, yet where, in the second chapter of Genesis, the Hebrew verity has אלה תולדות השמים והארץ, Elle tholdoth hascaimim ve haarez, that is, These are the generations of heaven and earth, the LXX interpreters rendered Αὕτη ἡ βίβλος Γενέσιος [so printed, for γενέσεως] οὐρανοῦ, καὶ γῆς — to wit, This is the book of the generation of heaven and earth. [5] Which version indeed all the Greek expositors follow and expound in this place. Philo the Jew says that Moses by these words indicated what he wished to be the inscription of the first volume of the whole Pentateuch. Approving which, Chrysostom says it is not to be marveled at if Moses so inscribed the book, although besides the generation of heaven and earth so many [things] are contained in it concerning the lives of illustrious men, and concerning very many other matters; because under this general appellation of the generation of heaven and earth he willed to comprehend all creatures, as well celestial as terrestrial, together with their operations and events. The Rabbins of the Hebrews, inquiring the cause why in this place the word תולדות tholdoth, that is, Generations, is written perfectly — that is, by six letters [6] — whereas everywhere in the divine volumes it is written imperfectly, that is, by five letters only, תולדת, except in the genealogy of David at the end of the book of Ruth [7] — answer that by this is mystically signified that the world was in the beginning perfectly produced by the Lord, but by the sin of Adam corrupted manifoldly, and [is] to be restored through the Messiah, son of David; in whose genealogy, as has already been said, this word Tholdoth is reintegrated to the pristine number of letters. Others of the Jews believe that Moses, by the six letters of this word, willed to express the number of the six days of the mundane generation.

THE EPISTLE OF THE THIRD COUNCIL OF JERUSALEM. [8] When the Christians out of the Jews and out of the gentiles, lately converted to the faith, gravely contended concerning the observance of the legal [precepts] — the Jews asserting that, together with the Gospel, the Mosaic law was necessarily to be kept, [and] the gentiles [asserting] that it was to be utterly rejected — the Apostles and the elders, gathered in the third council at Jerusalem, wrote to the brethren of Antioch, of Syria, and of Cilicia, converted to the faith out of the gentiles, an epistle; by which they pronounced them free from all observance of the legal [precepts], yet with these

[→ with these] four excepted, that is, things offered to idols, blood and the strangled, and fornication — from which they decreed them to abstain [1]. This decree of the Apostles the interpreters expound in two ways [2]. Chrysostom and Oecumenius, because in the new law nowhere is an observance of legal [precepts] found to be commanded, think that by the Strangled and Blood the effusion of human blood, and homicide of whatsoever kind, is forbidden. But Augustine, in the 32nd book against Faustus, understands both according to the Jewish rite — that is, of the blood which Moses forbids to be eaten in the seventh chapter of Leviticus, saying: YE SHALL EAT THE BLOOD OF NO ANIMAL, AND OF THE FLESH OF SWINE, FROM WHICH THE BLOOD WAS NOT POURED OUT. For these things, although after the resurrection of Christ they could lawfully be eaten not by the gentiles only, but by the Jews also, were nevertheless interdicted by the Apostles, lest by this occasion there should be taken away, in that primitive Church, the peace and common life of the gentiles with the Jews — who, from the inveterate custom of the law, abhorred the eating of these things. Afterward, the splendor of evangelical preaching increasing, this manner of legal observance was abrogated [3], which the Apostles had commanded for a short time for the mutual concord of each people. But the prohibition of fornication, which the gentiles esteemed no sin, remained unshaken; because by God's command it had long before been interdicted in the Decalogue [4]. Nor is this to be passed over here, that Ambrose, in the commentaries on the epistle to the Galatians, judges this place to be corrupted, saying that by the Apostles three precepts only were [given], that is, abstinence from things offered to idols, from whoredom, and from blood; but the fourth, concerning the strangled, was added by certain rash Greeks. See the 6th book, annotation 273. This epistle was written in the fourteenth year of the conversion of Paul — that is, in the fourth year of Claudius Caesar, and the eighteenth from the ascension of Christ [5].

THE CHURCH OF THE CORINTHIANS, agitated by intestine seditions on account of certain rich and powerful [men] who were calling the common people away from the doctrine of Paul to the doctrine of the philosophers, as to those who taught more excellent [things] than the Apostle, wrote to Paul — through Fortunatus, Stephanas, and Achaicus — one epistle concerning the peril and cause of its own sedition; at the same time also consulting him concerning marriages and the choice of foods: that is, whether it behooved to abstain from matrimony, and whether the use of foods which had been immolated to idols was to be shunned. To these things Paul abundantly responded in the first epistle to the Corinthians, in the seventh chapter of which he makes mention of this epistle [written] to him by the Corinthians [6].

THE BOOKS OF CURIOUS ARTS, or βίβλοι περίεργοι, that is, Curious Books. [7] Concerning these it is read in the Acts of the Apostles, that when Paul at Ephesus was casting demons out of possessed bodies, many of those who had exercised curious arts brought together their books and burned them before all; and, the prices of them being reckoned, they found fifty thousand [pieces] of silver [8]. Chrysostom, Augustine, Oecumenius, and Bede, by the books of Curious arts, understand writings pertaining to magic arts — not of whatever kind, but only to those which are forbidden as well by divine as by human laws [9]. For there is a twofold kind of Magic, the true and the false [10]. True magic is that which, from the knowledge and the mutual application of natural virtues — of things acting and things being acted upon in turn — teaches [one] to work admirable things, which are called miracles of nature [11]. Concerning this Philo, in the book On the special laws, says: TRUE Magic — that is, the Perspective [contemplative] science, through which the works of nature are discerned more clearly — as honorable and to be sought, not the common sort only follow, but even the greatest kings of kings, especially the Persians, so curious of these arts that it is not lawful [for one] to reign unless he have dealt familiarly with the Magi. Jerome, on the second chapter of Daniel, says: THE MAGI are those who philosophize concerning individual things, and are not malefics, but philosophers of the Chaldeans; and to the science of this art the kings also and princes of that nation direct all things. Whence the Magi too, at the nativity of the Savior, first understood his rising, and, coming to Bethlehem, adored him. Justin Martyr, in the book Of the Questions propounded by the gentiles, questions 24 and 26, asserts that Apollonius of Tyana, a magician, worked many admirable [things] out of the skill of true magic [12], writing thus: APOLLONIUS indeed, a man endowed with the science of natural faculties and of the consents and contrary affections which are in them, brought forth operations out of that art; for which cause, in all [his] operations there was necessary to him the assumption of accommodated matter, by whose help he accomplished that which was being effected. These things concerning true Magic. But false Magic, and the most fraudulent of all arts, is that which works, either truly or in appearance, out of commerce with demons [13]. The author of this Augustine reports to have been Zoroaster, king of the Bactrians. Pliny [reports] Zoroaster the Persian, who most diligently wrote two hundred thousand verses concerning this whole art [14]. Philo derives its origin from true magic, adulterated and depraved by malefic men. Pliny reckons it to have sprung from three arts, which it also drew back into itself — that is, from medicine, from mathesis (or divinatory astrology), and from religion. He enumerates also, out of Hostanes (who wrote in the times of Alexander the Great), several species of magic [15]: namely that which promises colloquies of shades and of the infernal [powers]; and that which teaches [one] to divine by water, by spheres, by air, by stars, by a basin, by lamps, by axes, and by many other ways. Augustine, in the tenth book Of the City of God, chapter nine, distinguishes this magic, out of the opinion of Porphyry, into Theurgy and Goetia: Theurgy is the invocation of beneficent demons for the effecting of some good, which is done through certain consecrations and sacrifices [16]. But Goetia, which is also Necromancy, is done by the constraint of the dead, and by invocation [of them] also. For it is so called from the wailing [planctus] which is made about the sepulchre [17]. Philo, in the book above cited, adds to these a third species also, which is called Pharmacy [Pharmacia] [18]. This is done when something is offered to someone to be taken by mouth, which by certain incantations shall bring on love, or hatred, or madness, or death. All these things are condemned not only by the divine sayings, but also by the most ancient laws of the Romans [19] — among whom many were arraigned for Magic, as Apollonius of Tyana before Domitian Caesar, and Apuleius before Claudius Maximus, prefect of Africa. There are [those] who by these books of Curious arts understand not only magical books, but all the volumes of judiciary astrology, which in the primitive church were no less forbidden than the magical [20]; and they bring in as witnesses of this matter Epiphanius and Augustine — of whom the former, in the book On weights and mea-

[→ mea]sures, writes that Aquila, the first interpreter of the divine scripture, was cast out of the church by the fathers for no other cause than this — that he was given to the inspections of nativities and the divinations of birth-hours [1]; but the latter [Augustine], as appears at the end of his exposition on the 91st psalm, does not receive a Mathematician [astrologer] into the Church, save a public and solemn penance being first performed [2]. We are admonished, finally, by this example that the custom among Christians of burning books of nefarious doctrine is ancient, and no newly-found thing, as the heretics of our times iniquitously complain [3]. For that this same thing was in use among the other nations also, the histories of the Greeks and Latins are witnesses; in which it is found — that I be silent of the rest — that the books of Diagoras and of Protagoras, who taught that there are no gods, were publicly burned by the Athenians [4]; and likewise it was done by the Romans with the books of Numa, found in the field of Petilius, because they seemed to dissolve the worship of the Roman deities [5]. See below, in the entry Sennacherib of this book, and book 4, in [the entry] Julian, bishop of Eclanum, and in the Annotations of the sixth book: where thou hast more concerning the not-reading of the books of heretics.

THE SCHEDULES OF THE GUARDS OF KING DARIUS. [6] Esdras, in the 3rd book, reports these writings, [their] words, and the occasion of the words, to have been of this kind. When Darius, son of Hystaspes, roused after a brief rest in his bed, could not recall sleep, he proposed to the three guards of his body a question [7]: What thing among all human affairs is mightiest? — [decreeing] that whosoever should more prudently resolve it should obtain a reward, [namely] the second dignity after the king. Then they, when they had somewhat deliberated silently among themselves, offered their solutions to the king, briefly noted on three separate schedules.

- THE FIRST WAS: ΥΠΕΡΙΣΧΥΕΙ Ο ΟΙΝΟΣ, that is, WINE IS STRONGEST.
- THE SECOND: ΥΠΕΡΙΣΧΥΕΙ Ο ΒΑΣΙΛΕΥΣ, that is, THE KING IS STRONGEST.
- THE THIRD: ΥΠΕΡΙΣΧΥΟΥΣΙΝ αἱ γυναῖκες, ὑπὲρ δὲ πάντα νικᾷ ἡ Ἀλήθεια, that is, WOMEN PREVAIL OVER ALL; BUT ABOVE ALL THINGS TRUTH CONQUERS — which [answer] Zorobabel, sprung of royal race among the Jews, had written.

When the king had read these before his wise men on the following day, it was acclaimed by all that the sentence of Zorobabel excelled the rest; which preferred Truth as the only thing, among all mortal things, immortal and perpetual, and obnoxious to no injuries of times nor mutations of fortune [8]. And to Zorobabel was delivered the power next to the royal, and at the same time the faculty of leading back the remnants of the Jewish captivity into Judaea, and of rebuilding the holy city and the temple. Read Esdras, book 3, chapter 3, and Josephus, book 5 of the Antiquities, chapter 3.

CYRUS, the first king of the Persians, is said to have written these [things] [9]: Commentaries of daily actions (in which Esdras testifies was found the decree spoken by king Darius concerning the leading-back of the Jews into Palestine). To all the cities of Asia, an edict for the liberation of the Jewish nation and the restoration of the holy city; to Sisenes and Sarabasanes, satraps of Syria, one epistle of the same argument — whose copy Josephus brings in the eleventh book of the Antiquities, chapter 1.

DANIEL the Prophet's Dream-book [Somnialia], that is, Writings, in which is handed down a superstitious interpretation of dreams, such as that which Artemidorus, a Greek author, wrote. It is interdicted to Christians in the pontifical decrees, cause 26, question 7, chapter NE OBSERVETIS [Observe ye not] [10]. Saint Athanasius, in the Synopsis, reproves an Apocryphal book of the prophet Daniel, without a name; which some think to be this very art of interpreting dreams; but others [think it] a supplement of Daniel — that is, the Hymn of the three children, the history of Susanna, and the narration of Bel the dragon — Athanasius himself, however, gainsaying [this], who places that appendix among the canonical scriptures, and reviews

[it] by name.

DARIUS, son of Hystaspes, king of the Persians and Medes, wrote to Tatanai and Strabuzanes, concerning the restoring of the temple of the Jews, one epistle, which is had in 1 Esdras, chapter six; to Tangar and Sambabas, masters of the horse at Samaria, one epistle of the same argument — [so] Josephus, book eleven.

DARIUS — or, as Josephus reads, Arius — king of the Lacedaemonians, wrote to Onias, son of Simon the Great, high priest of Jerusalem, epistles for the entering-into of a fellowship with the Jews; concerning which, in the epistle of Jonathan to the SPARTANS, which is had in 1 Maccabees, chapter twelve [11], it is thus read: ALREADY BEFORE, epistles had been sent to Onias, the high priest, from Arius, who reigned among you, [signifying] that ye are our brethren, as the writing which is subjoined contains, &c. But of what kind this writing was, or the copy of the epistle, is not had out of the history of the Maccabees; yet it is extant in Josephus, book eleven of the Antiquities, chapter 5, in these words:

> Arius, king of the Lacedaemonians, to Onias, greeting.

> WE HAVE LIGHTED upon a certain ancient writing, in which we find that a kinship has intervened between our origins, and that our race also is not alien from the posterity of Abraham. It is fair, therefore, that, since ye are our brethren, ye ask of us whatsoever ye please. The same we also will do; and we shall esteem your affairs as our own, being about to hold our own likewise in common with you. Demoteles it is who renders these letters to you, written on a four-cornered page, and sealed with the seal of an eagle holding a dragon in its talons. Farewell. In the 144th Olympiad.

[→ of the] temple. In this work David, instructed by the illumination of the Holy Spirit, described the whole structure of the temple of Jerusalem — which he had vowed to God Most High — for Solomon his son, in a marvelous order and a wholly divine artifice. Witness of this is the author of the volume of sacred annals, writing thus in the 28th chapter of the former book: AND DAVID GAVE to Solomon his son the description of the porch, and of the temple, and of the storehouses, and of the upper room, and of the inner chambers in the sanctuaries, and of the house of propitiation, and also of all the courts which he had thought upon, &c. [1] And a little after: ALL these things came to me written by the hand of the Lord, that I might understand all the works of the exemplar. [2] The sum of this description is reported in 3 Kings, chapter six, and in 2 Paralipomenon, chapters three and four. [3]

DAVID'S LAMENTATION, or Mournful song, was over Saul, the first king of the Hebrews, and Jonathan his son; who, fighting fiercely in the war against the Philistines, most unhappily fell. The beginning of the song is, CONSIDER, O ISRAEL, FOR THESE, WHO ARE DEAD, &c. It is had also in 2 Samuel, chapter one. [4]

THE EPISTLE OF KING DAVID TO JOAB, concerning the slaying of Uriah the Hittite, a most valiant man, and renowned in war. [5] When the king had, by furtive coition, made his wife Bathsheba with child, fearing lest the husband should learn of the crime, he sent him with a diligently sealed letter to Joab, prefect of the whole army, who had then led out the royal forces against the Philistines. The sum of the epistle was that, an army being drawn up as soon as might be against the enemy, he should place Uriah in that part of the battle-line where he knew the sharper fight to press, and where each bravest of the enemy would contend from the opposite side; and that there, the [other] soldiers being recalled and at once withdrawn, they should abandon him to be cut down by the Philistine ranks. [6] Which Joab too, the letter being read through, forthwith executed — not without blood and slaughter of his own, who, valiantly fighting together with Uriah, fell. And thus David, a man otherwise most upright, by the guile of a single letter added treason and the slaying of a most innocent man — one who had deserved excellently, above all, of himself — upon a base adultery; [7] brought slaughter upon his own most faithful soldiers, who had never merited any such thing; lost his own firstborn by Bathsheba; and defiled all the glory of a well-lived life with the stain of treason, slaughter, and adultery.

THE DESCRIPTION OF THE WHOLE PEOPLE OF THE HEBREWS, held by the command of David through Joab the leader. [8] This is that memorable description of the Israelite people, ennobled by a slaughter. For when God willed to avenge himself on the rebellious Israelites (who, having rejected David, the best of kings, had revolted to Seba, son of Bochri — a most abandoned man, who had stirred up sedition and arms against the king), [9] he permitted Satan to incite David's mind, by the goads of pride, to number the multitude of the people subject to him. David therefore sent, to discharge this office, Joab, the prince of the army; who, returning after nearly the tenth month, brought a book of the description of all the tribes, from Dan even to Beersheba; in which were described a thousand thousand and five hundred and seventy thousand heads of valiant men, most apt for war — [10] that is, out of the tribes of Israel a thousand thousand and a hundred thousand, and of the tribe of Judah four hundred and seventy thousand — although the second book of Samuel noted a far lesser sum than this which is gathered in the first volume of the annals, reporting the reckoning of this census to have been a thousand thousand and three hundred thousand heads of fighting men — namely eight hundred thousand out of Israel, and five hundred thousand out of Judah. The Rabbins of the Hebrews reckon that Joab the leader — because, unwilling, he was sent to this census by the King (as the second book of Kings testifies) [11] — most truly collected the greater sum, namely that which is written in the books of the annals; and that he offered to the king of set purpose the other, lesser sum which the book of Samuel commemorates, so as to afford to him — already lifted up into pride — a lesser occasion of swelling. After this description, therefore, God, moved with grave anger, took away by a sudden pestilence seventy thousand men out of those who had been described — all in one day, from the rising Sun even unto the evening; [12] [13] and by this kind of vengeance he avenged both the unjust defection of so seditious a people, and the proud arrogance of the king; who, for the ostentation of the amplitude of his kingdom and of the multitude of nations which by his counsel and by warlike valor he had subdued to himself, led by a certain foolish vanity commanded the heads of all who obeyed his empire to be numbered. In this place I know not what came into the mind of Lyra, a man most exercised in the sacred letters, [14] that he should assert God to have been angered at David not so much for the elation of his mind as because he commanded the census to be held by a rite and order plainly diverse from that which the divine law had sanctioned — [the law] bidding this review to be made not by an enumeration of heads and names, and a description of individual men (as Joab did), but by a public offering of money appointed for the use of the tabernacle; in which offering each — as well the rich as the poor — should offer to God a single half-shekel; which, when the Levites had reduced into one [heap] and numbered, they perceived the number of the men to be double the number of the shekels which had been offered. Lyra seems to gather this his opinion out of the law of Moses concerning the reviewing of the people, written in the thirtieth chapter of Exodus; [15] whose words, as I judge, hold a sense diametrically fighting against the opinion of Lyra. For these are they: WHEN thou shalt take the sum of the sons of Israel according to [their] number, each shall give a price for their souls to the Lord; and there shall be no plague among them. And this shall everyone give who passeth to the giving of his name. By which words it is clear that Moses does not command the number of the sons of Israel to be gathered from the collected offering, their names and particular descriptions being omitted — which are wont to be made by heads, man by man, and by name. Nay rather he commands that, before the shekels be exacted, the censors gather the names of individuals, as well their own as of the family and of the country, and note these particularly — even as, at the beginning of Numbers, the same Moses commands in these words: [16] TAKE the sum of the whole congregation of the sons of Israel by their kindreds and their houses, and the names of the individual valiant men, from twenty years old and upward. And a little after: THEY REVIEWED them by their kindreds, and houses, and fa-

TO THESE [things] Athanasius, in the Synopsis, affirms that David wrote three thousand psalms; of which the friends of king Hezekiah collected only a hundred and fifty, the rest being hidden away, lest they should come to the knowledge of the common people. [1]

DEMETRIUS Soter, son of Seleucus, eleventh king of Syria and Asia, wrote five epistles inserted in the sacred volumes, to wit:

- TO NICANOR, prefect of his army in Palestine, one epistle. 2 Macc. 14.
- TO JONATHAN, high priest of the Jews, one epistle. 1 Macc. 10.
- TO THE WHOLE commonwealth of the Jews, one epistle. 1 Macc. 10.
- TO JONATHAN, high priest of the Jews, and to the senate of the Jews, one epistle. 1 Macc. 11.
- TO LASTHENES, his kinsman, one epistle. 1 Macc. 11.

He flourished in the hundred-and-forty-fourth year before the birth of Christ.

THE DEVOURED BOOK, or Τὸ βιβλαρίδιον ἠνεῳγμένον, that is, The opened little book — which certain Greek expositors [call] Τὸν βίβλον Κατεφαγόμενον, that is, they call the Devoured book — John, in the tenth chapter of the Apocalypse, describes in these words: [2] AND I SAW another strong angel, coming down from heaven, clothed with a cloud; and a rainbow upon his head, and his face as the Sun; and he had in his hand a book, and cried with a great voice, and the seven thunders spoke. And the voice which I heard from heaven said to me, GO, and take the opened little book from the hand of the angel. And I went to the angel, and said to him that he should give me the little book. And he said to me, TAKE, and devour it, and it shall make thy belly bitter; but in thy mouth it shall be sweet, as honey. And I took the little book from the hand of the angel, and devoured it: and it was in my mouth sweet as honey; and when I had devoured it, my belly was made bitter, &c. Which [words] indeed, according to the opinion of Arethas, are thus expounded. [3] The strong angel is Christ, the angel of great counsel, clothed with the cloud of our flesh; having a rainbow upon his head, a perpetual testimony of the divine appeasement; and a face like the Sun, because by the splendor of grace and the flashing of the evangelical light he has dispelled the darkness of the whole world, and illumined the minds of all mortals with the light of his glory. The book is the infallible and most exact knowledge, in the mind of God, of all the impious — beholding the several names, actions, crimes, punishments of the wicked, and the times appointed for [their] punishments. This John is bidden to seek and to receive from the hand of the angel, that he too may receive the knowledge of the miseries and griefs impending over the impious persecutors of the Church of Christ. Nor is he bidden simply to receive, but to devour — that is, to take a full knowledge of the matter, and to inscribe it in the bowels of the heart. And it is sweet in his mouth because of the attainment of the knowledge of future things: which, as it is affected and sought by all with great zeal, so, when first it is acquired, it brings in the beginning a great delight, but afterward grows bitter, when it is digested in the belly. For while he turns over in his mind the retribution of the crimes which is reserved for wicked men — especially of his own nation — he is affected with mercy toward those who are to perish by their own fault. Thus Paul the Apostle, revolving in his mind the lamentable fall of the Jews, said: SADNESS is great to me, and continual sorrow to my heart. For I myself wished to be made anathema for my brethren, only that they should not perish, and fall away from the divine grace. [4] Otherwise, according to Bede, the opened Book signifies the revelation of prophecy which John received. [5] This was sweet in his mouth, because while he perceived it he tasted the sweetness of the divine colloquy; but it was turned into bitterness while he began to preach the things which he had heard, and, for the preaching, to suffer tribulations. For although the preaching was to him sweet out of love, it was nevertheless bitter out of the endurance of persecution. Otherwise, according to Ambrose, [6] the opened Book is the volume of the divine scripture; which, when before it was sealed with seven seals, now, through the grace of Christ, is opened to the doctors of the church. This book, therefore, while it is devoured, is described as sweet as honey; because the divine scripture, while it is heard, read, and handled with attentive meditation, becomes in the thought sweeter than honey; but then first is its bitterness felt, when we begin to fulfill in work what we have learned. For the more we are given to the meditation of the divine scripture, and the sweeter its meditation is to our mind, the greater bitterness must we exhibit to our flesh, afflicting it with fastings, watchings, and abstinence from vices.

GOD MOST HIGH, the father of our Lord Jesus Christ and the founder of the universe, after he had led the people of the Hebrews out of Egypt into the solitude of Arabia, summoned Moses to himself on the summit of Mount Sinai; in which place he gave him, by [the ministry of] Angels, a compendium and summary of all the laws, [7] pertaining as well to the divine worship as to human conversation — distinguished into ten heads [chapters], and inscribed, on two stone tablets fabricated by his own hand, with his own living finger, on each side, here and there, on the front and on the back. When Moses had received these, he descended from Mount Sinai; and when, now drawing near to the camp of the Hebrews, he had seen the people sacrificing to a golden calf, execrating the indignity of the thing, he dashed the tablets which he had in his hand upon the ground, out of exceeding indignation, and broke them. [8] Then, at the command of God, he fitted two other stone tablets, very like the former; which, when he had again ascended Mount Sinai and brought them to God, God wrote back upon them the same heads of the law [9] which had been in the former tablets, commanding Moses to lay them up in the ark of the covenant. [10] Which Moses also did, placing — as Paul says [11] — together with them, in the same ark, a golden urn filled with manna, and the rod of Aaron, which had once put forth leaves; that by these three he might preserve the chief monuments of Jewish ingratitude — namely, that by the manna he might transmit to posterity the insatiable gluttony of the Jews (who, when once they were fed with Manna in the desert, murmured against God and exasperated him); [12] but by the Rod of Aaron it might be made known to future ages with what insolence and contumacy of mind they had withstood the high priest divinely elected; [13] but by the Tablets of the law he might perpetually convict the Jews of infidelity and inconstancy [14] — for whose execrable adoration of the calf the former tablets, very like these latter ones, had been ground to pieces by Moses in his anger. But after the death of Moses, the rod of Aaron and the urn of manna being removed from the ark, and [these] together with the same [being placed] in the tabernacle along with the [→ volume]

[→ the] volume of the Mosaic law being laid up, the tablets alone remained in it [the ark]. [1] For when the ark was brought in by Solomon into the temple, the third book of Kings testifies that these alone were in it, in these words: [2] BUT IN THE ARK there were nothing but the two stone tablets, which Moses put in it at Horeb, when he struck the covenant with the sons of Israel. These tablets — nearly one thousand and four hundred years after they had been made — the prophet Jeremiah (as is reported in the second volume of the Maccabees) [3], divinely admonished at the devastation of the city of Jerusalem, took from the temple; and commanded them to be carried away, together with the ark itself, to Mount Nebo, over against the city of Jericho — on which Moses, about to die, had ascended — and there hid it in a deep cavern, known to no man; [4] foretelling that those tablets should again be brought into the light toward the end of the age, when the whole people of the Jews shall be converted to Christ. Some hand down that these tablets, at the time of the last destruction of Jerusalem under the Roman emperors, were in the temple of God, and thence were carried by Titus Augustus, among the other spoils of the captured city, into [his] triumph. With which agrees the image of the Jewish triumph, sculpted at Rome on the marble arch of the emperor Titus; where, among the other litters of those bearing [the spoils], the two tablets of the law are seen, together with the ark of the covenant and the golden candlestick. [5] Yet Josephus, who described the pomp of that triumph brilliantly, mentions only the golden candlestick, the golden table, and the volume of the Mosaic law; but of the tablets nothing at all. Philo and Josephus hand down that on each of these tablets five heads of the laws were inscribed.

ON THE FIRST were five weightier and nobler precepts: [6]

- WHEREOF THE FIRST was: Of the monarchy of one God, or of worshipping one God only — which begins, I AM THE LORD THY GOD.
- THE SECOND: Of utterly rejecting statues, images, and manufactured works of that kind.
- THE THIRD: Of not taking the name of God in vain.
- THE FOURTH: Of the religious observance of the seventh day.
- THE FIFTH: Of honoring parents.

But the SECOND tablet contained the other five, of things interdicted:

- WHEREOF THE FIRST, according to Philo, was, THOU SHALT NOT COMMIT ADULTERY; but according to Josephus and the Hebrew verity, the first was, THOU SHALT NOT KILL.

• THE SECOND, according to the Hebrew verity, was, THOU SHALT NOT COMMIT ADULTERY; according to Philo, THOU SHALT NOT KILL.

• THE THIRD restrains thieves.

• THE FOURTH forbids false witnesses.

• THE FIFTH represses concupiscence, the fountain of all evils.

But CHRISTIANS divide the precepts of these tablets in another order. For Origen, in the eighth homily on Exodus, and Athanasius, in the Synopsis, think that in the first tablet there were only four precepts, [7] pertaining to the divine worship — that is: the first, Of the adoration of one God; the second, Of not having images; the third, Of not misusing the name of God; the fourth, Of the Sabbath. But in the second tablet [they place] the remaining six precepts, necessary to the love of one's neighbor. Again, Augustine and some of the Latin fathers divide the precepts of each tablet into a triad and a septenary; and they affirm that in the first tablet there was, before all the precepts, prefixed a brief proem of the whole law — namely that, I AM THE LORD THY GOD [8] — which the Hebrews think to be the first precept of the law. To which proem they subjoin these three precepts, pertaining to the worship of God:

• WHEREOF THE FIRST is: Thou shalt not have strange gods.

• THE SECOND: Thou shalt not take the name of God in vain.

• THE THIRD: Of the Sabbath.

But in the SECOND tablet they set in order these seven precepts:

• WHEREOF THE FIRST is: Of the honor of parents.

• THE SECOND: Of avoiding homicide.

• THE THIRD forbids adultery.

• THE FOURTH prohibits theft.

• THE FIFTH, false witnesses.

• THE SIXTH, which forbids all concupiscence — and which among the Hebrews is one only, and holds the tenth place in the decalogue — Augustine distinguishes into two: [9] that is, into an Interdict forbidding the concupiscence of riches (which is the sixth precept), and into an Interdict of the concupiscence of the flesh (which is numbered in the seventh and last place).

Now Moses called these tablets לחת העדת Luchoth ha-edut, that is, the tablets of the testimony; [10] [11] and Paul likewise, Τὰς πλάκας τῆς διαθήκης, that is, The tablets of the testament or covenant [12] — because God had written them for an everlasting testimony of that most celebrated covenant which the nation of the Hebrews had entered into with him on Mount Sinai, when, before the whole multitude of the Jews, [in answer] to God promising that out of all the nations of the earth he would have the people of Israel for his own peculiar [treasure], and for a priestly kingdom, and for a holy nation most highly commended to himself alone, if they would hear his voice and keep the covenants of the proposed law — all the people answered with unanimous cry: ALL THINGS WHICH THE LORD HATH SPOKEN, WE WILL DO. [13] Then, the consent of each part being given, and the covenants confirmed on both sides, God Most High engraved the conditions of the covenant entered into upon stone tablets, for a perpetual memorial of the deed, with his own living finger — in the year from the founding of the world two thousand four hundred and fifty-four, but before the advent of Christ 1507. [14]

DEUTERONOMY inscribed on the Altar, of which mention is in the eighth chapter of the book of Joshua, [15] was written on this occasion. When the people of the Jews were yet in the plains of Moab beyond the Jordan, Moses first commanded them that, when they had entered into the promised land, they should build on Mount Ebal an altar of great stones — whole, unformed, and unpolished, which iron had not touched — joined to one another with mortar; then that they should sculpt upon them, fairly and diligently, all the words of the decalogue, with the eleven maledictions added which are read in the twenty-seventh chapter of Deuteronomy. When these were written, he commanded likewise that the Le-

[→ the] Levites should intone those maledictions with a loud voice, and the whole people, answering to each, should acclaim, AMEN. When therefore Joshua, having crossed the Jordan, had occupied the land of the Canaanites in the fifth year after the death of Moses, [1] he built an altar to the Lord on Mount Ebal, and wrote upon the stones of the altar משנה תורה Miscne Thora, that is, that Summary of the law which the LXX interpreters rendered Δευτερονόμιον — that is, the Second law, or repetition of the law; and together with this summary he left those maledictions written, as Josephus testifies, in the year from the founding of the world two thousand four hundred and ninety-seven.

THE DIARY OF THE KINGS OF MEDIA AND PERSIA, or ספר דברי הימים למלכי מדי ופרס [2] Sepher diver-haiamim lemalche Medai u-Phares, that is, The Book of the words of the days of the kings of the Medes and Persians, signifies the annals in which the daily acts of the kings, the reckoning of times being kept, were briefly noted; and among the Babylonians they were preserved in the public library of the city of Ecbatana. In these Esdras testifies that, by the diligence of Darius, king of the Persians, was found a certain decree of Cyrus, king of the Persians, concerning the leading-back of the Jewish people into Judaea and the rebuilding of the temple of Jerusalem, at the cost and expenses furnished from the royal [treasury] of the kings of the Persians. In these also the author of the book of Esther reports that the deeds of Ahasuerus (or Artaxerxes), king of the Persians, were described — but especially his immortal benefit toward the Jewish nation; whereby he magnificently delivered the whole race of the Hebrews, [appointed] to be slaughtered in one day throughout all the cities of his kingdom, vengeance being taken upon their enemies.

DIONYSIUS, surnamed the Areopagite (whom Luke, in the 17th chapter of the Acts, writes to have believed, together with a woman [named] Damaris and very many others, when Paul preached in the Areopagus of Athens), [3] obtained the chief priesthood of the church of Athens, as Eusebius writes in the third book of the History; but, as Bede reports in the commentaries on the apostolic Acts, he was bishop of Corinth. He most learnedly composed, in Greek and sublime eloquence, admirable volumes of a divine wisdom, hidden in mysteries. Of which, those that are extant in Greek and Latin are these: [4]

- OF THE Celestial, or angelic hierarchy, to his fellow-presbyter Timothy, one book.
- OF THE Ecclesiastical, or sacerdotal hierarchy, to his fellow-presbyter Timothy, one book.
- OF THE Divine names, to his fellow-presbyter Timothy, one book.
- OF Mystical theology, to Timothy his fellow-presbyter, one book.
- TO Caius the Monk, four epistles.
- TO Dorotheus the minister, one epistle.
- TO Sosipater the priest, one epistle.

• TO Polycarp the high priest, one epistle.

• TO Demophilus the Monk, one epistle.

• TO Titus the high priest, one epistle; which Trithemius reviews under the title of the book OF SYMBOLIC THEOLOGY.

• TO John the apostle and evangelist, one epistle.

• TO Apollophanes the philosopher, one epistle.

But those which are now wanting — commemorated by Dionysius himself in the aforesaid lucubrations — are these works:

• THE BOOK of Divine hymns, alleged in chapter 7 of the Celestial hierarchy.

• THE BOOK of Symbolic theology, cited in chapter 15 of the Celestial hierarchy, and chapters 1 and 13 of the Divine names, and chapter 3 of the Mystical theology, and epistle 9, to Titus.

• THE BOOK of intelligible and sensible [things], cited in the first and second chapters of the Ecclesiastical hierarchy.

• THE BOOK of the legal, or sacerdotal hierarchy, cited in chapter 3 of the Ecclesiastical hierarchy.

• THE BOOK of Theological hypotyposes, cited in chapters 1 and 2 of the Divine names, and chapter 3 of the Mystical Theology.

• THE BOOK of angelic properties, cited in chapter 4 of the Divine names.

• THE BOOK of the soul, cited in the fourth chapter of the Divine names.

• THE BOOK of the divine and just judgment, cited in chapter 4 of the Divine names.

To these Trithemius adds one epistle Of the death of Paul, to Timothy; whose copy is recited by Jacobus, Archbishop of Genoa, in the life of Paul.

THOMAS, presbyter cardinal of St. Xystus [San Sisto], in the commentaries on the Acts of the Apostles and on the third book of Kings, is of the opinion that Dionysius the Areopagite left nothing at all of the above-mentioned writings, being led (as he himself judges) by certain not-light conjectures; [5] to which — since Anastasius the Librarian, John Scotus, John the Saracen, Dionysius the Carthusian, Ambrose the Camaldolese, Marsilius Ficinus, and very many other most erudite men, long before him, most fully satisfied [the objections] alleged by others — it would be superfluous to weave over again the same web. The third Council of Constantinople, more than nine hundred years ago, acknowledged and venerated the aforesaid works as the true and proper offspring of Dionysius; [6] in whose acts the testimonies of these are several times brought in, under the name of the most holy Dionysius the Areopagite, for the confuting of heretics.

THE BOOK OF THE LORD, in Hebrew ספר יהוה Sepher Iehova, is cited by Isaiah, chapter 34, in these words: [7] SEEK diligently in the Book of the Lord, and read: not one of them was wanting, one did not seek the other; for that which proceeds out of his mouth, he hath commanded; and his spirit itself shall gather them. By this book some understand the book of Moses, some the book of nature; but the sounder sense is that Isaiah, by the Book of the Lord, understands the book of his own prophecies [8] — as if he said: Let this book be commended to you; and when those things shall come to pass upon you which I foretell as future, seek, and all things shall meet you in this book, [written] by the command of the Lord, taken down from the spirit of [his] mouth. Some gather out of those words the mystery of the Trinity. For the Son is signified by [his] mouth; but the Father, when his [own] is added — which in Hebrew is written הוא, and is reputed among the Rabbins a most excellent name of God; while the Holy Spirit is expressed by the very word spirit.

THE WRITING OF THE HOUSE OF ISRAEL designates the catalog and canon of the holy scriptures, [9] in which the vaticinations and writings of false prophets have no place — as God openly testifies through Ezekiel, chapter thirteen, saying: [10] AND MY HAND SHALL BE upon the prophets who see vain things, and

EPIMENIDES of Crete, by country a Gnossian, a most ancient philosopher and poet, priest of the temple of Mithra (or of the Sun) in Crete, [1] wrote a book entitled περὶ τῶν χρησμῶν, that is, Of ORACLES; in which he discoursed of oracles and responses foretelling future things. Out of this the Apostle Paul took a testimony against the false teachers of the Cretans, that he might convince them by the authority of their own teacher — thus writing to Titus, bishop of Crete: [2] FOR THIS CAUSE I left thee in Crete, that thou shouldst correct the things that are wanting… For there are many disobedient, vain-talkers, and seducers, especially they who are of the circumcision; whom it behooveth to be rebuked, who subvert whole houses, teaching things which they ought not, for the sake of filthy lucre. One of them, their own prophet, said: > that is, CRETANS [are] always liars, evil beasts, slow bellies.

> ΚΡΗΤΕΣ ἀεὶ ψεῦσται, κακὰ θηρία, γαστέρες ἀργαί,

This testimony is true. For which cause rebuke them sharply. Thus Paul. Jerome, concerning this hexameter verse, in the commentaries on the epistle to Titus, speaks thus: [3] THERE ARE THOSE who think this verse taken from Callimachus the Cyrenaean poet; and in some part they do not err — since he too, writing in praise of Jove against the Cretans (who gloried that they showed his sepulchre), says, CRETANS always liars, who have even fabricated thy sepulchre with a sacrilegious mind. But, as we said above, the whole verse is taken by the Apostle from the poet Epimenides; and Callimachus used it in the exordium of his own poem. Thus Jerome; to whom Augustine, in the second book Against the adversary of the law and the prophets, subscribes, attributing the same verse to Epimenides. But Chrysostom, expounding more fully the occasion of this song, in the third sermon on the epistle to Titus, writes thus: [4] WHO HE was, and whence he was who said this, must of necessity be told to you. Epimenides is he who uttered it, himself also a Cretan; and this is the occasion of the saying. The Cretans have a sepulchre of Jove, thus inscribed:

> Ἐνθάδε Κεῖται ὃν Δία ἐπικαλοῦσι, that is: Here lies he whom they call Jove.

On account of this inscription, therefore, the poet, taxing them with lying, says:

> ΚΡΗΤΕΣ ἀεὶ ψεῦσται, κακὰ θηρία, γαστέρες ἀργαί,
>
> Τάφον ἄνα σεῖο Κρῆτες ἐτεκτήναντο·
> Σὺ δ′ οὐ θάνες, ἐστὶ γὰρ αἰεί.

that is, Cretans [are] always liars, evil beasts, slow bellies. For indeed they fabricated thy sepulchre, O king; but thou didst by no means die: for thou ever livest.

CELSUS the Epicurean, in the books of the true discourse which he published against the Christians, said that those things which the Cretans relate concerning the sepulchre of Jove among them contain a mystery, and ought to be understood according to allegory. Contradicting whom, Origen, in the third volume against him — at the same time attributing these verses to Callimachus, with some [others] super-added — writes thus: CALLIMACHUS the Cyrenaean, when he had read through infinite poems, and run over well-nigh the whole Greek history, and understood nothing at all said mystically concerning Jove and his sepulchre, accuses the Cretans in a certain distich which he wrote in praise of Jove, thus saying:

O Jupiter, thee indeed men report to have been born on the Idaean mountains; thee, I say, most also have said to have been born in Arcadia:

which of these, O father, do they lie?

The Cretans, always liars, built a sepulchre for thee, O king;

but thou hast not yet undergone death: for thou art to abide eternally.

The distich, of which Origen here makes mention, in Callimachus, in the hymn of Apollo [so; the Hymn to Zeus], has thus:

Κρῆτες ἀεὶ ψεῦσται, καὶ γὰρ τάφον, ὦ ἄνα, σεῖο

Κρῆτες ἐτεκτήναντο· σὺ δ' οὐ θάνες, ἐστὶ γὰρ αἰεί.

The Cretans, always vain, built a sepulchre — thy [sepulchre], O nourishing king; but to succumb to death thou never couldst, who livest through all ages.

EPIPHANIUS, in the first book of the Panarion, asserts that all these verses are of Epimenides, but that out of them Callimachus usurped for himself the last two, as an approved testimony against the Cretans. Jerome, meeting certain [persons] who, for the sake of this testimony, were calumniating Paul, in the place already cited adds these things: [5] CERTAIN [persons] think the Apostle to be reprehended, because he imprudently slipped; and, while he rebukes the false teachers, he approved that verse — [saying] that on that account the Cretans are said to be deceivers, because they vainly built a sepulchre of Jove. For if (say they) Epimenides, or Callimachus, on that account argue the Cretans [to be] deceivers and evil beasts and slow bellies, because they perceive not divine things, and feign Jove — who reigns in heaven — to be buried in their island; and [if] this which they said is true, the Apostle's opinion is approved: it follows that Jove is not dead, but living. Unskillfully, therefore, [did] Paul, the destroyer of idolatry, while he acts against perverse teachers, assert the gods whom he was impugning. To which it must be briefly answered, that just as, in that which he says, EVIL COMMUNICATIONS CORRUPT GOOD MANNERS, and in that, FOR WE ARE ALSO HIS OFFSPRING, he did not straightway approve the whole comedy of Menander and the book of Aratus, but used the opportunity of the verse: so also in the present place he did not, by a single verse, confirm the whole work of Callimachus or of Epimenides (whereof the one sings the praises of Jove, the other writes of oracles); but he rebuked only the Cretans as liars, for the vice of the nation — not on account of that opinion for which they are taxed by the poets, but for their inborn facility of lying, and he confuted them out of their nation's own author. And that we may know that the Apostle spoke, not by chance and in passing, but considerately and circumspectly, and protecting himself on every side against the Cretans, THIS TESTIMONY, he says,

[→ THIS] IS TRUE — not the whole song from which the testimony is taken, not the entire work, but only this testimony, only this little verse, by which they are called liars. Thus Jerome.

This verse became celebrated in the schools of the dialecticians, from the syllogism which is called ψευδόμενος, that is, The Liar. [1] As an example of which this verse is brought forward by the sophists in this manner: Either the song of Epimenides is true, or false: if true, then the Cretans are not liars, because Epimenides, the author of the song, was a Cretan: if false, then the Cretans are not liars.

DIOGENES Laertius writes that Epimenides, when he was yet a youth, was once sent by his father to bring back a sheep from the country; and when, at the midday hour, he had turned aside from the journey into a cave, he there rested in a perpetual sleep fifty-seven years. [2] Then, being awakened — since he thought he had slept but little — he sought again for the sheep; which, when he had not found it, he returned to the field. And there, when he perceived the face of all things changed, astonished with stupor and hesitating, he went back into the town. There, when he wished to enter his own house, he was asked who he might be; and, scarcely recognized by a younger brother, now an old man, he learned from him the whole truth of the matter. Moreover, his fame flying through Greece, he was esteemed most dear to the gods, and always lived in the highest honor among the Athenians, even to the hundred-and-fifty-seventh year of his age; and he departed this life in the fiftieth Olympiad — that is, in the 750th year before the birth of Christ. [3]

ISAIAH, son of Amoz, the Prophet, wrote a book of the deeds of Uzziah, king of Jerusalem, of which there is mention in the twenty-sixth chapter of the latter book of Paralipomenon. In whose 32nd chapter also is commemorated a certain Vision of Isaiah, containing the discourses and the [acts of] mercy toward Hezekiah, king of Judah; which indeed there is no doubt is that same which, in the book of Isaiah, is described from the thirty-sixth chapter even to the fortieth, in a long discourse.

THE SAME Isaiah ALSO — as Rabbi Moses Kimchi, out of the opinion of the Jews, noted in the book Of the Ways of the holy tongue — is reported to have written the book of Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Canticle of canticles, which are had, under the name of Solomon, in the divine scriptures. [4]

HERETICS composed, under the name of Isaiah, a book which is inscribed ΑΝΑΒΑΣΙΣ, that is, The Ascension; of which Epiphanius makes mention in the second [book] of the Panarion, in these words: [5] HIERAX, trifling much concerning Melchizedek — whom he says to be the Holy Spirit — strives to confirm this out of the Ascension of Isaiah; namely, as in the volume called the ASCENSION he said: THE ANGEL, walking about before me, SHOWED me, and said to me, Who is he at the right hand of God? And I said, Thou knowest, Lord. And he said, This is that only-begotten beloved [one]. And [he said], Who is the other, like to him, at the left? And I said, Thou knowest. This is the Holy Spirit, who speaks in thee and in the prophets. And he was like to the only-begotten. And out of this testimony [Hierax] confirms Melchizedek to be the Holy Spirit — because, as Paul says, being likened to the Son of God, he remains a priest forever. That this same writing was in use among the Archontic heretics, the same Epiphanius testifies in the first book of the Panarion. [6] Jerome, on the 64th chapter of Isaiah, expounding that [verse] of Isaiah, FROM THE AGE THEY HAVE NOT HEARD, NEITHER HAVE THEY [with their ears] RECEIVED, &c., [7] says: THE ASCENSION of Isaiah and the Apocalypse of Elias have this testimony; and by this occasion silly little women, laden with sins, were deceived. [the primary scan here prints an obscure word, Lusitaniæ*, between "occasion" and "little women"; Jerome's text has no such word]* Origen, on the 13th chapter of Matthew, cites an Apocryphon of Isaiah, in which it is narrated that Isaiah perished, cruelly cut in pieces by his own people.

THERE IS EXTANT a certain Vision, under the title of Isaiah, printed at Venice, whose inscription is this: THE ADMIRABLE VISION of Isaiah the Prophet in a rapture of mind, which contains the arcana of the divine Trinity and the redemption of fallen mankind.

ESDRAS, who in the first volume of the sacred annals is called Josedech the priest, [8] and by the Hebrews Malachi, is thought to be the last of the prophets. [9] He, when he was returned from the captivity of Babylon, by the afflatus of the Spirit of God dictated — concerning those [scriptures] which were contained in the most holy writings burned at the destruction of Jerusalem — two hundred and four books; [10] which five very swift scribes, taking down from his mouth through forty continuous days, wrote out on boxwood tablets. Of these, Esdras published a hundred and twenty-six abroad; but the rest, elaborated with a more secret wisdom and a more sublime science, he reserved to be read secretly by the wise alone, and by the teachers skilled in the law, with greater care and more diligent study. Esdras himself makes mention of these books in the fourth volume of his visions, chapter fourteen, in these words: [11] BECAUSE, O LORD, thy law is burnt, and on this account no one knows the things which have been done by thee; if I have found grace with thee, send into me the Holy Spirit, that I may write all that has been done in the world from the beginning, [the things] which were written in thy law. And he answered me, and said, GO, and gather the people, and thou shalt say to them that they seek thee not for forty days. But do thou prepare thee many [tablets of] boxwood, and take with thee Saraias, Dabria, Salemia, Echanus, and Asiel — these five, who are ready to write swiftly; and come hither; and I will kindle in thy heart the lamp of understanding, which shall not be extinguished until the things be finished which thou shalt begin to write. And then, [these] being perfected, some thou shalt make public, some thou shalt deliver secretly to the wise…. And I took the five men, as the Lord had commanded me; and we set out into the field, and remained there. And it came to pass on the morrow; and behold, a voice called me, saying, ESDRAS, open thy mouth, and drink what I shall give thee to drink. And I opened my mouth; and behold, a full cup was reached to me. It was full, as it were of water; and the color as of fire. And I took it, and drank; and when I had drunk, my heart was tormented with understanding, and wisdom grew in my breast. For my spirit was preserved in memory. And my mouth was opened, and was shut no more. The Most High gave understanding to the five men, and they wrote the things that were dictated — the sublimities of the night, which they knew not. By night they ate bread; but I by day spoke, and by night was not silent. And there were written, in the forty days, two hundred and four books. And when the forty days were completed, the Most High said to me: THE FORMER [books], which thou hast written, set in public, that the worthy and the unworthy may read [them]; but the last seventy thou shalt preserve, to deliver them to the wise of thy people. For in these is the vein of understanding, and the fountain of wisdom, and the river of knowledge. And I did so.

PICO, count of Mirandola, in the fifth question of his Apologia, asserts that in these seventy latter books is contained that whole more secret exposition of the divine law, which by the Jews is called קבלה KABBALAH, that is, Reception. [1] Now the Kabbalah is the more secret exposition of the divine law, received from the mouth of God by Moses, and from the mouth of Moses by the fathers through continual successions — not indeed by writing, but taken up by living voice; which has a likeness to that exposition which we call Anagogical, and is on that account more sublime than the rest, because it leads us upward from earthly things to heavenly, from sensible to intelligible, from temporal to eternal, from corporeal to spiritual, from human to divine. The origin and occasion of these seventy volumes the same Pico reports, out of the opinion of Rabbi Moses the Egyptian [Maimonides], in well-nigh these words: [2] WHEN MOSES had ascended Mount Sinai, he received from God a twofold law: the one literal, which he himself, engraven in letters, published to all the Jews by God's precept; the other spiritual, which — God so commanding — he wrote not, but communicated secretly to the seventy wise men only, whom he had chosen for himself for the custody of the law; and he likewise charged them not to publish it in writing, but to reveal it by living voice to their successors; and they in turn to their posterity, the same order being kept in perpetuity. And that God revealed to Moses, besides the written law, another spiritual law, or a mystical exposition of that same written law, separately — witnesses are Esdras, Paul, Origen, and Hilary. Of whom Esdras, in the fourth book, at the beginning of the fourteenth chapter, brings in God thus speaking to him: [margin: 4 Esdras 14:3-6] REVEALING, I was revealed to Moses upon the bush, when my people served in Egypt; and I brought him upon Mount Sinai, and detained him with me many days; and I narrated to him many marvels, and showed him the secrets of the times and the end; and I commanded him, saying, THESE words thou shalt make public, and these thou shalt hide. Subscribing to Esdras, Origen — when he expounded that [place] to the Romans, [margin: Rom. 3:2] BECAUSE TO THEM WERE COMMITTED THE ORACLES OF GOD — says that to the Jews were committed by God not only the letters, but also the oracles of God. From which saying of Origen it is indicated that, besides the literal law, something else was delivered to the Jews, which here Paul calls the Oracles of God. And Hilary too, in the exposition of the second psalm, testifies this same thing more openly, saying: IT WAS already instituted of old by Moses that in every synagogue there should be seventy doctors. For the same Moses, although he had composed the words of the Old Testament in letters, had nevertheless intimated separately certain more secret mysteries, out of the hidden [things] of the law, to the seventy elders, who should thenceforth remain doctors; of which doctrine the Lord also makes mention in the Gospel, saying, UPON the chair of Moses have sat the scribes and Pharisees: [margin: Matt. 23:2-3] all things therefore, whatsoever they shall say to you, keep, and do; but according to their works do ye not. The doctrine, therefore, of these remained unto posterity; which, received from the very writing of the law, was preserved in this number and service of the elders. Thus Hilary. Since therefore, down to the time of the Babylonian captivity, nothing had been written concerning this more secret exposition, Esdras, after the rebuilding of the city and the law restored by him, willed that this Kabbalistic explanation should be committed to the monuments of letters, lest perchance it should be lost on account of the captivities and Jewish dispersions, in which the order and ancient custom of delivering the Kabbalah by hand [i.e., by succession] could not be kept. Having therefore called to him most faithful notaries, he reduced all the mysteries of the Kabbalah into 70 books, according to the number of the seventy elders of the synagogue, to be communicated thereafter to the wise alone. These books, therefore, bought up for me at great expense, when I had diligently read them through, I found in them many things — nay, well-nigh all — consonant with our faith, wherewith Christians may transfix the Jews with their own weapons: among whom the authority of the Kabbalists is in great honor and reverence. This, then, is the Kabbalah of which I believe I first made explicit mention among the Latins. Thus far Pico. [3]

Moreover, because by decree of the holy Roman Inquisition all the books pertaining to the Kabbalah were lately condemned, it is to be known that there is a twofold Kabbalah — the one true, the other false. [4] True and pious is that which, as we already said, elucidates the arcane mysteries of the sacred law according to anagogy; which indeed, in the third volume of this work, we shall show to be necessary for the interpretation of the divine scripture, bringing forward some of the illustrious expositors, as well Greek as Latin, who use it in their explanations. This, therefore, the Church has never condemned. [5] False and impious is that Kabbalah

[which is] a certain counterfeit kind of Jewish tradition, which certain wicked Jews say has flowed down from Moses through the fathers even to themselves — stuffed with innumerable vanities and falsities, differing nothing, or little, from Necromancy. For it unfolds certain secret names of God, and their occult virtues; by which some Necromancers among the Jews use, for the binding of demons and the working of illusions, asserting that our Christ wrought all his miracles by the help of this art. This kind of superstition, therefore, improperly called Kabbalah, the Church in recent years has deservedly condemned. [6]

ESDRAS's Pentateuch — a single and oblong membrane [scroll] of his, written (as the Hebrews believe) by the hand of Esdras, without any vowel points — is preserved with the highest veneration in our monastery of the Preachers at Bologna.

ESDRAS's Dream and prophecy of the fates of the Roman monarchy is a book fabricated by the heretics of our times; which the Senate of the holy Roman Inquisition willed to be held, by name, among the condemned writings.

ESTHER, wife of Artaxerxes (or Ahasuerus), king of the Persians, wrote to the Jews living under her husband's empire two epistles concerning the solemnity of Purim — that is, of Lots — to be celebrated forever. These Lysimachus, son of Ptolemy, turned out of the Persian tongue into Greek. Esther, chapters 9 and 11.

He describes first the bitterness of the sickness, then the benefit of health restored by God. See Isaiah, chapter thirty-eight. The same [Hezekiah] wrote Of the feast of the Passover kept outside the time appointed in the law — that is,

[→ that] is, on the fourteenth day of the second month, in celebrating [the Passover] — one epistle, of which mention is made in 2 Paralipomenon, chapter 30. He wrote also, as some think, the history of the book of Judges. [1]

EZEKIEL the Prophet's Apocryphal book is cited by Athanasius in the Synopsis; which perhaps is one of the two books of prophecies and oracles which Josephus, in the fifth chapter of the tenth book of the Antiquities, reports to have been written by Ezekiel.

F.

THE WRITING OF THE COVENANT OF THE JEWS is had in the ninth chapter of Nehemiah; in which place it is narrated how the people of Israel, returned from the captivity of Babylon, struck a covenant with God, promising that they would thenceforth keep his law — a public writing being added, and an oath, for the confirmation of the covenant. And they sealed the writing; and to it, in the name of the whole people, subscribed the princes, priests, and Levites, all of the Jews.

THE BOOK OF THE COVENANT, in Hebrew ספר הברית Sepher ha-berith, for which the Seventy interpreters rendered Τὸ βιβλίον διαθήκης, that is, The Book of the testament, is commemorated in the twenty-fourth chapter of Exodus in these words: [2] AND MOSES wrote all the words of the Lord, and built an altar… and they offered holocausts, and immolated twelve calves. And Moses took half part of the blood, and put it into bowls; but the remaining part he poured upon the altar. And taking the book of the covenant, he read it, the people hearing; who said, ALL that the Lord hath spoken, we will do, and we will be obedient. But he took the blood and sprinkled it upon the people, and said, THIS is the blood of the covenant which the Lord hath struck with you upon all these words. Which covenant indeed Paul, some rites being super-added, in the ninth chapter of the epistle to the Hebrews thus expressed: [3] THE FIRST [testament] indeed was not dedicated without blood. For after Moses had read every commandment of the law to the whole people, taking the blood of calves and goats, with water and hyssop, he sprinkled both the book itself and the people, saying, THIS is the blood of the testament which God hath enjoined unto you. These things we have in the divine letters concerning the Book of the Covenant; which was so called [4] because it was as it were a handwriting [chirographum] of the covenant entered into between God and the people of Israel, containing in itself the promises of God to the people, and of the people to God. For such was the benignity of God, that, although he was free from all law and pact, he yet willed to bind himself as it were by an instrument and contract [5] — that even thus he might render the Hebrews the more certain that he would never fail his promises; and that they themselves might acknowledge themselves the more strictly bound to execute what they had of their own accord promised in this Book of the Covenant, as out of a bond [syngrapha]. He willed also that the promises of this covenant, made on both sides, should be confirmed by the effusion of blood and the slaying of animals, according to the common custom of all nations; which, sheep being slain and by the blood of victims, joined mutual covenants among themselves. That this custom flowed down, from a most ancient usage, even to the Alban and Roman kings, Virgil shows in these verses:

> [Aeneid 8]
> Afterward the same kings, a combat being set between them,
>
> armed, before the altars of Jove, and holding bowls,
>
> stood, and joined covenants by a slain sow.
> [Aeneid 12]
> With such words they confirmed covenants among themselves, > in the midst of the sight of the nobles: then they duly slaughter
>
>
> the consecrated beasts into the flame, and tear out the entrails

But concerning the writing of this volume there is a threefold opinion. [6] The Jewish interpreters, among whom Rabbi Solomon [Rashi], say that the volume was the whole course of the Mosaic narration, from the beginning of Genesis even to the end of the 19th chapter of the book of Exodus; in which are had all the covenants and pacts which God sanctioned with their fathers Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, together with the other deeds of the Israelite people even to the delivery of the law; which [delivery] the twentieth chapter of Exodus relates [to have been made] after the writing of this volume was composed. Augustine judges that in this volume there were only the justifications — that is, the judicial and ceremonial mandates — which are recited from the twentieth even to the twenty-fourth chapter of Exodus, the ten moral precepts of the decalogue excepted; which, although Moses reviewed them in the 20th chapter of Exodus (the rule of anticipation being kept, usual among the divine writers), he nevertheless shows afterward, in the 24th chapter, that the decalogue was written by God on stone tablets after the publication of that volume. Thomas Cajetan reckons that in the present volume are comprehended, first and before all, the ten moral mandates, and then the other laws of judgments and ceremonies, promulgated by Moses before the promulgation of the law on the tablets; and this he urges from the very name of covenant which is attributed to the volume. For the sum and head of the whole covenant between God and the people consists in the obligation of the ten precepts. Whence also Moses named the tablets, in which those ten precepts are contained, the Tablets of the covenant. And since God had not yet revealed to him that he would at some time write the laws of the decalogue on tablets, it behooved him, at the beginning of this volume, to write down the ten precepts already brought forth from the mouth of God, that the writing of the pact — which was confirmed by the sprinkling of blood — might be whole and complete; and that the covenant also might be entire, whereby the people, especially through the obligation of the decalogue, were joined to God.

GAD the Prophet, in Hebrew גד הנביא חזה דוד Gad ha-navi, choze David, that is, Gad the Prophet, the Seer of David [7] [8] (whom the Lord sent to king David, that he might offer him one of three punishments to be chosen, on account of the crime of the numbered people — that is, either seven years' famine, or a three-months' persecution by enemies, or a three-days' pestilence), composed a most copious universal history of the life of king David, [9] and of the deeds done everywhere on earth in his time; which is reviewed at the end of the former book of Paralipomenon in these words: [10] NOW THE DEEDS of king David, the first and the last, are written in the volume of Samuel the Seer, and in the book of Nathan the Prophet, and of Gad the Seer, and [the deeds] of all his kingdom and might, and of the times which passed under him, whether in Israel or in all the kingdoms of the lands:

GAIUS, the beloved host of the Apostles (concerning whom Paul, writing to the Romans, says: GAIUS my host SALUTETH you) [1] was — as Dorotheus of Tyre testifies in the Synopsis — bishop of the church of Ephesus after Titus, a disciple of Paul. [2] Athanasius, in the Synopsis, hands down that he wrote at Ephesus, from the mouth of John the Apostle, a Gospel, which is now inscribed According to John. But Simon Metaphrastes, in the life of John the Evangelist, has committed to memory that Prochorus, the apostolic deacon, put this same Gospel into writing on the island of Patmos, John dictating. [3]

THE ENDLESS GENEALOGIES. Concerning these Paul, in the former epistle to Timothy, says: [4] ATTEND not to endless Genealogies, which afford questions rather than edification. And in the epistle to Titus he says: [5] Avoid Genealogies and contentions. [6] Jerome, in the commentaries on the epistle to Titus, and in the third commentary on Isaiah, says that these are certain constitutions of the Jews, called by the Greeks δευτερώσεις [deuteroses], which the Hebrews Akiba, Meir, Johanan, and Eliezer first committed to writing. Augustine, in the second book against the adversary of the law, chapter one, reports that these deuteroses were not written among the Jews, but held by memory, and transfused from one to another by speaking; [7] in which the Jews hand down that God created for the first man two women, out of whom afterward they weave infinite genealogies.

THE GREAT BOOK, in Hebrew גליון גדול Ghilaion gadol, which the Seventy interpreters rendered [8] Τόμον καινὸν μέγαν, that is, a New great volume, [9] is a paper, or large page, rollable upon itself in the manner of a coil — commonly called by the notaries a Roll [Rotulus] — on which God commanded Isaiah to write, in larger letters, these four Hebrew words: מהר שלל חש בז Maher shalal, chash baz, [10] that is, Hasten to the prey, make speed to the spoil. For which our Vulgate edition reads, Swiftly take away the spoils, speedily plunder. But the Seventy interpreters have Τοῦ ἐξέως προνομὴν ποιῆσαι σκύλων, that is, That he may swiftly make plundering of spoils. But some have, Call his name SWIFT-SPOILING, SPEEDY-PREY; and others, A swift plunderer, a hasty spoiler. [11] Now this writing showed forth the name which Isaiah, by divine command, was to impose on his son — whom, as Chrysostom says, he was soon to have by his wife the prophetess. For God willed by this name to portend the imminent plundering of the Israelite kingdom, whereby, a little after — before that lately-born infant should begin to prattle — the king of the Assyrians plundered Damascus and Samaria, the metropolis of Israel; as Isaiah testifies in these words: [12] AND THE LORD SAID to me, Take thee a great book, and write in it with a man's pen: SWIFTLY TAKE AWAY THE SPOILS, SPEEDILY PLUNDER. And I took to me faithful witnesses, Uriah the priest, and Zechariah the son of Barachiah: and I went to the prophetess; and she conceived, and bore a son. And the Lord said to me, Call his name, HASTEN, TAKE AWAY THE SPOILS, MAKE SPEED TO PLUNDER; for before he shall know to call his father and his mother, the strength of Damascus shall be taken away, and the spoils of Samaria, before the king of the Assyrians, &c.

THERE ARE THOSE who think that these words are not to be understood of the son of Isaiah the Prophet; because it is not likely that the prophet, endowed with the highest modesty and honesty, would have brought in witnesses to observe him uniting with his wife — and those especially [as] witnesses whereof the one, namely Zechariah, son of Barachiah, was not yet born; but the other, namely Uriah the priest, was altogether unworthy in the authority and name of a witness, especially in divine mysteries, since he was unfaithful; and, as the fourth book of Kings reports, [13] had built an altar like to the altar of the city of Damascus, on which he offered victims and holocausts, together with the impious king Ahaz, to the gods of the gentiles. Whom Uriah, even if the prophet had brought him in with him, he would nevertheless not have called a faithful witness, saying, I TOOK TO ME FAITHFUL WITNESSES. Then, neither does the age of the infant seem to agree with the time of the Samaritan plundering, which the prophet had foretold as future before the boy should begin to speak. For that [plundering], as the fourth book of Kings is witness, [14] happened in the sixth year of Hezekiah, king of Judah, and the ninth year of Hosea, king of Israel; at which time the boy had already reached the eighteenth year of his age. For so many years flowed from the fourth year of Ahaz, in which the boy was born and the book was written, even to the sixth year of Hezekiah, king of Judah, and the ninth year of Hosea, reigning over Israel in Samaria — when Shalmaneser, king of the Assyrians, devastated Samaria, and carried the Israelites into the Assyrians, and placed them in Halah, and in Habor by the river Gozan, in the cities of the Medes, as is narrated in the fourth book of Kings. [15] But we easily meet these [objections], saying that Isaiah brought those witnesses with him, not for the spectacle of a carnal coition, but for the beholding and hearing of the writing of the book. And he took with him Zechariah, son of Barachiah — not that one indeed who was not yet brought forth among the living, but another Zechariah, of the same name and surname, living at the same time. He summoned also Uriah the priest as a faithful witness; and he called him faithful, not by worship and religion toward God, whom [Uriah] himself worshipped not, but by fidelity and obsequiousness toward king Ahaz, with whom Uriah was held most faithful. And this [man] especially Isaiah willed to be present, that — an idolatrous man, and hostile to the prophets of God — having inspected the writing of the prophecy, he might straightway, in hatred of the prophecy, carry the whole matter to the idolatrous business [i.e., report it to Ahaz]. But the depopulation whereof the prophecy is here written is not that in which Shalmaneser carried Israel into Media, in the sixth year of Hezekiah and the ninth of Hosea; but another, which was made nearly fifteen years before, about the sixth, seventh, and eighth year of Ahaz, king of Judah, when Pekah, son of Remaliah, [and] Rezin, king of Syria, and Tiglath-pileser, king of the Assyrians, laid waste Israel and Judah, and carried off an immense prey, together with all the vessels and ornaments of the temple; which king Ahaz delivered to Tiglath-pileser, king of the Assyrians, as is written in the second [book] of Paralipomenon.

There are likewise those who both acutely and piously interpret this place mystically, [16] asserting that this matter is narrated by the prophet as done not corporeally, but spiritually; and that accordingly the introduction of the witnesses, the coition of the prophet, and the nativity of the infant, are thus to be expounded according to allegory: so that by the prophetess [is meant] the Virgin, mother of God and of our Lord Jesus Christ,

[→ by Uriah] let us understand — not that impious priest of king Ahaz, but Uriah the prophet, son of Shemaiah, a contemporary of Jeremiah the prophet, whom Jeremiah writes to have prophesied in the name of the Lord; [1] and by Zechariah, that one who is numbered eleventh among the twelve prophets. Finally, in the infant, whose name is HASTEN TO THE PREY, MAKE SPEED TO THE SPOIL, let us recognize that Lion of the tribe of Judah, to whom, many ages before, Jacob had said, [2] THOU ART GONE UP TO THE PREY, my son; thy hands [shall be] on the necks of thine enemies — that is, Christ Jesus our Savior, of the tribe of Judah according to the flesh; who, the world being overcome, the kingdom of sin destroyed, Satan cast down, hell despoiled, death slain, and all his enemies vanquished, routed, and prostrated, ascended into heaven, victor and triumphant, laden with the spoils of his enemies, leading captivity captive — bringing with him from the lower regions the ranks of the redeemed captive fathers, exulting before him, as victors exult when, the prey being taken, they divide the spoils. Epiphanius, bishop of Salamis, in the first book against the heresies, tome 2, teaches that this [3] Great Book is the womb of the Virgin Mary, [4] deservedly called great, because it comprehended the incomprehensible [one], whom heaven and earth cannot contain. Basil, in the commentaries on Isaiah, [5] writes thus of this book according to allegory: PERHAPS this Tome, or volume, or new and great book, is a certain adumbration and figure of the new and great testament, described with a man's pen — because the words of the gospel are set down in human speech, or character, that they may easily be heard by anyone. In which indeed it is written, that there should be a swift plundering of spoils. For the doctrine of the gospel, swifter than any lightning, reaches even to the utmost limits of the habitable earth, spoiling the prince of this world, and leading over to the rendering of obedience to Christ those whom that robber held captive.

H.

THE GOSPEL OF THE HEBREWS, which is inscribed ACCORDING TO THE HEBREWS, or [according to] the SYRIANS, was — as appears from the monuments of the ancients — not one, but several: of which three chiefly are those which are called [the Gospels] of the Nazarenes, of the Ebionites, and of the Encratites.

Now the Gospel of the Ebionites, According to the Hebrews, [6] is the same as the Hebrew Gospel of Matthew, but changed by the heretics of Ebion — followers of adulterous [doctrines] — and in many places mutilated and cut short. Out of which Epiphanius, in the first book against the heresies, disputing against the heresy of the Ebionites, inserts a long fragment, writing thus: THE BEGINNING OF THE GOSPEL which is called Hebrew, among them has thus: It came to pass in the days of Herod, king of Judaea, and of Caiaphas the pontiff, there came a certain one, John by name, baptizing a baptism of penance in the river Jordan; who was said to be of the race of Aaron the priest, son of Zechariah and Elizabeth; and all went out to him. And there came a certain man, named JESUS, about thirty years old; and he was baptized by John. And as he came up from the water, the heavens were opened, and he saw the Spirit of God in the likeness of a dove descending and entering into him. And a voice was made from heaven, saying, THOU ART MY BELOVED SON, IN WHOM I AM WELL PLEASED; THIS DAY HAVE I BEGOTTEN THEE. And straightway a great light shone round about him. And when John had seen it, he says to him: Who art thou, Lord? And again a voice from heaven [came] to him, THIS IS MY BELOVED SON, IN WHOM I AM WELL PLEASED. And then John, falling down before him, said: I beseech thee, Lord, baptize thou me. But he forbade him, saying: Suffer it, for so it is fitting that all things be fulfilled. And Jesus, coming — who chose us — into Capernaum, entered into the house of Simon, called Peter; and opening his mouth, as he passed by the lake of Tiberias, he said: I chose John and James, sons of Zebedee, and Simon, and Andrew, and Philip, and Bartholomew, and Judas, and Thaddaeus, and Thomas, and Simon the Zealot, and Judas Iscariot; and thee, Matthew, sitting at the toll-booth, I called, and thou followedst me. You, therefore, I will to be twelve Apostles for a testimony of Israel, &c. These things concerning the gospel of the Ebionites.

The OTHER, the GOSPEL OF THE ENCRATITES, [7] once used by the Encratites themselves, the same Epiphanius, in the first book, heresy 46, hands down to have been collected by Tatian the Syrian, author of the Encratite sect, out of the four evangelists, and digested into one consonance of a continuous narration, which he called the Diatessaron, that is, One out of four. Theodoret, bishop of Cyrus [Cyrenensis], in the first book of the Heretical fables, left thus written concerning this Gospel: TATIAN also composed a Gospel, which is called the Diatessaron, that is, One out of four — the genealogies being cut off, and the other [things] whatsoever show the Lord to have been born of David according to the flesh. And this was used not only by those who are of his sect, but also by those who follow the apostolic dogmas, not perceiving the fraud of the composition, but using it more simply, as a compendious book. I myself also found more than two hundred books of this kind, which were held in honor in our churches; all of which, when I had gathered them together, I put away, and in their place I put back the gospels of the four Evangelists. Thus Theodoret concerning Tatian's gospel; which now is extant, together with the genealogy of Christ itself, translated of old by Victor, bishop of Capua; and the beginning of it is, FORASMUCH AS INDEED MANY HAVE TAKEN IN HAND.

THE GOSPEL OF THE NAZARENES [8] was so called because it was in use among the Nazarenes, who, together with the evangelical doctrine of Christ, believed the Mosaic ceremonies also were to be kept. From this [source] certain places and opinions in the sacred four gospels which we now have are thought by the most ancient fathers to have been transfused: such as that opinion in Matthew, THOU SHALT LOVE THY NEIGHBOR AS THYSELF, which Origen thinks taken out of this gospel. And in the eighth tractate on Matthew, adducing a certain place of this gospel whence this testimony was received, he writes thus: AS TO THAT which he says, THOU SHALT LOVE THY NEIGHBOR AS THYSELF, [margin: Matt 19:19] I can suspect [that it was] not placed by the Lord in this place, but added by some I-know-not-whom, not understanding [it]. And that this was added he proves by this, that when Mark and Luke expound this same place, neither of them added [it]. [margin: Mark 10; Luke 18] Ne-

[→ for ne-]-ver would Mark and Luke have passed over this capital and greatest precept. But this is written in the Gospel which is called ACCORDING TO THE HEBREWS — if it please anyone to receive it. Another of the rich men said to him: Master, what good thing shall I do that I may live? He said to him, Man, do the laws and the prophets. He answered him, I have done [them]. He said to him, Go, sell all that thou possessest, and divide it among the poor; and come, follow me. But the rich man began to scratch his head, and it pleased him not. And the Lord said to him, How sayest thou, I have done the law and the prophets? — since it is written in the law, THOU SHALT LOVE THY NEIGHBOR AS THYSELF; and behold, thy brethren, the sons of Abraham, are clad with dung, dying of hunger; and thy house is full of goods, and nothing at all goeth out of it to them. And turning, he said to Simon his disciple, sitting by him, SIMON, SON OF JOHN, IT IS EASIER FOR A CAMEL TO ENTER THROUGH THE EYE OF A NEEDLE THAN A RICH MAN INTO THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN. Eusebius, in the third book of the Ecclesiastical History, indicates that from this Gospel was taken that history which is now had in the Gospel of John, chapter eight, concerning the woman taken in adultery; which Euthymius Zigabenus denies to have been in the ancient copies. This very gospel was, among the ancient fathers, received among other venerable writings, for the edification of the Church. And although Eusebius writes that it was at some time contradicted in the church, Bede nevertheless, at the beginning of the commentaries on Luke, [1] speaks thus of it: IT IS TO BE NOTED that he called the Gospel According to the Hebrews (which the Nazarenes use) to be numbered not among the Apocrypha, but among the Ecclesiastical histories. For it seemed good to Jerome himself, the interpreter of sacred scripture, to take from it very many testimonies, and to translate it into the Latin and Greek tongue. That these words of Bede are true, divers places in the works of Jerome show; who, in the Catalog of illustrious men, [2] taking a testimony for James, the brother of the Lord, out of this gospel, says thus: THE GOSPEL which is called ACCORDING TO THE HEBREWS, lately translated by me into the Greek and Latin tongue (which Origen often uses), relates thus concerning James, after the resurrection of the Savior: BUT THE LORD, when he had given the linen cloth to the servant of the priest, went to James, and appeared to him. For James had sworn that he would not eat bread from that hour in which he had drunk the cup of the Lord, until he should see him rising from the dead. And again, a little after: BRING, said the Lord, a table and bread. And straightway it is added: He took bread, and blessed, and broke, and gave to James the Just, and said to him, My brother, eat thy bread, for the Son of man is risen from among them that sleep. Thus Jerome; who, in the same book, speaking of Ignatius, says: IGNATIUS wrote one epistle to the Smyrnaeans, in which, concerning the Gospel lately translated by me, he places a testimony upon the person of Christ, saying, But I, even after the resurrection, saw him in the flesh; and I believe that he is [so]. And when he came to Peter, and to those who were with Peter, he said to them, BEHOLD, handle [me], for I am not a bodiless demon. And straightway they touched him, and believed. Again, in the third book against the Pelagians, [3] he says: IN THE GOSPEL according to the Hebrews — which is written in the Chaldee and Syriac tongue, but with Hebrew letters (which the Nazarenes use even to this day, [the Gospel] according to the Apostles, or, as most suppose, According to Matthew), and which is had in the library of Caesarea — the history relates: AND BEHOLD, the mother of the Lord and his brethren said to him, John the Baptist baptizeth unto the remission of sins; let us go, and be baptized by him. But he said to them, What have I sinned, that I should go and be baptized by him? The authority of this scripture is received also by Origen's teacher, Clement of Alexandria; who, when in the second book of the Stromata he wished to establish that wonder is the first step toward the perfect knowledge of God, [4] took thence the confirmation of his saying, saying: FOR THIS REASON it is written in the Gospel according to the Hebrews, HE WHO SHALL HAVE WONDERED SHALL REIGN, and he who shall reign shall rest. There is cited also out of this Gospel by Origen, in the second Tome on John, another opinion, in these words: CHRIST SAID, Just now my mother, the Holy Spirit, took me by one of my hairs, and carried me to the great mountain Tabor. Which opinion, unless it be candidly considered, seems to contain the heresy of the Gnostics and Valentinians, asserting the Holy Spirit to be the mother of Christ. [5] Wherefore Origen, in the place already cited, says that this is to be so interpreted that we say the Holy Spirit is called the mother of Christ not by nature and generation, but by imitation of maternal piety [6] — that is, because the Holy Spirit always does the will of the Father; AND EVERYONE, says Christ, WHO DOETH THE WILL OF MY FATHER, WHO IS IN HEAVEN, HE IS MY FATHER AND MY MOTHER. That Hegesippus, who was near to the times of the Apostles, related many things out of this Gospel, Eusebius, in the fourth [book] of the Ecclesiastical History, is witness.

ELDAD AND MEDAD, prophets (upon whom, as is read in the fifth chapter of Numbers [so printed; = Num. 11:26], the Spirit of the Lord rested), when they prophesied in the solitude of Arabia, in the camp of Israel — Joshua, fearing lest the estimation of them among the people should in any way diminish the authority of Moses, admonished Moses to inhibit their office of prophesying. To whom Moses, in no way offended at the honors of others, [7] placidly answered: WHY art thou jealous for me? Who shall grant that all the people may prophesy, and the Lord give them his spirit? [8] The vaticinations, therefore, of these were comprehended, by an uncertain author, in a single book; out of which Hermas, the disciple of Paul, in the first book of the Pastor, chapter two, took a testimony in these words: THE LORD is near to those who convert themselves to him, as it is written in Eldad and Medad, who prophesied to the people in the solitude. The author of the Hebraic Traditions, which are prefixed with the title of Jerome, [9] writes that Eldad and Medad are the same whom the former book of the annals, chapter 4, calls Epher and Jalon, of the tribe of Levi, sons of Ezra [10] — who is also called Amram, and was the father of Moses. For Moses, after receiving the law in the desert, enjoined his mother to put away his father Amram, because she was his [Amram's] aunt; for she was a daughter of Levi. After which separation, Amram took another wife, of whom he begat these two sons, Eldad and Medad. Athanasius, in the Synopsis, numbers this book among the Apocrypha.

[→ he drew down] fire; he brought rain by his tongue [i.e., his prayer]; he raised the dead; and at last he was taken up into heaven in a whirlwind of fire. He, when Joram, king of Jerusalem, compelled the people to ascend the groves set on high mountains, and there to worship strange deities, wrote to him a letter, [1] in which he threatened him the inevitable vengeance of God for this cause — that, the example of his fathers being despised, he had betaken himself to following the impiety of the Israelite kings; and, not content with this, had also impelled the tribe of Judah and the citizens of Jerusalem, the native religion being forsaken, to revolt to foreign rites; and besides, that he had killed his brothers and other good and just men — for which crimes the punishment that hung over him. In the same letter he signified this also: that enemies should lay waste his people and his domestic family, sparing neither children nor wives; and that he himself, vexed by a slow flux of the belly, his intestines gradually flowing out, would late, out of these torments, recognize his fault, and, imploring the help of God in vain, would breathe out his miserable soul. The argument of this letter one may see in the second [book] of Paralipomenon, chapter 21. [2]

THERE IS CARRIED [ABOUT] also a certain book under the name of Elijah, which is inscribed The Ascension, or Assumption, or Apocalypse, or Secrets of Elijah; concerning which Origen thinks that Paul, in the first epistle to the Corinthians, received that testimony, [3] WHICH THE EYE HATH NOT SEEN, &c. For he writes thus, in the thirty-fifth tractate on Matthew: THE APOSTLE brings forth certain secret scriptures; as when he says somewhere, WHICH THE EYE HATH NOT SEEN, NOR EAR HEARD. For in no canonical book is this found placed, except in the Secrets of Elijah the prophet. Thus Origen. Jerome, on the 64th chapter of Isaiah, expounding those words out of the same chapter, FROM THE AGE THEY HAVE NOT HEARD, NEITHER HAVE THEY RECEIVED, &c., says: THE APOCALYPSE of Elijah has this testimony; and by this occasion silly little women were deceived. [The Apocalypse of Elijah] is cited in the Synopsis of Athanasius among the books rejected as of Apocryphal authorship, [namely] of Elijah the prophet.

STRATONICUS, bishop of Cumae, in his Collections, cites out of the Book of the Traditions of Elijah the Prophet a certain prediction concerning the consummation of the world — that it shall be future in the six-thousandth year from its creation. [4] I judge this to be that tradition which is read in the Talmudic volumes of the Hebrews, in the tractate Sanhedrin, chapter ■elech [■eleq], in these plain words: תרי אלפי ימות המשיח, תרי אלפי תורה, תרי אלפי תהו, וחד חרב, שית אלפי שני להוי עלמא [the Hebrew is set confusingly in the primary scan; the reading follows the edition's own transliteration and Latin] — scitta alphe sene le heue alma, vechad thareb, be alaphim tohu, be alaphim tora, be alaphim iemot hamasciach — which we may interpret in this manner: The world shall be six thousand years, and again shall be destroyed; two thousand of emptiness [tohu], two thousand of the law, two thousand of the days of the Messiah. Nor is this to be passed over in this place: I judge that Elijah is called by the Hebrews the continuator of the seventh age of human [life]. [5] For they assert that seven men continued the whole human life, unbroken, from the beginning of the world even to its end. [6] The first man [was] Adam; him Methuselah saw, and stretched his life from the first man even to Methuselah; Methuselah saw Shem, son of Noah; Shem reached even to Jacob; Jacob even to Amram, father of Moses; Amram reached even to Ahijah the Shilonite; and Ahijah even to Elijah; but Elijah even to the end of the world.

ENOCH, or חנוך Chenoc, the seventh from Adam, son of Jared, grandson of Malaleel, great-grandson of Kenan, great-great-grandson of Enos, [who was] grandson of Adam — a man from that very age most just, and worshipping God with the highest religion — [7] wrote (as Origen testifies in the last homily on Numbers) several prophetic booklets; out of which Jude the Apostle, in his Catholic epistle against the impious seducers, received a formidable testimony concerning the last judgment, saying thus: [8] AND ENOCH ALSO, the seventh from Adam, prophesied of these, saying, Behold, the Lord cometh in his holy thousands, to do judgment against all, and to reprove all the impious of all the works of their impiety, wherewith they have wickedly done, and of all the hard [things] which impious sinners have spoken against God. Augustine, concerning this volume, in the 18th [book] Of the City of God, thus says: [9] ENOCH, the seventh from Adam, is declared to have prophesied in the canonical [epistle] of the Apostle Jude; whose writings — that they should not be in authority, whether among the Jews or among us — their too-great antiquity brought about, on account of which they seemed suspect, lest false [things] be brought forth for true. For there are brought forth certain [writings] said to be his by those who, according to their own sense, believe promiscuously what they will; but the chastity of the canon has not received [them] — not that the authority of those men who pleased God is reproved, but that these are not believed to be theirs. Thus Augustine. Jerome, in the catalog of Ecclesiastical writers, [10] teaches that the epistle of Jude was, on account of the testimony taken out of this Apocryphal book, of old rejected by very many of the ecclesiastical fathers. And in the commentaries on the epistle to Titus he adds that the Apostle Jude did not approve this whole book, but only this testimony concerning the judgment against the impious, whose authority he received into his epistle. But of what kind the argument of this book was, is unknown; [11] it appears, however, from the monuments of the Fathers, that there were in it certain chapters: Of the number and names of the stars, and their secret virtues; Of the descent of the sons of God to the daughters of men; Of the giants begotten of the coition of angels; Of the last judgment of God against the impious — concerning which the present testimony of Jude is brought forth. Origen indeed, making words of these chapters, in the 28th homily of the book of Numbers [12] writes thus: HE WHO made the multitude of the stars — as the prophet says — calls them all by names; of which names, indeed, very many are contained, as secret and arcane [things], in the booklets which are called ENOCH. But because these booklets themselves do not seem to be held in authority among the Hebrews, we shall defer for the present to bring forward as an example the [things] which are named in them. Likewise, in the commentaries on John, tome six, speaking of the descent of souls into bodies, he says: IN ENOCH it is written (if only anyone should be willing to approve it as a holy book), IN the days of the descent of the sons of God to the daughters of men. Which descent some have thought to signify obscurely the descent of souls into bodies — that the daughters of men is obscurely and tropically said [to be] the earthly tabernacle. But Augustine, in the 15th book Of the City of God, chapter 23, speaking of the giants, says thus: THAT indeed some divine [writings] were written by that Enoch, the seventh from Adam, we cannot deny, since the Apostle Jude says this in the canonical epistle; but they are not in the canon of the scriptures; whence those things which are put forth under his name

[→ are put] forth, and contain those fables about the giants [1] — that [certain] men had no [human] fathers — [and] are rightly judged by the prudent not to be believed his. Thus Augustine. But in a most ancient volume, whose title is THE TESTAMENT OF THE TWELVE PATRIARCHS (which Origen and Procopius often cite), many vaticinations are inserted out of the book of Enoch — namely, Of the things which were to befall the sons and grandsons of the twelve Patriarchs; [margin: Num. 11] Of the future crimes and punishments of the Hebrews; Of the Savior of the world to be slain by the Hebrews; Of the overthrow, captivity, and perpetual dispersion of the Hebrews among the nations. John Annius, in the commentaries on Berosus, writes that in the same volume of Enoch there was a celebrated vaticination concerning the twin destructions of the whole earth [2] — the one to be by inundation, the other by burning; and he adds that this same vaticination was engraved by Enoch on two columns, the one of stone, the other of brick, for a perennial admonition of posterity: so that, if it should chance that the brick one were destroyed by the flood, the stone one, surviving, might preserve the writing committed to it. Josephus makes mention of both columns in the first [book] of the Antiquities, affirming also that the stone one existed in Syria in his own times. Tertullian, in the book On the dress of women, [3] meeting those who say that this book — if it had been written by Enoch before the flood — could not have come safe to posterity after the flood, shows that this is not incredible, either because Noah himself preserved it in the ark, or because — [it] having been abolished by the inundation of the flood — someone, illumined by the Holy Spirit, restored it, as by Esdras the sacred volumes were restored after the captivity. [4] Wherefore he reckons that the authority of this writing is not to be rejected.

ENOCH LIVED, [5] engaged in this exile of our mortality, three hundred and sixty-five years — that is, unto the one thousand and fifteenth year of the founded world. Which years being completed, he walked (as Moses says) with God, [6] and was not, because God took him. [7] But how, and into what place, God took him, is not equally certain among all the expositors of the sacred letters. [8] Aben Ezra [Ibn Ezra] and some of the Jews interpret that word, GOD TOOK HIM, [as] He died — and indeed before [his] time, lest malice should change his heart; because it is a custom of scriptural speech to say that he is taken who is taken from life, according to that [saying] of Elijah, Take my soul; [9] and of Job, After a little he shall take me. [10] Philo the Jew, in the book Of the life of the wise man, following the translation of the Seventy (who rendered this place ὅτι μετέθηκεν αὐτὸν ὁ θεός, that is, Because God translated him), says that God translated Enoch not through death, but through a separation from the fellowship and frequency of wicked men, to a retreat of virtue unknown to the vulgar, and scarcely known to a few — and those the most excellent men. Procopius the Sophist, on Genesis, seems to hint that the translation of Enoch was not death, but a certain change from a mortal to an immortal body. Augustine, in the ninth book on Genesis, and in the book On the merits of sinners, denies that Enoch was changed into that spiritual quality of body which is promised in the resurrection; and thinks that he will again return to this life, and die, that the animal body may be changed into a spiritual [one]; but that meanwhile he is either sustained by God without food (as Elijah lived forty days without food), or, if he needs food, is perhaps fed in paradise, as Adam [was] of the tree of life, and thence receives, against the oldness [of age], a stability of life. Irenaeus, in the fifth book against the heresy of Valentinus, asserts that he lives, together with Elijah, in the same paradise in which the first man was placed by God. Jerome, in the first book against Jovinian — perhaps by a slip of memory — attributes this translation not to Enoch, but to Enos, of whom Enoch was the great-great-grandson, saying: IF, HOWEVER, Enos is translated, I do not think Enos was translated on that account because he had a wife, but because he first invoked God. Chrysostom and Theodoret say that it is not to be too curiously investigated whither he was translated, and whether he lives even to the present, and how he now fares; but that it is enough that we believe both that God translated him, and that he translated him living, and that he did not experience death — as Paul also testifies to the Hebrews, saying: [11] BY FAITH Enoch was translated, that he should not see death; and he was not found, because God translated him. Gregory the Theologian [Nazianzen], in the second book Of Theology, says: ENOCH, although he was translated hence, yet it is not yet established whether he comprehended the nature of God, or is still to comprehend it.

HERMAS, disciple of the Apostle Paul (of whom [Paul] himself, writing to the Romans, makes mention, saying: [12] SALUTE Phlegon, Hermas, Patrobas, Hermes, and the brethren that are with them), put forth a work in the Greek tongue, distinguished into three books: [13] whereof the first is inscribed THE CHURCH, because in it four visions of the Church are narrated; the second is entitled THE PASTOR [Shepherd], because in it an Angel — the shepherd, protector, and guardian of Hermas himself, who is also called the angel-messenger of penance — proposes twelve precepts of living well; the third, because it contains ten similitudes explained by the same Shepherd, is called OF THE SIMILITUDES. Custom, however, afterward prevailed that the whole work should be called by the title OF THE PASTOR, or PASTORAL. This was of old publicly read in certain churches of Greece, for the instruction of those who were being trained in the first elements toward the institution of faith; and many of the ancients used its testimonies for the confirmation of dogmas [14] — as Clement of Alexandria in the sixth book of the Stromata, Origen in the eighth homily on Numbers, homily 10 on Joshua, homily 35 on Luke, and books one, two, and four of the Periarchon; Athanasius in the book On the Incarnation of Christ; Irenaeus in the first book against the heresies; John Cassian in the 13th Conference, chapter twelve; and very many other most ancient authors. After whose times the authority of this book gradually failed, and at length was rejected by Gelasius among the writings of doubtful faith [15] — as I judge, for the subversion of the heretics, who thence took supports for their execrable dogmas. For (that I be silent of the rest) the Arians, Athanasius being witness, in the epistle to the bishops of Africa, maintained that the Son of God was created by the Father out of things not existing, or out of nothing; because in the first precept of the second book of the Pastoral it was written: FIRST OF ALL, believe that there is one God, who created all things, and completed [them], and made all things out of nothing. Yet it is sometimes cited by Gratian in the Collections of the decrees, and by Peter Lombard in the Collect-

[→ in the Collect-]anea of Sentences, for the confirmation of ecclesiastical sanctions [decrees]. Eusebius, in the third book of the Ecclesiastical History, chapter 3, says: THE LITTLE BOOK of Hermas, which is called Ποιμήν*, that is, PASTOR [Shepherd], of which Paul makes mention in his epistles, is not received by very many; but by others it is judged necessary, on account of those who are being imbued with the first instructions toward the faith.* Whence also it is read in some churches, and many of the ancients used its testimonies. Rufinus, in the exposition of the Creed [Symbol], enumerates the volume of the Pastor among the ecclesiastical writings, together with the books of Tobit, Judith, and the Maccabees. From the first narration of this book it appears that Hermas lived at Rome. [1] But Dorotheus, bishop of Tyre, in the Synopsis, writes that he was bishop of Philippopolis. Damasus, in the Catalog of the pontiffs, hands down that this Hermas was brother of Pope Pius, the first of that name, and that he composed the work of the Pastor in the times of the Emperor Antoninus Pius, in the year of the Lord 129. But Origen, in the tenth book on the epistle to the Romans, reckons that he was contemporary with Paul, writing thus: I THINK that this Hermas is the writer of that little book which is called PASTOR, which writing seems to me very useful, and, as I think, divinely inspired. But that Paul ascribed no praise to him, this is the cause: because he seems, as that writing declares, to have been converted to penance after many sins; and therefore he wrote no reproach to him either. For he had learned from the scripture NOT to reproach a man converting himself from sin. Nor did he attribute any praise [to him], because he was placed still under the angel of penance, by whom, at an opportune time, he should again be offered to Christ.

HIRAM, king of the Tyrians (whom the third book of Kings testifies to have sent cedar wood for the building of the temple of Jerusalem), [2] wrote very many letters to Solomon, king of the Hebrews; in which he partly proposed diverse questions to be solved by Solomon, and partly solved [those] proposed to himself by Solomon. [3] Of these Dius makes mention in the Phoenician histories, and after him Josephus, in the first volume against Apion, in these words: HIRAM, king of the Tyrians, was a friend of our king Solomon. And love of wisdom had won [conciliated] this friendship; for they directed problems to each other to be solved, and in these Solomon was the better, and appeared the wiser. And even to now there are preserved among the Tyrians many letters, which they wrote to one another.

THE JERUSALEM SENATE wrote two letters — one to the dispersed Jews, the other to Aristobulus, preceptor of Ptolemy king of Egypt. Copies of both are had in 2 Maccabees, chapter 1.

I.

THE LADDER OF JACOB the patriarch [4] was a volume familiar to the Ebionite heretics; [5] in which Jacob was introduced [presented], as it were expounding the dream of the ladder, seen by him in his sleep, against the Jews, and the temple, and their sacrifices. Epiphanius, in the first [book] of the Panarion, in the confutation of the Ebionites, is a witness of this thing. There is also carried about, printed in type, THE TESTAMENT OF JACOB the Patriarch, [6] which Gelasius, in the fifteenth distinction, reckons among the books of Apocryphal authority. There is cited by Stratonicus, in the Collectanea, a Title [inscription] written by Jacob the patriarch in Bethel-Luz; [7] but whether that title was a writing cut in stone, or a stone erected without any writing for a perpetual memory of the vision seen, is not, in truth, sufficiently manifest. [8]

JAMES, brother of the Lord according to the flesh, author of that epistle which is numbered among the seven catholic [epistles], left very many writings of great sanctity; among which excels the Gospel, which by some is inscribed [the Gospel] OF JAMES, by some ACCORDING TO the Hebrews [9] — of which Origen often makes mention, and to which Jerome, who translated it from Hebrew into Greek, offers an excellent testimony in the Catalog of illustrious writers; concerning which we also have spoken abundantly under the title of the Gospel According to the Hebrews. Athanasius, in the Synopsis, writes that James was the first of all to apply an interpretation and exposition to the Gospel of Matthew, written in Hebrew. There is now extant a certain writing, printed in type by the heretics of our times, [10] which is inscribed THE PROTEVANGELIUM OF JAMES, or A Historical Discourse on the Nativity of the Mother of God [Deipara], containing the history of the nativity of Mary up to the coming of the Magi. In which, among other narrations of doubtful faith, this most absurd [thing] also is added: namely, that Joseph and Mary, accused of fornication and sacrilege, were by decree of the priests together compelled to drink the cup of conviction [i.e. the water of jealousy], by which Moses commanded the innocence of a woman suspected of adultery to be tested. There is carried about, and is in use among the Greeks, a Liturgy, or divine Mass, under the name of this Apostle, [11] whose beginning is, DEFILED BY THE MULTITUDE OF SINS; which, as a true and genuine writing of James, Proclus, Archbishop of Constantinople, acknowledges and receives — [he] who in the synod of Ephesus fought strongly against Nestorius. But the universal council also, surnamed in Trullo, celebrated under Justinian, refutes from this Mass the heretics who used only wine in the mysteries, pronouncing thus in the 32nd canon: FOR both James, brother according to the flesh of Jesus Christ our Lord, to whom first the throne of the Church of Jerusalem was committed, and Basil, Archbishop of Caesarea, whose glory pervaded the whole world of lands, the mystical sacrifice having been handed down to us in writing, set forth [that] the sacred cup — to be performed in the sacred mystery — [be] of water and wine, etc.

THE BOOK OF JANNES AND JAMBRES, Βίβλος Ἰαννῆς καὶ Ἰαμβρῆς, or, as our edition reads, Jamnes and Mambres. From this, Paul in the latter epistle to Timothy took the names of the Magi who contended with Moses in Egypt, [12] saying: FOR as Jannes and Jambres resisted Moses, so these also resist the truth. Weighing which words, Origen, in the 35th tractate on Matthew, thus says: THAT which Paul says — As Jannes and Mambres resisted Moses — is not found in the public scriptures, but in a secret book, which is entitled above, THE BOOK OF JANNES AND MAMBRES. Whence certain [persons] dared to reject the epistle to Timothy, as having in it the text of some secret [book]; but they could not. For that anyone refuted the first epistle to the Corinthians on this account, as [being] spurious [adulterine], has never come to my ears. Thus Origen — alluding to the verse of Menander, which is read in chapter 15 of the former [epistle] to the Corinthians: [13]

[→ is read]: that is, EVIL COMMUNICATIONS CORRUPT GOOD MANNERS. [1] Numenius of Apamea, a Pythagorean by profession, attests to the authority of this volume, in the third book On the good; where he reports individually the names of the Magi who resisted Moses, in these words: [2] JANNES and Jambres were Egyptians, men so pre-eminent in the magic arts that they were judged by all the Egyptians alone able to resist Musaeus [= Moses], leader of the Jews, a man most closely joined to God. For they seemed to loose [undo] many calamities which Musaeus brought upon Egypt. These words of Numenius are transcribed by Eusebius out of the ninth [book] of the Evangelical Preparation. Gelasius — as is had in the decrees, distinction fifteen — rejects this book among the Apocrypha [3], following, no doubt, the judgment of St. Ambrose; who, in the exposition of these words of Paul, says: THIS example is from the Apocrypha. For Jannes and Jambres were brothers, magicians or sorcerers of the Egyptians, etc.

JASON OF CYRENE, a Jew by nation, a truthful and eloquent writer of histories, wrote in Greek — and with a copious abundance of speech — five books concerning the deeds of the Maccabean princes [4]; which, on account of the exceptional fidelity of the narration, the senate and people of Jerusalem ordered to be reduced into a small epitome, which now is numbered among the other books of divine scripture, and is received with equal veneration with them, and is inscribed THE SECOND [book] OF THE MACCABEES. [5] In the beginning of which these words are read: THEREFORE we have attempted to abridge in one small volume [the things] comprehended by Jason of Cyrene in five books; and to ourselves indeed, who have undertaken this work for the sake of abridging, we have taken up no easy labor, but rather a business full of watchings and of sweat, etc. Jason flourished under Ptolemy Philometor, the sixth king of Egypt, in the 151st Olympiad — that is, in the year 131 before the birth of Christ.

JASON of Thessalonica [6] (of whom Paul, to the Romans, makes mention, saying: JASON saluteth you; and of whom also it is written in the Acts of the Apostles, that, when the crowds at Thessalonica stirred up sedition against Paul and Silas, he gave himself up, that he might make for the Apostle the opportunity of fleeing) is said to be the author of that book which is inscribed THE ALTERCATION OF JASON AND PAPISCUS; whose authority, assailed by Celsus the Epicurean philosopher, Origen — defending [it] in the fourth book against the same Celsus — thus says: IF anyone should read through, with a more equitable mind, the writings of Jason and Papiscus, he will assuredly find that this book is not to be derided — in which a Christian is described disputing with a Jew out of the Jewish scriptures, and plainly demonstrating that the prophecies which are extant concerning Christ agree with Jesus himself. Jerome, in the beginning of the Questions on Genesis, says that it is wrongly affirmed in this book that in the exordium of Genesis it is written in Hebrew, IN the Son God created heaven and earth — whereas the Seventy interpreters, and Symmachus, and Theodotion translated In the beginning, and in the Hebrew it is written Bereshith, which all interpret In the beginning, and not In the Son. Dorotheus of Tyre, in the Synopsis, hands down that this Jason was the first bishop of Troas. [7]

IDDO HACHOZEH, עִדּוֹ הַחוֹזֶה — that is, Iddo the Seer, or a prophet full of the Spirit of God — composed Chazoth, that is, Of visions, or divinations, against Jeroboam, king of Israel, one volume; in which he mingled many [things] concerning the affairs done by king Solomon; likewise, concerning those [things] which were done by Rehoboam, king of Jerusalem, both in war and in peace, another volume. To these he also added a מדרש Midrash — that is, Commentaries on the memorable deeds and sayings of Abijah, king of Judah, digested with most accurate diligence. He lived from the times of Solomon even to the times of Asa, king of Judah. These volumes are cited in 2 Paralipomenon, chapters 9, 12, and 13.

JEREMIAH, prophet and priest, [8] besides those books which now are extant among the Sacred [scriptures] — that is, the book of the Prophecies, the book of Lamentations, and two Epistles to the Hebrews captive in Babylon (of which one is had in Jeremiah chapter 29, the other in Baruch chapter 6) — wrote also other books, cited in the sacred letters, whose inscriptions and arguments are these. [9]

כִּינוֹת KINOTH, or an Epicedion — that is, a Lamentation, or mournful song at the funeral of Josiah, king of Judah, who, fighting against Necho, king of Egypt, wounded by an arrow, perished. The second book of the Chronicles [Annals], chapter 35, makes mention of this song, in these words: [10] AND Josiah died, and was buried in the mausoleum of his fathers; and all Judah and Jerusalem mourned him — Jeremiah most of all; whose lamentations all the singers, men and women, repeat over Josiah even to the present day; and it has prevailed as a law in Israel: Behold, it is written in the lamentations. Jerome, and certain of the Jews — among whom Rabbi Solomon [Rashi] — reckon this lamentation to be the last part of the book of Threni [Lamentations], comprehended under the fourth and last alphabet [acrostic], thinking that what is there written is to be understood of the death of Josiah: THE BREATH of our mouth, Christ the Lord [the Lord's anointed], is taken in our sins; to whom we said, Under thy shadow we shall live among the nations. [11] Which, however, seems to agree rather with king Zedekiah, whom the Chaldeans, bound with chains and having his eyes put out, led into Babylon, immediately after the devastation of the holy city — which [devastation], in the whole meter of that same alphabet, is bewailed together with the captivity of the king and people; and therefore I would hardly believe that this lamentation survives [as one made] over Josiah — although Josephus, in the 11th book of the Antiquities [so; = Antiq. 10], has testified that the Epicedion of Jeremiah upon Josiah existed in his own times.

JEREMIAH also wrote Of the fury and indignation of the Lord against Judah and Jerusalem, one book: in which — Baruch the notary taking [it] down — he foretold the overthrow of the temple, the destruction of the city, the devastation of the kingdom, the captivity of the king and of the whole people, and the other extreme calamities hanging over the Jews, unless they should repent. When the impious king Jehoiakim had begun to read this book, brought to him, execrating the horrible threatenings of the prophecy, he cut it up with a scribe's knife, and burned it in the little hearth of fire by which he sat through the winter, [12] commanding Jeremiah — [who was] lying hidden in his house — together with Baruch, to be thrust into prison. Hearing which, Jeremiah, God again commanding, rewrote the book by the hands of Baruch, adding besides even much heavier prophecies against the king and his kingdom. Jeremiah makes mention of this volume in chapter 36 of his Prophecy; which Rabbi Solomon thinks to be the book of Threni [Lamentations] — which, when Jeremiah rewrote it [after it had] already been burnt, he increased by a fourth alphabet [acrostic], which he had not placed in the former volume.

[→ There were also written], at Jeremiah's command, two books of Purchase and Sale [Buying and Selling], the one open, the other closed and sealed with seals. [1] For when the King of the Assyrians was now already approaching, about to seize the kingdom of Jerusalem, Hanameel, son of Jeremiah's uncle, came to him — [Jeremiah] being detained in the Royal prison — offering of his own accord the sale of his field, which he possessed in the village of Anathoth; and although the Prophet recognized that this was being done by the command of God, and although he was a captive, and it might seem laughable in that region to buy fields which he himself believed would soon be laid waste, and constantly foretold [so] — nevertheless, the silver being counted out, he bought the field. And, that all the rights of the purchase and of the transferred possession might be preserved, he ordered the schedules of this contract — or instruments, which the Jews call Books — to be written up by public notaries, with witnesses and seals employed, by the authority of judges. Now in these contracts, as Rabbi Solomon [Rashi] hands down, there were made chiefly two schedules: one, fortified and closed with the seals of the witnesses, which was kept in a most safe place in the public archives of the notaries; the other, copied in good faith after the example of the former, and approved by the vote of the judges, which remained open with the buyer. Both, therefore, Jeremiah ordered to be laid up by Baruch, his scribe, in an earthen jar, that they might be for posterity a monument and testimony of the prophecy by which the Prophet had foretold that the Jews, after the seventieth year of the Babylonian captivity, would migrate back into their own seats, and there again would buy houses, fields, and vineyards. David Kimchi reckons these to have been three books: the first, of the purchase; the second, a copy of the same drawn out in full faith; the third, which contained the mystery and reason of this purchase, which seemed foolish in the eyes of the impious; and [that] these two latter were cast into the jar. Read Jeremiah chapter 32.

He likewise wrote Of the devastation of Babylon one book [2], which — bound to a stone — he commanded, by [the hand of] Seraiah the prince of the prophecy [Vulg. princeps prophetiae; the quartermaster], whom Zedekiah had sent to salute the king of Babylon, to be sunk in the river Euphrates before the Jews, as a presage of the perpetual submersion which hung over the city of Babylon. Concerning the book itself, these [things] are read in Jeremiah, chapter fifty-one: [3] JEREMIAH wrote all the evil that was to come upon Babylon in one book; and he said to Seraiah, When thou shalt come into Babylon, and shalt see, and shalt read all these words, thou shalt say, O Lord, thou hast spoken against this place, that thou wouldst destroy it, so that there be none to dwell in it, from man even to beast, and that it be a perpetual solitude. And when thou shalt have finished reading this book, thou shalt bind to it a stone, and cast it into the midst of the Euphrates; and thou shalt say, Thus shall Babylon be submerged, and shall not rise up from the face of the affliction which I bring upon her, and she shall be dissolved. Thus far the words of Jeremiah, who wished to add this visible sign to his sayings, that the memory of the published prophecy might be more lasting; so that, if the words should fly past [be forgotten], the deed at least, done before [their] eyes, might endure, fixed deep in the minds of the beholders. There still survives a great part of this volume in the same Prophet, chapters 50 and 51, described [written out] by Jeremiah himself.

There are also cited, in 2 Maccabees chapter 2, the Commentaries, or Descriptions, of Jeremiah the Prophet: [4] in which he wrote those [things] which, immediately after the city was over-thrown, came to pass before the captive people was led into Babylon; that is, Of the laws which Jeremiah prescribed to the people who would sojourn in Babylon; Of the perpetual fire, which the priests, taking [it] up from the altar, hid in an unknown well [pit]; Of the tabernacle, the ark of the covenant, and the altar of incense, hidden by God's command in the cave of Mount Nebo; and of other matters which happened at the beginning of the Babylonian transmigration. There are those who reject these commentaries — together with the beginning of the second book of the Maccabees, [which is] taken out of these commentaries — as Apocryphal and of doubtful faith; which [commentaries], nevertheless, Epiphanius, in the life of Jeremiah the Prophet, and very many ecclesiastical fathers, approve.

There is also carried about another volume under the name of Jeremiah, wholly Apocryphal; out of which Origen reckons that prophecy — They weighed out my price at thirty pieces of silver — was taken by Matthew. [5] That the Nazarenes formerly used this, Jerome relates on chapter 27 of Matthew.

JEHU the Prophet, son of Hanani the Prophet (who foretold to Baasha, king of Israel, from the command of God, his own and all his [family's] final destruction; [6] and after many years rebuked Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, for the alliance entered into with the impious Ahab, king of Israel) [7], wrote a most accurate history of the deeds of the kings of Judah and Israel, who reigned even down to Joram, son of Jehoshaphat king of Judah; of which the second book of Paralipomenon makes mention, in these words: [8] NOW the rest of the acts of Jehoshaphat, the former and the latter, are written in the words of Jehu, son of Hanani, which he digested in the book of the Kings of Israel. And lest to anyone it should perhaps seem impossible that Jehu wrote a history down to Joram, son of king Jehoshaphat — because in the third book of Kings it is read that this Jehu was cut down by Baasha, king of Israel, more than forty years before the death of Jehoshaphat — it must be known that those [things] which are reported concerning the slaying of Jehu in the sixteenth chapter of the third book of Kings in our Vulgate edition are not had in the Hebrew copies; [9] in which only these words are read: [10] AND when the word of the Lord had come by the hand of Jehu, son of Hanani the Prophet, against Baasha, and against his house, and against all the evil which he had done before the Lord, to provoke him in the works of his hands, that [his house] might become like the house of Jeroboam: for this cause he slew him. But that which in the Latin edition is straightway added — THAT IS, Jehu, son of Hanani, the Prophet — the Hebrew reading does not have; but it is, unless I am mistaken, a certain little annotation first added in the margin by some uncertain expositor, who wished to illustrate this place [which was] not understood by him; then, as often happens, transferred by the boldness of the copyists into the text.

THE FINGER-WRITTEN SCRIPTURE OF JESUS CHRIST. [11] Although Christ, our Master, committed nothing by himself to the monuments of letters — inasmuch as he had come to write the law of his love in a more excellent form of writing: not on pages, and dead parchments and books, but on the living and animate tablets of human hearts [12] — yet it is read that he once wrote certain [things] in

[→ in the ground] — on the stone pavement of the temple of Jerusalem — not with a reed [pen], nor with a stylus, but with that very finger with which he had once inscribed the divine precepts on tablets of stone. [1] [2] The occasion of this writing John reports in the eighth chapter of his Gospel, in these words: [3] THE SCRIBES and Pharisees brought to Jesus a woman taken in adultery; and setting her in the midst, they said to him, Master, this woman was just now taken in adultery. Now in the law Moses commanded such to be stoned. But thou, what sayest thou? This they said, tempting him, that they might be able to accuse him. But Jesus, bowing himself down, wrote with his finger on the ground. And when they continued asking, he raised himself up, and said to them, He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her: and again bowing himself, he wrote on the ground. Thus John. [4] But what Christ, bowing himself the first time to the ground, wrote — and what the second time — neither does the evangelist disclose, nor is it easy for anyone to determine. Ambrose, however, in the two epistles to Studius, surmises that Christ, bowing down the first time, traced upon the pavement a certain sentence of Jeremiah — namely, [5] O EARTH, WRITE THESE MEN [as] cast off: that by these words he might show that those tempters were now cast away by God, and reckoned among the reprobate, whose names are written not in heaven, but in earth. But in the second bowing-down, he conjectures that Christ wrote that sentence elsewhere preached by him: [6] THE MOTE WHICH IS IN THY BROTHER'S EYE, THOU SEEST; BUT THE BEAM WHICH IS IN THINE OWN EYE, THOU SEEST NOT. Bede thinks that he, once and again, wrote that same sentence which he had then uttered with his mouth — namely, HE WHO IS WITHOUT SIN, LET HIM FIRST CAST A STONE AT HER — as if he should say: Let the sinful woman be punished, but not by the transgressors of the law. Haymo reckons that he traced certain marks in the ground, by which each of the accusers beheld with his own eyes his own crimes, and saw [them] set before his mind. Euthymius — who alone of the Greeks expounded the history of the adulterous woman — thinks that nothing was written by Christ, but only that the gesture and action of one writing was feigned by him: which they are wont frequently to do, who are unwilling to answer those who ask importunate and unworthy [things]. For, their machination being known, he pretended to write on the ground, and not to attend to what was being said; so that, while he did not look upon them, they, being more gently rebuked, might blush; and so that, [he being] occupied in writing, it might be permitted them to slip away gradually, before they should be more manifestly condemned. For by his supreme benignity he spared even them. Rabanus says that Christ, by this gesture of writing, wished to signify that those who were accusing the woman were worthy to be written in the earth, together with those of whom Jeremiah says, chapter 17: [7] O LORD, all they that depart from thee shall be written in the earth. For the impious are not written in heaven with everlasting writing, but in the dust of the pavement; so that quickly the engraving and memory of them, worn away by the feet of those passing by, may vanish.

THE LIVING [ANIMATE] EPISTLE OF JESUS CHRIST. Concerning this, Paul the Apostle thus addresses the Corinthians in the latter epistle to them: [8] YE ARE the epistle of Christ, ministered by us, and written not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God; not in tablets of stone, but in the fleshly tablets of the heart. By which sentence Paul calls the Corinthians the epistle of Christ — [the same] whom, in the words immediately preceding, he had named his own epistle, saying: [9] YE ARE our epistle, written in our hearts, which is known and read by all [men]. Now Paul calls them both his own and Christ's epistle, [10] because, just as commendatory letters — which are wont to be written for the commendation of someone — manifest in words the virtue and dignity of him for whose sake they are written: so the Corinthians, by the sincerity of [their] faith, and by a truly Evangelical and Christian life, illustrated the glory of Christ, and declared the mastership of Paul, who had instructed them in Christ. And just as, in commendatory letters, those who read them recognize the virtue of those who are commended in them: so those who looked upon the life of the Corinthians straightway recognized the sublime excellence of Christ, whom they professed, and the dignity of the Apostolate of Paul, who had led them to Christ. Now Paul used this metaphor of an epistle, to show that he had no need of commendatory letters — such as the false apostles carried about, whether obtained from others to the Corinthians, or from the Corinthians to others — which he also openly declared, saying: [11] DO WE need, as some [do], commendatory letters to you, or from you? — as if he should say: What need of the commendation of letters, where the thing itself commends the man? We care nothing for such letters. For ye are our living epistle and efficacious commendation, who, from the sublimity of your virtue, render the dignity of our ministry commendable to all men. Whatever that is which letters would have done — commending us, and winning reverence for us — this you do, while all both see you and hear of you: for this reason, that the virtue of disciples is wont to adorn the teacher, and to commend [him] more than any epistle could. Ye therefore, he says, are our epistle, written in our hearts; because we always have your piety and charity in [our] mind, bear [it] in [our] heart, everywhere carry [it] about with us, and celebrate your good deeds before all. Ye are likewise not only our epistle, but Christ's also, since through the holiness of your life ye exhibit Christ, the author of your salvation, to be received by all nations. For then are ye the true and living epistle of Christ — written indeed by him, but by our ministry: written, however, not with deletable ink, such as are [those] which the false apostles bring to you, begged [from others]; nor again inscribed on stone tablets, as [was] that old law concerning which the Jews so greatly glory — but on the fleshly and soft tablets of the heart. For your hearts, on which we have impressed the doctrine of Christ, were to us in place of parchment. Our tongue [was] the pen, but Christ himself, through the Spirit, dictated what we should write in your hearts.

THE EPISTLE OF JESUS CHRIST [in reply] to Abgar, petty king of the Edessenes — [12] this Eusebius, in the first book of the Ecclesiastical History, chapter 15 [so printed; the Abgar letters are HE 1.13], testifies that he found in the public Archives of the city of Edessa, together with the epistle of Abgar himself, written in Syriac: of which the copies are these:

All which having been heard concerning thee, I resolved in my mind that it is one of two things: either that thou art God, and hast descended from heaven, to do these things; or that thou art the Son of God, who doest these things. Therefore, writing, I would beg thee that thou wouldst deign to weary thyself [in journeying] even to me, and to cure my sickness, with which I have long labored. For I have also learned this, that the Jews murmur against thee, and wish to lay snares for thee. And I have a city, small indeed, but honorable, which may suffice for us both.

Jesus the Nazarene, to Abgar the Toparch.

> BLESSED art thou, because thou hast believed in me, whom thou thyself hast not seen. For it is written of me, that those who see me shall not believe in me; and those who see me not, they shall believe and live. But concerning that which thou hast written to me, that I should come to thee: it behooves me to fulfill here all [the things] for which I was sent; and after I shall have fulfilled [them], to be received up to him who sent me. When therefore I shall have been taken up, I will send to thee one of my disciples, to cure thy sickness, and to give life to thee, and to those who are with thee.

This epistle Pope Gelasius the First rejects among the Apocryphal scriptures. John of Damascus, in the fourth book On the orthodox faith, chapter 17, writes that our Lord Jesus sent to this Abgar — [who was] anxiously begging for it — an image of his own face. [1] Evagrius, in the fourth book of the Ecclesiastical History, narrates that the city of Edessa was, by the virtue of this sacred image, wonderfully delivered from the assault of the Persians, and from the burning of the flames stirred up by them. The same is also related in the fifth session of the second Council of Nicaea. Gelasius, in the fifteenth distinction, numbers both letters among the Apocrypha.

THE GENERATION OF JESUS CHRIST, or The Book of the generation of Jesus Christ (which in the Hebrew Gospel of Matthew is called ספר תולדות ישוע המשיח Sepher toldoth Yeshua ha-Mashiach — that is, The Book of the generations of Jesus the Messiah), [2] gave occasion to the sacred interpreters of inquiring whether this title, The Book of the generation of Jesus Christ, signified the whole work of this gospel, or indicated only this genealogy of the Savior placed at the beginning of the Gospel — after the custom of Moses, who called the genealogy of our first parent The Book of the generation of Adam. [3] Chrysostom reckons that Matthew, by this title, did not wish to comprehend the sum of the whole Evangelical History — as many writers are accustomed to comprehend, in their titles, the entire arguments of [their] works — but only the beginning, and the fountain, from which the rest of the evangelical history arises, which takes its beginning from the carnal generation of Christ described in this genealogy. But certain [others] affirm that by this title is comprehended the sum and the universal argument of the whole gospel: that Matthew therefore called [it] The Book of the generation of Jesus Christ because, since he himself was a Hebrew, and wrote in Hebrew for Hebrews, it seemed [good] to him to inscribe his history from the generation of Christ, which he narrated at the beginning of the volume — the custom of the Hebrews being here preserved, who generally impose names on their books from those matters which are related in the openings; [4] imitating Moses, who (as Philo the Jew, in the book On the world, is witness) inscribed the first volume of the Pentateuch The Book of Genesis, that is, of generation, because its beginning contained the generation of the world.

But to me it seems that Matthew — not only after the manner of the Hebrews, but also according to the custom of other writers — comprehended by this title not only the carnal generation of Christ, but also his whole life, preaching, miracles, passion, death, resurrection, and all his other deeds and events; [5] since that word התולדות ha-toldoth — that is, of generations — which is placed in the title, among the Hebrews signifies two [things]: that is, generations and events. [6] Whence the Rabbis of the Hebrews, as often as they expound those places of the divine scriptures — THIS IS THE BOOK OF THE GENERATION OF ADAM, and THESE ARE THE GENERATIONS OF ABRAHAM, and places like these — say: WHERESOEVER thou shalt find the word תולדות toldoth, that is, of generations, that place teaches concerning the births, and the events, and the actions of him of whom mention is there made. The Book of the generations of Jesus Christ, therefore, will be a title comprehending all the operations and events of Christ, from his Incarnation even to the ascension, which are described in this whole gospel. Faustus, bishop of the Manichaeans — as Augustine relates in the books published against him — assailed this title with many and various cavils, [7] asserting that it pertained neither to the whole body of the gospel, nor to any part of it; but that by it was indicated only a certain carnal genealogy of Christ, which he thought ought to be cut off from the whole gospel entirely, as falsely fabricated, and rashly — and by an uncertain author — imposed on the Gospel of Matthew, like a horse's head set upon a human neck. The insane blasphemies of this [man], in the seventh book of this work, we have most strongly refuted, out of the opinions of Augustine.

THE INFANCY OF JESUS CHRIST, or the book Of the infancy of the Savior. See below, under the entry Matthew.

THE MAGIC OF JESUS CHRIST. [8] That many books were published by heretics and impostors under the title of our Saviour Jesus — not only is Jerome a witness, in the thirteenth [book of the] commentary on Ezekiel, but Augustine also affirms, in the first book Of the consensus of the Evangelists, that there were certain pagans in his own times who boasted that they had seen, and read, certain books of Christ [addressed] to Peter and Paul, [9] in which was written the sum of the whole art of Magic — out of the skill of which Christ, while he lived, had wrought so many and so great miracles. Whose madness Augustine, in the same place, briefly refutes by four arguments. First, that those who affirm that they have read such books could never — however anxiously they tried — perform such miracles as they say Christ performed out of such books. Secondly, that these [men] so err by divine judgment as to assert that these same books were inscribed [addressed] to Peter and Paul, as with an epistolary title — having perhaps fallen into such an error because in many places they had seen them depicted together with Christ; whereas, however, it is known even to children that Paul, so long as Christ lived in mortal flesh, was neither a disciple nor an intimate of Christ. [10] Not, therefore, could [Christ have addressed to Paul] the books which, before [his] death, [they say he]

[→ they say he] wrote — to write to Paul as [his] most intimate [friend], who only after the ascension of the Lord then first began to be his disciple. Thirdly, that those who think Christ could [do] such great [things] by magic arts, and turned the whole world unto himself alone, do not consider that it could by no means come about, through magic arts, that Christ — before he was born — should fill so many Prophets with the divine Spirit, [Prophets] who foretold that he would do such [things] as we now see present in the world. For even if he had brought [it] about by magic arts that he should be worshipped even [when] dead, yet he could not be a magician before he was born. Fourthly, because they foolishly believe that Christ composed books — [Christ] who never wrote anything, but only left to others [the things] to be written concerning himself, the most excellent sublimity of his own doctrine so requiring: which it did not befit to be written with deletable ink on the perishable leaves of papers, or on tablets void of sense, but rather to be engraved — destined to endure perpetually — on the living and everlasting minds of his disciples, with the pen of the divine Spirit. Whence also, among the pagans, the most noble philosophers Pythagoras and Socrates committed nothing to the monuments of letters, [1] thinking that they had found the most perfect manner of teaching, if they should leave the precepts of living well and blessedly not written on pages, but impressed on the minds of their hearers.

THE PRIESTHOOD OF JESUS CHRIST, or A Book concerning the legal priesthood of Jesus Christ. There is extant, in the Greek Lexicon of Suidas, under the entry JESUS, a certain little book inserted entire, Of the legal priesthood of Jesus Christ, found in the Archives of the city of Tiberias in the time of the Emperor Justinian, by Theodosius, a chief [prince] of the Jews, and by Philip Argentarius, a Christian: in which it is diffusely narrated that Christ — both on account of the sanctity of his life, and on account of the nobility of his race, deduced from the two tribes of Judah and Levi mutually intermingled — was judged by all the Levites worthy of the honor of the Mosaic priesthood, and thus at last received by the priests into the college of priests. [2] There is added, moreover, at the end of the book an Apology, which defends the authority of the same little book, and shows that Christ discharged the legal priesthood — both from the testimony of Josephus, and from various places of both Testaments. Hieronymus Hentenius wrote a refutation of this book — which in recent years had been printed three times, with great applause of readers, at Paris and Basel — and Pope Paul IV commanded [it] to be placed in the Index of condemned volumes.

JEZEBEL, [3] [4] wife of Ahab king of Israel, when she had noticed that her husband vehemently desired the estate of Naboth the Israelite, adjoining the royal grounds, and that it could not be obtained from Naboth either by price or by entreaties, wrote secret letters to the chief men of Israel; by which she commanded that, a fast being proclaimed, they should call an assembly, and in it should assign the first place to Naboth on account of [his] illustrious birth; then, three men being suborned [who would] dare anything, they should — [Naboth] being convicted by the testimony of these of blasphemy against God and the king — cast him to the people to be stoned, and in this manner take him out of the way. Naboth, therefore, in this manner, against right and divine law, being overwhelmed with stones, Jezebel handed over the estate of the slain [man] to her husband to possess. For which so impious crime she herself, not long after, was slain, and devoured by dogs in that place where the dogs had consumed the corpse of Naboth. [5] See the third book of Kings, chapter 21.

Now thou shalt note, in these letters of Jezebel, that the word HE BLESSED GOD AND THE KING [6] is to be understood in a contrary sense for He cursed — just as also those execrable words of Job's wife, BLESS GOD, AND DIE, [7] that is, Curse [him]; and likewise that [word] of Job himself, saying, LEST perchance my sons have sinned, blessing God in their hearts; [8] and that [word] of Satan to God concerning Job, UNLESS he shall have blessed thee to [thy] face. [9] For the word Bless among the Hebrews is of the number of those expressions which are taken as much in a good as in a bad sense [10] — just as, among the Greeks, Anathema, which signifies both a votive offering hung up to God in the temple, and utmost detestation. And among the Latins, Sacer and Sacrum are sometimes taken in a bad sense, [11] for [something] execrable and detestable: according to which signification Virgil said:

> —To what dost thou not drive mortal breasts, O accursed hunger for gold?

Juvenal: Let him be intestable, and accursed [sacer]. There are also those who say that the name of cursing and blasphemy was so hateful to the Jews that, not daring to express it by its proper word, they signified it by the contrary word of blessing.

THE INSCRIPTION OF THE RIDER, sitting on a white horse, is twofold: the one visible, traced on the garment, upon the thigh of the one sitting; the other incomprehensible, which no one knows but the Rider himself. Of which John, in the Apocalypse, makes mention in these words: [12] BEHOLD a white horse, and he that sat upon him [was] faithful and true, having a name written, which no one knoweth but himself: and he was clothed with a garment dipped in blood: and his name is called ὁ λόγος τοῦ θεοῦ, that is, The Word of God: and he hath upon his garment, and upon his thigh, a name written, Βασιλεὺς βασιλέων, καὶ κύριος κυρίων, that is, King of kings, and Lord of lords. These [things] John [says] concerning the twin inscription of the Rider: of which, the [one] which is visible, imprinted on the thigh, is expounded thus, according to the interpretation of Arethas of Caesarea. [13] The garment indeed signifies the flesh of Christ; but the thigh, the nature of the flesh — that it is truly human, and not phantastic. For to signify this, thigh is taken in the divine scripture. The aim of the passage, therefore, is to signify by this, that although the Word is hypostatically united to the human nature, and truly took human flesh of the Virgin, nevertheless he is omnipotent — as being the king of things heavenly, and lord of things earthly and subterranean — which omnipotence of empire, communicated to the humanity of the Son of God, Paul, wishing to express in the epistle to the Philippians, said: [14] WHEREFORE God hath exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name, that in the name of JESUS every knee should bow, of things heavenly, earthly, and infernal.

THE OTHER, invisible inscription [15] — containing the name which no one knows except himself — signifies the incomprehensibility of the infinite, and therefore unknowable and ineffable, substance of the Son of God; concerning which Solomon says: [16] WHAT is his name, and the name of his son, if thou knowest? For although, from various likenesses of creatures, we beg [borrow] certain appellations, by which we may name God — inasmuch as we know him through a glass, and in an enigma [darkly] — whether by affirmative names, such as are wise, [→ good], Sun, light, life, king, lord; or by negatives, as are invisible, immutable, incorporeal: yet the essence itself, as it is in itself, can neither be explained by words, nor expressed by writings, nor comprehended by any thought. For he alone, who is infinite, and comprehends Himself alone, has reserved to himself the knowledge of this unknowable name of his — that is, of his essence, which is signified by the unknowable name — revealing to no one its incomprehensible immensity; as he himself testified to Moses, saying: [1] I [am] the Lord, who appeared to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in God Almighty, and my name יהוה JEHOVAH I did not make known to them. Now this name is said to have been revealed to no one [2] — not because the word Jehovah itself is either unknown, or cannot be expressed by the tongue (since it is both written with definite letters, and was uttered by Pharaoh, a most impure man); but because the nature of God, especially [as] signified by that name, cannot be expressed by any creature, since it is infinite; and therefore can, by no one, distinctly, openly, and exactly, be known and named. There are those who think that in this place, by the name which no one knows but himself, is to be understood this name Jehovah, because of the likeness of signification which it has with the epithets that John attributes to him who sits upon the horse, calling him faithful and true: [3] for he is called faithful and true, who persists in [his] purpose, keeps [his] promises, and fulfills his pledges by deed. Which signification indeed the word Jehovah itself retains, deduced from the root היה haia, [4] which signifies He was, and He made to be. Whence Jehovah signifies him who is, and makes something to be. According to which sense God said to Moses: MY name Jehovah I did not make known to them — that is, I have not yet revealed myself through the fulfillment of those things which I promised to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; but now I will reveal myself by the name Jehovah — that is, by the present and manifest fulfillment of my promises; and according to the signification of my name Jehovah, I will make to be what I promised. Now I promised that I would give the land of Canaan to the sons of Israel: soon presenting this, I will manifest the name Jehovah, now making those [things] to be which I, truthful and faithful, promised. Thou hast [more] on this matter below, in [the entry] The inscription of the Pontifical vestment, letter P; and in the third book, in the Elementary Exposition.

THE ROLLED-UP BOOK [SCROLL], in Greek βιβλίον είλισσόμενον — that is, a book which is rolled, or that may be rolled together — is mentioned in the Apocalypse, chapter six; where John, foretelling the final destruction of the whole world, says: [5] THE SUN became black, as a sackcloth of hair; and the whole Moon became as blood; and the stars from heaven fell upon the earth, as a fig tree casteth its green figs when it is shaken by a great wind; and the heaven departed as a book rolled up. And Isaiah, treating the same subject in almost the same words, thus writes concerning this book: [6] ALL the host of the heavens shall waste away, and the heavens shall be folded together as a book, and all their host shall fall down, as the leaves fall from the vine and from the fig tree. Obscure, indeed, is this Hebraic metaphor of the book, and unaccustomed and harsh to Greek as well as to Latin ears. Therefore it must be known that among the Hebrews, by ancient custom, the books — especially the sacred [ones] — are of another form than our books, which are compacted of many leaves. [7] For they have only one leaf, or an oblong membrane [parchment], which around a cylinder, or wooden axle, is turned about, in the manner of a warp of cloth rolled about a weaver's beam. Now books of this kind seem to bear a certain image of the heavens: [8] because, just as that wooden axle, which is in the middle of the volume, the several membranes of it — whether orbs, or spirals — surround and enclose, one above another: so this earth, which holds the axle [center] of the whole universe, several heavenly orbs, placed one above another, encircle in orbicular fashion, and enclose.

But in what manner, and for what cause, the heaven is — on the supreme day of the age — to be folded up like a book (according to Isaiah), or to depart like a book (according to John), there is a twofold opinion of the fathers: [9] both, as I judge, arisen from the ambiguity of the Hebrew word גגול nagol; which, in this place of Isaiah, is doubtful, signifying as much to roll around as to unroll — or, as much to fold up as to unfold. Those, therefore, who take this word גגול nagol in the sense of unrolling and unfolding, read this place thus: The heavens shall be unfolded like a book. And they assert that the heaven, which is now wrapped up, is to be unrolled and opened at the end of the world, that all the rewards of that consummated glory may be manifested to us, which now are removed from our eyes. So also Arethas, bishop of Caesarea, expounded this place in [his] commentaries on the Apocalypse, saying: [10] WE JUDGE that the Apostle used [the word] according to ancient custom. For [being] a Hebrew, he used that thing which is rolled around, as is wont to be done in the books which are among us; whose unrolling is wont to effect not an obscuring, but a manifestation of the things which are written. Clement of Rome likewise, pontiff after Peter, in the second and third book of the Recognitions, narrating this place more fully, thus writes: [11] THERE ARE two heavens: the one, the higher, encompassing the visible firmament — and that is perpetual and eternal, with those who dwell there; the other, this visible lower [heaven], which at the consummation of the age shall be dissolved, and shall pass away, that that heaven which is more ancient and more lofty may appear. For when the number of souls which are predestined shall be filled up, and the times of this world shall have come to an end, then this visible heaven shall be rolled up like a book, that that which is above may appear; and the souls of the blessed, restored to their bodies, may be brought into the light. For, for the sake of this present life of men, this visible heaven was made, that it might be a certain interposition and division, lest perchance anyone unworthy should see the habitation of the heavenly [ones], and the seat of God himself; which is prepared to be seen [only] by those alone who are clean of heart. For now — that is, in the time of the contest [agon] — it has pleased [God] that those [things] which are destined as a reward to the victors should be invisible. For just as the shell of eggs, although it seems beautifully made and diligently formed, must be broken and dissolved, that thence the chick may come forth, and that [thing] for the sake of which the whole form of the egg seems to be expressed may appear: so also the state of this world must pass away, that that state of the heavenly kingdom may shine forth. Thus far Clement. To whom Justin, the philosopher and martyr, in the book of Questions posed by the Gentiles, subscribes in almost the same words. But those who attribute to this word גגול nagol the signification of rolling together and folding up, say that the heavens are to be folded up for various causes. Andreas, bishop of Caesarea, in [his] exposition of the Apocalypse, [12] thinks that by this rolling-up is to be understood, hyperbolically, the sadness of the

[→ of the celestial] virtues, wherewith on that day they shall grieve together over those who have fallen away from the faith of Christ. For just as elsewhere we read [that] the heaven [is] stretched out like a tabernacle, [1] so now, by reason of bitterness, it is said [to be] rolled up like a book. Origen, in the Tomes on the book of Genesis — as Eusebius relates in the sixth book Of the Evangelical Preparation — said that the whole heaven is, as it were, a certain open book, containing the significations of all future things and of human events, [2] but without any compulsion of human liberty; Moses saying: [3] GOD placed the stars in the firmament, that they may be for signs — that is, that they may signify the reasons of future things, ordained by divine providence. When, therefore, all [those things] shall have been fulfilled and come to pass which the stars, divinely ordained, announce to the human race, then the heavens shall be folded up like a book — that is, they shall cease from the announcing of future things, nor shall they any longer signify the events to come. Jerome, however, says [4] that the heavens are to be folded up on the day of judgment, so that after that day the sins of the wicked shall no longer be written in the heavens. Thomas Aquinas, treating the present place, says that this is the Prophet's meaning: that just as in a folded-up book nothing can be read, so neither in the heaven shall the astrologers and augurs of the Jews be able to foresee the calamities which the Jewish people is to receive from the Assyrians, and the Chaldeans, and other nations. Ambrose, in [his] commentaries on the Apocalypse, explaining according to allegory that [saying] of John — THE HEAVEN DEPARTED AS A BOOK ROLLED UP [5] — interprets by Heaven the Old Testament, which to the Jews is as a book rolled up: [6] because they will not understand the spiritual intelligence, which demonstrates Christ in the Old Testament. The Heaven, therefore, like a rolled-up book, departed: because the Old Testament forsook the Jews, and passed over to the Gentiles. Tyconius the African takes heaven allegorically for the Church: [7] since, just as a rolled-up book contains mysteries within, but not apparent without, so the Church, in that supreme persecution of Antichrist — known to her own only, and hidden from strangers — shall withdraw from the eyes of the impious, prudently and secretly avoiding the disaster of that persecution.

SEVEN LETTERS OF JOHN the Apostle to the Bishops of the seven Churches, written at the command of Christ — namely, to the bishops of the churches of Ephesus, Smyrna, Pergamum, Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia, and Laodicea: the contents of which are read in the second and third chapter of the Apocalypse, as Victorinus the martyr noted in [his] commentaries on that place. Origen, in the 20th homily on Numbers, and the 13th homily on Luke, [8] reckons that these seven bishops — whom John, in writing, calls Angels — were truly angels, not only in name and office, but also in nature.

THE EPISTLE OF JOHN the Apostle and Evangelist TO THE PARTHIANS. Making mention of this, Augustine, in the second book of the Evangelical Questions, question 39, says: IT WAS SAID by John, in the epistle to the Parthians: DEARLY BELOVED, now are we the sons of God, and it hath not yet appeared what we shall be. We know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him: for we shall see him as he is. Whether Augustine cited this testimony out of the first Catholic [epistle] of John — where this very same [text] is read entire, to the letter — or whether he adduced it out of some other epistle written to the Parthians, I do not sufficiently perceive. See the first book, at [the entry] the Epistle of John.

THE ACTS OF JOHN. Philastrius mentions [these] in the Catalog of heresies, chapter fifty-four, saying: THE MANICHAEANS have the Acts of Blessed John the Evangelist, and of Peter, and of Paul, likewise reproved by the Church: because in these they relate that the Apostles did great signs and prodigies — so that cattle, and beasts, and dogs spoke; and they say that the souls of men are, as it were, [the souls] of dogs and cattle. James [Jacobus de Voragine], Archbishop of Genoa, in the book of the Yearly Festivities [the Golden Legend], brings forward a certain Apocryphal book of John the Evangelist, Of the passing-over and assumption of the Virgin Mary: out of which he also recites the history of that same solemnity, summarily collected. But Augustine convicts the vanity of that work, in sermon 35, On the saints, where, speaking of the bodily death of the Virgin Mary, he thus says: [9] BUT neither is any of the treatise-writers found among the Latins to have said anything openly concerning the death of Mary. And what do I say of these, when not even he who received her before the cross of the Lord into his own [care] — that is, John the Evangelist — committed anything of this by writings to be retained by posterity? For no one could have narrated [it] more faithfully (had God willed to manifest it) than he, assuredly, who undertook to nourish [care for] her. It remains, therefore, that a man should not mendaciously feign as open [manifest] what God willed to remain hidden. See below, under [the entry] Mary.

THE APOCALYPSE OF JOHN — the Alogian heretics believed [it] to have been published not by John the Apostle, but by Cerinthus the heretic; and on this account they judged that it should be avoided, as the work of a most pestilent scoundrel. THE APOCALYPSE OF JOHN, according to Cerinthus. Concerning this work, Gaius, a disciple of Origen, in the dialogue of his disputations, thus writes: CERINTHUS, by certain revelations — which he would pretend to have been written by the great Apostle, and revealed to him through Angels — introduces to us such portents as these: that after the resurrection the kingdom of Christ shall be earthly in Jerusalem, and that men [shall be] in the flesh again, [and shall] have a manner of life subject to lusts and vices; and — against the faith also of the scriptures — he designates certain thousand years, in which [he says] many other works of corruption, and festivities of nuptials, shall be future, for the deceiving of those who are given to lust.

THE COMMENTARY OF JOHN MACCABAEUS, high priest — or, The Book of the days of the priesthood of John. Out of this the author of the first book of Maccabees excerpted several deeds of John [Hyrcanus], son of Mattathias: of which the last chapter of the first [book] of Maccabees makes mention, in these words: [10] THE REST of the words of John, and of his wars, and of the good deeds which he strongly did, and of the building of the walls which he raised up, and of his acts — behold, these are written in the book of the days of his principality and priesthood. This work is extant in Greek at Lyons, in the Library which had been [that] of Santes Pagninus, a man most skilled in the three tongues, under the title THE FOURTH BOOK OF THE MACCABEES (LIERI [read LIBRI] QVARTI MACCABAEORVM). See above, in the first book, in the section of the Apocrypha.

JONATHAN, high priest and leader of the Jews, wrote — for entering into an alliance with the Lacedaemonians — a letter to the Spartans, which is had in 1 Maccabees 12.

THE PRAYER OF JOSEPH [Oratio Ioseph], or Sermon, or Narration, or Disputation of Joseph, son of Jacob the Patriarch — a writing which among the ancients, both Hebrews and Christians, had no little authority, which Origen called a not-to-be-despised writing — perhaps because he had read certain [things] in it agreeing with his own opinions. For in the second tome of the exposition on John, he especially uses the testimonies of this [book] to confirm [his] assertion concerning the incarnation of certain angels, whom he himself believes to have assumed a human soul and body in imitation of our Saviour, [1] writing thus: BUT IF anyone approve also that mystical Prayer of Joseph which is had among the Hebrews, he will receive thence a dogma like this — namely, that certain [beings], of the nature of angels, descended into the nature of men. For Jacob says in this Prayer: FOR I, who speak with you, Jacob and Israel, am an angel of God, and a chief spirit; and Abraham and Isaac were created before every work. But I, Jacob — called Jacob not by men, but Israel is my name; and I was called Israel by God, [that is,] the Man seeing God: for I am the firstborn of every living thing which receives from God the use of life. And when I came from Mesopotamia of Syria, Uriel, the angel of God, came forth; and he said that I had descended into the earth, and had dwelt among men, and was called by the name of Jacob. Moreover he rivaled me, and fought and wrestled with me, saying that his name would be set before my name, and before that [name] which precedes the whole Gospel; and I declared to him his name; and he holds a principality among the sons of God. For thou art Uriel, the eighth from me. I also am Israel, the archangel of the host of the Lord, and I am, among the sons of God, a commander of a thousand soldiers. Am I not that Israel, the first minister in the sight of God? And I invoked my God by [his] immortal name. But we have strayed too far from our purpose, having taken up the disputation about Jacob, and having produced for ourselves, as a witness, a not-to-be-despised writing. Thus Origen — who, in the Tomes of the expositions on Genesis, showing from this same narration that in the stars of heaven, as in books, all the foreknowledges of human events can be read by skilled inspectors of the stars, thus says: THE WHOLE HEAVEN is, as it were, a certain open book, containing written in itself all future things: therefore, in the Prayer of Joseph, it may be understood in this way, [in] that [which] is said by Jacob to [his] sons: I have read in the tablets of heaven whatsoever shall befall you and your sons. These same words, taken by name out of this very writing, Eusebius of Caesarea reports in the sixth book of the Evangelical Preparation, and Procopius of Gaza in the exposition of the first chapter of the book of Genesis. Athanasius, in his Synopsis, rejects this whole narration among the Apocryphal writings.

CICCUS [Cecco] OF ASCOLI, in [his] commentaries on the Centiloquium of Ptolemy, making mention of these tablets of heaven, left [it] thus written: The common opinion of the wise astrologers is that not only the eighth sphere, but also the ninth and the tenth, are like tablets painted with various configurations, images, and marks: for in the sign of Aries is the image of a beautiful youth, and in the sign of Virgo, the image of a virgin carrying a boy; and in the other signs and parts of the heaven are diverse effigies, and characters, and letters, showing us the causes of these lower [things] — concerning which is to be understood that sentence of the Patriarch Jacob: I have read in the tablets of heaven whatsoever shall befall you. And these figures are not idle, but influence various effects into this world. And therefore Ptolemy says, in this part of the Centiloquium: THE FACES of this world are subject to the faces of the superior bodies — that is, to the figurations and aspects of the images which are in the celestial bodies. And although these figures cannot be seen by all indifferently, yet by those who have the sharpest sight and the most purified mind, at certain times and in the clearest serenity of night, they can be descried. Whence, from the observation of these, was gathered by the wise that art which is called the Notory [Art], by the virtue of which those same wise men performed many wonderful experiments for the use of men. For they engraved — either in metals, or in choice stones — or they imprinted, in gum, or in wax or clay, the marks of the celestial figures which they had seen in the tablets of heaven, and they added the names of the angels whom, by God's revealing, they had known to preside over those figures; and thus, from the engraving and impression of these, they worked many admirable effects, to the praise of God and the benefit of men. But afterward certain corrupters of this art added to it certain figures, and infernal marks, which they said were found in the region of the damned, and the names of demons — out of which, at the devil's persuasion, they formed images for inducing lusts, discords, homicides, thefts, sicknesses, bewitchings, poisonings, sorceries, etc. And therefore, on account of this corruption, it came about at last that the art — good in itself — was, on account of the superadded malice, condemned and prohibited. Thus far Ciccus: intimating by these words that the former part of this art is not to be disapproved. Nor does Thomas Cajetan seem to be far from his opinion, who — upon the Secunda Secundae of St. Thomas, expounding Article 2, question 96 — contends with keen zeal that the images of the stars and of the celestial signs, imprinted on metals by astronomical artifice, are endowed with the powers of those same stars [2]: for example, that the figure of the Lion [Leo], engraved on gold while the constellation Leo holds the ascendant, would receive from the star of the Lion a certain profitable power, most salutary especially for those whom the influx of the Leonine constellation governs. But I, to declare frankly what is in my mind, judge that both parts are, by fullest right, to be hissed off and utterly rejected: the first indeed as an empty and superstitious fallacy, resting on no reason or authority; the latter as a certain and open impiety of detestable infidelity. Both are condemned by St. Thomas in the Secunda Secundae, question 96, and by the Ecumenical Synod of Trent, in the Index of rejected volumes.

IOTA and APEX — in the Hebrew Gospel of Matthew [they] are called יוד או עוקץ Yod o ■oqets, that is, Yod, or Apex [tittle]; but in the Greek, ἰῶτα ἕν, ἢ μία κεραία — that is, one Iota, or one apex. Concerning these, Christ, speaking in passing in Matthew, says: [3] AMEN I say to you, till heaven and earth pass, one iota, or one Apex, shall not pass from the law, till all be done — wishing by these words vehemently to express the perfect observance of the whole law in himself [4], even to the least

[1] Origen wrongly thought certain angels to be incarnate [2] Thomas Cajetan contends that the images of the stars, imprinted on metals by astronomical artifice, are endowed with the powers of those same stars — which opinion is by no means to be approved [3] Matt. 5:18 [4] The law is to be perfectly observed

[→ even to the least] and slightest precepts to be fulfilled. For these — the Iod and the apices [tittles] — signified the smallest particles of the law. For since there are two kinds of precepts in the law — the one Moral, the other Ceremonial — Christ fulfilled both. [1] For the ceremonial [precepts], which were nothing but shadows and figures of the Christ to come, Christ himself obscured [outshone] by the splendor of his coming. But the moral [precepts] he alone fulfilled most perfectly, in himself and by himself, according to the will of God the lawgiver, because he alone was innocent and without sin; and then he granted us also to fulfill these same [precepts] by the spirit of his grace. But, since by the name of Apex, both among the Greeks and among the Latins, two [things] are signified — namely, points, and the topmost tips of letters — this place gave occasion of inquiring what Apex here signifies: points, or the tips of letters. [2] Christian Druthmar, in [his] commentaries on Matthew, writes thus on this matter: An APEX is called the mark [titulus] which among the ancients was placed over certain letters, whether for the sake of distinction, or to show that the letter was to be doubled. For example, when Populus [meant] a people, it was not placed: but when Populus meant a tree [poplar], then an apex was placed above, that it might warn the reader to depart from the usual meaning, and [that] the syllable was long. [It] was also placed for the sake of doubling — as in Alleluia, because there two L's ought to be, one L was written, and an apex above; from this it was understood that the letter L was to be doubled. In the syllable IA likewise, an apex was placed over the I, to show that that I was to be doubled. The Lord, therefore, shows that such distinctions are not to be passed over in the divine scripture: because, if they were neglected, the sense also would perish along [with them]. Thus he. Others of the Latins suppose that by Apices here ought to be understood those points which are everywhere written in the Hebrew codices, for forming the sounds of the vowel letters; and they assert that the marks of these points existed not only in the times of Christ, but even long before — many doctors of the Hebrews attesting this. Of whom some refer the invention of the vowel-points to the men of the Great Synagogue — in which were Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi, Daniel, Hananiah, Azariah, Ezra, and Nehemiah; but others judge this invention to be from God, who delivered the law to Moses on Mount Sinai together with the letters and the vowel-points. The greater part of the learned men opposes their opinion; of whose number Augustine, in the first book On the Lord's Sermon on the Mount, expounds by Apices the little parts placed at the top of letters. Isidore says the Apices are little lines on the tips of letters; Euthymius, oblique lines; Thomas calls [them] little strokes drawn at the top of letters, which distinguish the like figures of the Hebrew letters. Which opinion indeed I judge most true — both because that Syriac or Chaldaic word עוקץ ■Oqets signifies rather the summit [point] of a thing than a point [dot]; and because it is sufficiently established that in the times of Christ, and long after, the Hebrew letters lacked the vowel-points — which (as Elias [Levita] writes in the preface of the book Masoreth ha-Masoreth) the Rabbis of the city of Tiberias, more practiced than the rest in the holy tongue, invented and added to the reading, in the 436th year from the last devastation of the temple — that is, in the year of Christ 476. [3] Of which matter there are also these proofs: that neither Epiphanius nor Jerome made any mention at all of these points, although they often had occasion and necessity of speaking about them, if they had existed at that time; and the most ancient codices of the Hebrews, even if now they have the points, are perceived nevertheless once not to have had them — both from the dissimilarity of the ink, and from the position of the [points] themselves. Now the ancient Jews, in writing, used almost always consonants alone (as has been said elsewhere), which they pronounced according to the common usage of speaking, following the variety of the regions. Jerome attests this in the epistle to Evagrius; who, disputing whether — where in Genesis it is said, MELCHIZEDEK, KING OF SALEM — it should be read Salem or Salim, thus says: [4] IT MATTERS not whether thou read Salem or Salim, since the Hebrews very rarely use vowels in the midst of the letters; and, according to the will of the readers and the diversity of the regions, they utter the same words with different sounds and accents. See on this matter in the third book, in the Elementary Exposition.

THE JUDICIAL BOOKS, or The Books opened in the judgment. Concerning these Daniel says, in the seventh chapter: THE JUDGMENT sat, and the books were opened. [5] The opening of the books signifies [6] the opening of hearts, and of human minds — which now are inscrutable to us — [an opening] to be future on the day of judgment; when, before the tribunal of God, in the sight of all, the works of each one, whether good or evil, shall be laid open. And since God wishes the books to be kept closed with him until that supreme day, by this example he admonishes us not to judge rashly the hidden and unknown minds and thoughts of our brethren — which God willed to be hidden from mortals in this world — but to leave them to be judged by Him who alone knows the hearts of men, according to the precept of Paul, saying: THEREFORE judge not before the time, until the Lord come, who will illuminate the hidden things of darkness, and will make manifest the counsels of the hearts: and then shall every man have praise from God. [7]

THE GOSPEL OF JUDAS ISCARIOT — the Cainite heretics venerated [it] greatly. In it Judas is magnificently praised, in that he betrayed Christ, his master, to the Jews, according to the knowledge which he had of the divine determination [decree]. For Judas knew that through the death of Christ the world would be redeemed, and the kingdom of Satan overthrown; and on that account he hastened to betray Christ, that he might procure salvation for us through his cross. Epiphanius, in the first book of the Panarion against the Cainites, and Theodoret, in the first book of the Heretical fables, are witnesses.

JUDAS MACCABAEUS collected the commentaries of the holy war, which Mattathias [his] father undertook against the kings of Asia for the liberty of [his] country and the divine laws, and which he himself, after [his] Father, gloriously accomplished. The author of the second book of Maccabees, chapter 2, obscurely intimates these, in these words: [8] JUDAS gathered together all those [things] which he had learned through the war which had befallen us; and they are with us — which, if you desire to read, send [those] who may bring [them] to you.

THE BOOK OF THE JUST [Upright] (which the sacred letters call ספר הישר Sepher ha-yashar [printed chaiasciar], and the LXX everywhere rendered βιβλίον τοῦ εὐθοῦς — that is, The Book of the just [the upright]) was of great authority among the divine writers. Out of it, in the book of Joshua, is brought forward the testimony concerning the miracle of the Sun standing in the midst of heaven, in these words:

[→ NON- (Josh 10)]

THE HEART (Jer 31), and THE BOOK DESIRED BY JOB (Job 19 & 31). Running head: LIBER SECVNDVS.)

[→ IS this not] written in the book of the just: And the Sun and the Moon stood still, until the nation avenged itself of its enemies? [1] And in the second book of Kings, chapter 1, it is had: DAVID commanded that they should teach the sons of Judah the bow, as it is written in the book of the just. [2] [3] Some think that this is the book of the eternal predestination, in which are written all the just, whom God in his eternal foreknowledge foreknew to be saved; psalm 63 [68] attesting this, in which is read: LET THEM BE BLOTTED OUT of the book of the just, and let them not be written with the just. [4] Jerome, in the Questions on the books of Kings (if however that work is Jerome's), hands down that this is the book of Samuel — that is, the first and second volume of Kings — because in it are written the deeds of the just: namely, of Samuel, David, Nathan, Gad, and other Just [men]. Certain of the Hebrews — to whom it does not seem likely that the same book should adduce itself in testimony of its own statement — think that this is the book of the twelve prophets; because the words cited in the book of Joshua are written in the prayer of Habakkuk in this manner: [5] THE SUN and Moon stood still in their dwelling. Which opinion indeed cannot be true, because the book of the twelve Prophets was written almost a thousand years after the times of Joshua. Accordingly Rabbi Solomon [Rashi] teaches that this is the volume of the whole law, in which are written the deeds of the just — Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Moses; but especially that admonition to the sons of Israel, that they should exercise themselves in the art of war (in which the bow and arrows then held the chief place), mindful of that precept, THY HANDS [SHALL BE] ON THE NECKS OF THINE ENEMIES; which is contained in the volume of Genesis. [6] There are also those who believe this to be the book of Exodus, because in it God said to Moses: WRITE this for a memorial, and deliver [it] to the ears of Joshua; for I will blot out the memory of Amalek from under heaven. [7] Theodoret, bishop of Cyrus, in the Questions on Joshua, supposes this to be a most ancient commentary, out of which the history of the book of Joshua was collected in compendium by an uncertain author.

L.

LEMUEL [Lamuel], a Hebrew king, wrote a certain two-part instruction, which is recited in the last chapter of Proverbs: [8] of which the former part has a brief instruction of a king; but the latter contains the instruction of a mother of a family, comprehended in twenty-two verses, namely according to the order and number of the Hebrew letters — so that the several verses begin with the several letters [an acrostic]. The Jews think [9] that this Lemuel was Solomon, called therefore למואל Lamuel — that is, God [is] with us — because in his days God was with the Israelites, all worship of idols being shut out, especially in the time of his youth, when with great zeal he raised a temple to God Most High, and propagated the divine worship.

THE LAW INSCRIBED ON THE HEART (which God, through Jeremiah, promised to his faithful, saying: [10] AFTER those days, I will give my law in their bowels, and in their hearts I will write it) is the law of Evangelical grace [11] — that is, the living and ardent experience of divine love — written not on tablets of stone, as [was] that old law, of which the Jews so greatly glory; nor on perishable pages with deletable ink, but on the fleshly and soft tablets of the heart; not with a pen, but with the finger of the living God — that is, with the Holy Spirit: who has so impressed the precepts of love on the hearts of the faithful, that he who holds this law fulfills all the commands of the law (as Paul says), [12] and has no need of long exhortations, by which he might be kindled to living well and blessedly. For charity, of itself burning, and perpetually boiling with the fire of love toward God and neighbor, knows not how to be idle, [13] but of its own accord bursts forth into holy works. Chrysostom, feeling almost this same [thing], says that this writing of the law, of which the Prophet speaks, is a restoration and a clearer expression of that most ancient and first law of all, which God, in the first age of the human race, delivered to his elect without any writing. For since those most blessed men — Adam, Abel, Enoch, Noah, Abraham, Job — were strong in a most upright life, they needed no books or writings; but their hearts were to them in place of books; and in place of pages and parchments they had their minds and incorrupt intellects, in which God — not with ink, but by the grace of his illumination — wrote his laws, as in living and animate books, suggesting all [things] which would be necessary for a pious and holy life. But after that, in the progress of time, the human race had slipped down into the abyss of vices, it abolished from the heart every writing of the divine Spirit. Whence also tablets and books were afterward substituted in place of the abolished law [14], that through them men might be roused to the remembrance of the lost discipline. But, since these had profited little, our lawgiver Christ came at last, who — according to the prophecy of Jeremiah — would again engrave the law of God (delivered from the beginning of the world without writings) on human hearts, through the Holy Spirit.

THE BOOK DESIRED BY JOB. Job himself recalls this, in chapter 19, saying: [15] WHO will grant me that my words may be written down in a book, or engraved with an iron pen, and on a plate of lead, or graven with a chisel in flint? And again in the thirty-first chapter, repeating the same in other words, he adds: [16] WHO will grant me that the Almighty may hear my desire, and that He who judges may Himself write a book; that I may carry it on my shoulder, and put it around me like a crown, and through each of my steps pronounce it, and offer it, as it were, to a prince? This book, so greatly desired by blessed Job, signifies nothing else [17] than an open demonstration of his innocence, which he wishes to be laid open by God, the inspector of all things. For since he was striving to show that he was not tortured for committed crimes, but was exercised with tribulations for the proof of virtue and the trial of patience — and could not persuade of this [his] incredulous friends, who asserted that he, as a hypocrite, was being punished by the just judgment of God — he desires a book to be written by God: that is, he prays that an Apology and Justification of his integrity be committed to writing, God revealing [it], and be transmitted to the memory of posterity — not for the ostentation of glory, but for the consolation of the pious; that, these [things] being heard, they may recognize that God often sends adversities upon his elect for the exercise of piety. But it must be noted, as regards the phrasing, that the plate of lead is not so referred to the stylus that the meaning should be [that they were engraved] with a stylus of iron and of lead —

[→ with a stylus] of lead, or [engraved] with an iron and a leaden stylus, on flint: (since with a leaden stylus stones cannot be cut out) — but the meaning is that the letters are engraved with an iron stylus, [and] then are to be formed on the stone with a plate of lead. For he who inscribes letters on marble [1] first hollows them out with a chisel or an iron stylus; then he fills up the empty spaces of the letters with plates of lead or bronze, that he may render their marks more conspicuous — as at Rome may be seen in the inscription of Marcus Agrippa, consul for the third time, which is still viewed on the frontispiece [pediment] of the temple of the Pantheon.

THE BOOK OF THE LAW, found by Hilkiah, [2] of which it is written in the fourth book of Kings, chapter 22, and in the second [book] of Paralipomenon, chapter 34, was found on this occasion: When Manasseh, the impious king — who ruled the kingdom of Jerusalem fifty-five years — had utterly abolished the books of the law of the Lord, and had killed the Prophets and priests who taught it, and the other pious men who had refused to follow his impiety; a certain man, kindled with zeal for the holy laws, hid a copy of the divine law in the inner recesses of the temple. But when Josiah, the most pious king, in the 26th year of his age and the 18th of his reign, had sent to Hilkiah the high priest — father of Jeremiah the Prophet — that he might bring forth the money which was in the hidden places of the temple, for repairing the ruins of the temple: he [Hilkiah], diligently searching for the gold, found also the book of the sacred law, and sent [it] to the king. Who, when he had heard the divine threatenings and the imminent calamities of the city which were described in it, having rent [his] garment, commanded Hilkiah the high priest and Shaphan the scribe to go to consult Huldah the prophetess, [to learn] whether by any counsel or aid that disaster could be escaped. There are those who think that this book was not the codex of the Mosaic law, but some other prophetic volume. For since Manasseh — after his penance and having obtained liberty, having returned from the Babylonian captivity into [his] kingdom — purged the temple, cast away the idols, and restored the worship of God (as we read in the second [book] of Paralipomenon), nor is it likely that he did not restore the law of the Lord, which is the head and fountain of the whole divine worship: it is also credible that Josiah, as a most religious man, had not only often heard and read the law (already restored by Manasseh), but also knew [it] well. Wherefore, if the recently-found book — read before that [time] — had contained the Mosaic law, to whose reading the king was already accustomed, it would not have been necessary for him to be so vehemently disturbed at the words of the book, as at an unexpected thing and one heard then for the first time, as to tear [his] garment, and to send to Huldah the prophetess to inquire concerning the meaning of that scripture. Chrysostom, in the ninth homily on Matthew, and Rabbi Solomon [Rashi], think that this was the book of Deuteronomy — which Manasseh, weighed down by old age and prevented by death, could not find; the narration of which Josiah then hearing for the first time, when he had come to the words of chapter 28 (which foretold to the Jews the utmost destruction and a long captivity, if ever they should forsake God), was seized with such grief of mind that, with weeping and tears, he rent [his] garment, and compelled all the people to give an oath that they would thenceforth keep entire all the precepts of that book. The book of Deuteronomy, therefore, was found — hidden for many years before — in the three thousand three hundred fifty-eighth year from the founding of the world; which, when they had again lost [it] through the injury of the times, the Christians at length found overwhelmed with mud, a little before the age of Chrysostom [3] — which he himself also noted in the 7th homily on the former [epistle] to the Corinthians.

THE WRITING OF THE TWO STICKS. Concerning this it is read in Ezekiel, chapter 37, in this manner: [4] SON of man, take thee one stick, and write upon it, [For] Judah, and [for] the sons of Israel his companions; and take another stick, and write upon it, [For] Joseph, [the stick of] Ephraim, and [of] all the house of Israel, and his companions; and join them, one to the other, for thee into one stick: and they shall be in a union in thy hand. This writing was a symbol of the conjunction, under one king, the Messiah, of the whole Hebrew people — [now] discordant among themselves, and dispersed, and torn asunder. The history is well known: that under Rehoboam, son of Solomon, the ten tribes went over to Jeroboam, son of Nebat, of the tribe of Ephraim, son of Joseph, as it is written in the third book of Kings, chapter 12. And after these there were two peoples — namely, Judah, and his companion the tribe of Benjamin; and [the] ten tribes, which were called Joseph, or Ephraim: and these two nations, after king Josiah, were dispersed among the nations; and after Zedekiah both kingdoms were exterminated. From this image, therefore, of the two sticks, [5] the Prophet foretells that these two peoples are not only to be delivered, but to be again joined into the one kingdom of the Messiah, and to come together, by the highest consent, into one lawful king, so that it may seem — and be — utterly one scepter. For by the stick was made the symbol of the scepter of the kingdom: on the former stick is inscribed Judah and [his] companions — that is, Benjamin; the inscription of the other was Ephraim. Now the Prophet wished to join this sign to the word of God, that he might move the ears more effectively through the sight of the eyes. For things seen procure attention to the speech of the one speaking. Thus in the old law many ceremonies were employed, that, moved by these rites, the simple and children might ask what they meant and signified. [6] So also many ceremonies were instituted in the Church, that from them the weakness of our understanding might come to know the inner and hidden will of God. Some hold that these two sticks coalesced into one by a miracle; which, if it be accepted, the parable will be more effective. This symbol of the union of the two sticks signified that — through the union of the two woods of the cross of Christ — the two peoples, Gentile and Jew, would come together into one Church, under one king, Christ, with the highest consent of minds. Whence Paul says: [7] HE MADE both one, reconciling the enmities in himself, [preaching] peace to those who were near, etc.

LINUS — one of the seventy-two disciples of Christ, by whose name Paul salutes Timothy in the latter epistle to him [8] — the first Pontiff of the Roman Church after Peter, an Etruscan by nation, wrote in the Greek tongue two books Of the contest [martyrdom] of Peter and Paul; and likewise several letters. He dies at Rome under the emperor Galba, in the year of Christ seventy, after having completed eleven years, three months, [and] twelve days of his pontificate.

THE LETTER THAT KILLETH (concerning which Paul, writing in the latter epistle to the Corinthians, says: [9] THE LETTER killeth, but the spirit quickeneth) is the law of Moses; to which the Apostle everywhere ascribes not only that it kills the soul, but also that it excites the tinder [fomes] of concupiscence to

Running head: LIBER SECVNDVS.)

[→ to] sin; that it begets an abundance of sins; that it induces wrath and indignation, and brings in death, and ministers damnation. For, writing thus to the Romans, he says: [1] OCCASION being taken, sin, through the commandment, wrought in me all concupiscence. And again: [2] The law worketh wrath. For where there is no law, neither [is there] transgression. And: [3] The law entered in, that the offense might abound. Likewise: [4] Sin, occasion being taken through the commandment, seduced me, and by it slew [me]. Likewise: [5] The commandment wrought death for me, that sin might become exceedingly sinful. And in the second [epistle] to the Corinthians, he calls it the minister of death, and the ministration of damnation. [6] And in the epistle to the Galatians he calls [it] a writing of malediction — not on this account, that the law is evil, and of its own nature noxious, or death-bringing by the malignity of its author (as of old the Manichaeans, destroyers of the law, said); but for other far different reasons, which the orthodox fathers learned from the doctrine of Paul. Origen says that by the letter which killeth is to be understood every tropical and figurative locution of the divine scripture, and every shadowy precept of the ancient ceremonies, understood according to the bare sense of the letter, just as its words sound. In which way indeed the letter kills those who, spurning the spiritual sense lying hidden in them, pursue only the external and carnal understanding. For, as Paul says in the eighth chapter of the epistle to the Romans, [7] to be wise according to the flesh is death; but to be wise according to the spirit, [is] life and peace — as if anyone should take carnally all [things] which are written in the Song of Songs, according to the lustful concupiscence of carnal love, and not according to the affection of chaste and divine love: this one is killed by the perverse understanding of the letter. Or if anyone should believe that circumcision, sacrifices, and the other shadows of the law — which God commands to be kept by an everlasting covenant — are still to be done according to the letter, and not rather to be fulfilled according to the spirit: he slides down from the grace of Christ into Judaism, and it [the letter] slays him. But there is, as the same Origen says in the 7th homily on Leviticus, not only in the Old Testament, but also in the New Testament, a letter of this kind that kills — which kills him who does not spiritually attend to the [things] which are said. For if, according to the letter, you follow this very [saying] which was spoken: [8] He who has not a sword, let him sell his tunic, and buy a sword — behold, this too is a letter of the gospel; but it kills. But if you receive it spiritually, it does not kill; but in it is the quickening spirit. Chrysostom says that by the word the letter that killeth is signified the Mosaic law, but by the name the quickening spirit, the grace which is conferred through baptism. Because the law damns and punishes offenders; but grace absolves and justifies sinners. The law, if it catch a murderer, takes him from among the living; grace, if it receive a murderer, illuminates and quickens [him]. The killing letter of the law stones [him who is] gathering wood on the Sabbath. [9] Grace of the quickening spirit receives innumerable murderers and robbers, and saves [them when] baptized. The law makes the living [man] dead: [him] whom grace catches, it makes from dead alive — saying, [10] COME TO ME ALL YOU WHO LABOR AND ARE BURDENED, AND I WILL REFRESH YOU. He said not, I will punish you, but I will refresh you. For in baptism sins are blotted out, the former [sins] are blotted out, the man is quickened; and in his heart, as on a tablet, all grace is written. Augustine, in the book Of the spirit and the letter — in which he most copiously treats this sentence of Paul — by the law understands especially the law of the Decalogue itself: which, although it is just and best, is nevertheless said to kill, and to work wrath, and sin, and malediction: because, while it points out and prohibits sin, it gives occasion of spiritual destruction in two chief ways — that is, by increasing the desire of sinning, and by aggravating the transgression of sin. For first, when the law forbids sin, from this prohibition it increases concupiscence, the fountain of all evils; which by its own nature always strives after the forbidden, and desires the [things] denied. For just as the rush of water, if it does not cease to flow into that part to which it is carried by its own violence, becomes more vehement when a barrier is set against it — and when it has overcome the mass of it, hurled down in a greater heap, is rolled forward down the slopes: so this very thing which is coveted is more ardently desired while it is forbidden; torments more sharply while it is not had; and becomes more pleasant when it is obtained. And this is what Paul wished to indicate, when he said: [11] OCCASION being taken, sin wrought in me all concupiscence. And again: [12] Sin, occasion being taken through the commandment, seduced me, and slew [me]. Then the law heaps up and aggravates the gravity of the crime committed, because it is much more grievous to have fallen into sin where the law has pointed out and prohibited sin, than before: because where there is no law, there neither is transgression, as the Apostle says. [13] But when through the law the knowledge of sin has been laid open, [14] then he who knowingly and willingly sins is reckoned [guilty of] a greater and graver crime. And for this cause Paul said: [15] THE LAW entered in, that the offense might abound. [16] And through the commandment sin becomes exceedingly sinful. For these causes, therefore, the law is not undeservedly called a killing letter; but the spirit of grace is deservedly called quickening: because it lessens the concupiscence which the law increases, extinguishes the desire of sinning, and inspires the contrary desire of doing good through faith, and — through charity, poured out in our hearts — fulfills the good desire with good works.

THE LETTER OF LYSIAS — intimate and companion of Antiochus, king of Syria — to the people of the Jews, is had in the second [book] of Maccabees, chapter 11.

LUKE the Evangelist, writer of the gospel and of the Acts of the Apostles, was believed by very many of the ancients [to be] the author of the epistle which is inscribed, under the name of Paul the Apostle, to the Hebrews [17]; among whom [that] the chief was Tertullian, Jerome attests in the Catalog of ecclesiastical writers. Which opinion — utterly false — we shall show [to be so] in the seventh volume of this work. Tertullian has handed down to memory [18] that a certain Asian presbyter, a devotee of Paul, out of a pious but lying zeal, feigned certain Acts of Paul and Thecla, falsely inscribed with the title of Luke; and that he, when they [i.e. these Acts] were convicted of falsity in judgment, confessed that he had done this, led by love of Paul. It is also said that Luke, after he had written the life of Christ the Saviour, also painted with brush and colors an image of him and of his mother [19], and left the icons of both to the Church of Antioch. Making mention of which thing, Simon Metaphrastes, in the life of St. Luke, [20] thus writes: THIS, moreover, among other [things], is most pleasing — that he also [portrayed] the very assumed type of the humanity of Christ, and the image of him

[→ and the image] of her who bore him — Luke, first of all, painting [them] in wax and outline, handed [them] down, so that even to these times they might be honored in the image; as though he thought it not enough to be, in mind and spirit, with those whom he loved, unless he might also be conversant with them through image and figure: which is a token of most fervent love. Thus far he [Metaphrastes]. Nicephorus Callistus, in the 14th and 15th books of the Ecclesiastical History, speaks in this manner concerning the image of the Virgin Mother of God painted by Luke: [1] PULCHERIA Augusta built a temple in the city of Constantinople, called τῶν ὁδηγῶν, that is, [the temple] Of the Guides of the Way [Hodegon]: where she dedicated the image of the Mother of God sent from Antioch — which the holy Apostle Luke himself painted with his own hands, while she [Mary] was yet living and seeing the very panel, and imparting so great a grace to that likeness of her. This image was first in that place which is called the Tribunal; where those miracles were performed which even now also are done. [2] Thus Nicephorus. We once saw at Venice, in the house of Titian, the most celebrated painter of our times, a copy of this sacred picture, taken (as was believed) from the archetype of St. Luke: in which were seen all those features which the same Nicephorus expressed in the second volume of the same history; where, describing the stature and form of the most holy Virgin from the opinion of Epiphanius, [3] he brings these [things]: MARY the virgin was of middling stature, although there are those who say that she somewhat exceeded the middling stature. She was of a color resembling wheat, with fair [blond] hair, keen eyes, having in them somewhat-yellow pupils, and, as it were, of the color of the olive: her eyebrows were arched, and becomingly black: [her] nose rather long, [her] lips blooming, and full of the sweetness of words: [her] face not round or sharp, but somewhat longer: [her] hands and fingers longer. Finally, she was devoid of all pride, simple, and in no way affecting her countenance. She was content with garments of natural color — which also the holy veil of her head shows.

MARK, bishop of Alexandria, and Evangelist (whom Luke, in the Acts of the Apostles, chapter twelve, names John, son of Mary) [4] — after the gospel gathered by him from the mouth of Peter the Apostle, whose companion and interpreter he was [5] — wrote, in a brief volume, the life of Barnabas the Apostle, and his cousin — [a life] which Bede the presbyter is believed to have translated from the Greek tongue into the Latin speech. James, Archbishop of Genoa [Jacobus de Voragine], makes mention of this work in the book of the Yearly Festivities. There are also those who report that he committed other [things] to the monuments of letters; of which neither do they themselves recount the titles, nor have we found [them] noted anywhere.

THE WRITING OF THE HAND appearing on the wall of the Babylonian palace had only three Chaldaic words, and those messengers of a most inauspicious omen — namely: [6]

מנא MENE, that is, He hath numbered; or, as the Greeks read, ἐμέτρησε, He hath measured.

תקל THEKEL, which is, He hath weighed.

פרס PHERES, that is, He hath divided.

The occasion of the writing of these, and at the same time the interpretation, Daniel — in the fifth chapter of his volume — relates to have been such: When Belshazzar, king of the Assyrians, was besieged within Babylon by Cyrus, king of the Persians, and Darius [king] of the Medes — he, the enemy being utterly neglected, feasting in a certain spacious hall, reclined with great magnificence, [his] concubines reclining with [him], and the chief of [his] nobles. And when he had now grown hot with wine, he commanded the sacred vessels to be brought — which Nebuchadnezzar had placed from the temple of Jerusalem into his own temple; and when he was drinking in them together with his concubines, and hurling many contumelious words against God: suddenly, from the wall opposite, a hand was seen to project, whose fingers left the aforesaid words, gradually written thereon. By which portent the king, most greatly terrified, when he had long and much sought the meaning of the writing from his magi and diviners, and had not been able to find [it]; at last, Daniel being summoned, obtained from him the mournful interpretation of the words, in this manner: [7] SINCE, O king, said Daniel, thou hast proudly despised the greatest God of all, who raised thee to the summit of so great a kingdom, and hast poured forth impious words against him with a sacrilegious mouth, and hast not feared to drink from his sacred vessels together with thy concubines; on account of these [things] God, being angry, announces to thee by this writing what [kind of] end thou shalt have of [thy] kingdom and life. For thus are the several words of it to be interpreted. MENE, that is, He hath numbered, signifies that God has numbered the days both of thy life and of thy kingdom, and that the end of both is soon at hand. THEKEL, that is, He hath weighed, signifies that God has weighed thy works in the balance of his justice; and in the one scale of the balance, which was lower [heavier], there appeared an enormous weight of pride, luxury, blasphemy, and thy tyranny; but in the other, which was very light, there appeared that thou hast less piety toward God and justice toward men than would be fitting for a king — and above all for that king whom God had set over so many kingdoms and peoples. PHERES, which is He hath divided, signifies that God has divided all the riches of thy most opulent kingdom, and has now distributed them in portions among the Medes and Persians. And this was the occasion of this writing, and its right interpretation. Which indeed to have been most true, the event of the prediction itself confirmed immediately the very next night; for while Belshazzar was lying [there], partly struck with the horror of the portent, partly overcome with sleep and wine, he was slain by his chamberlains, who had already before conspired against his life; and the city, by treachery, was handed over to the Medes and Persians.

I judge that it is not to be passed over in this place, that the Rabbis of the Hebrews took, from the interpretation of this writing, occasion of devising a certain new kind of exposition upon the sacred letters [8] — called by them kabbalistic: [9] in that they not only explain the sentences and entire clauses of the divine scripture, but also, weighing separately the syllables and each single letter, examine [them], and expound [them] with various senses, both historical and mystical — the argument being taken from hence, that just as it was permitted to Daniel to explicate single words by single whole clauses, so it is lawful for the other Rabbis of the synagogue, by a like example, to interpret the syllables — and even the letters of words themselves, one separated from another — by certain words which those letters signify. But concerning this manner of interpre-

MARY, the most blessed Virgin, Mother of our Lord and God Jesus Christ, is said to have written a certain very brief letter to Ignatius the martyr [1] — disciple of John the Apostle [2], and the third bishop of the Church of Antioch after Peter. For he [Ignatius], since he was held by an incredible ardor of seeing, and of speaking face to face with, the mother of the Lord, wrote to her a rather brief letter in this manner: [3]

> ME — a neophyte, and a disciple of thy John — thou oughtest to have comforted and consoled. For concerning thy Jesus I have received innumerable [things] to tell, and I was astounded at the hearing. But from thee — who wast always familiar and joined to him, and privy to his secrets — I desire in [my] mind to be made more certain concerning the [things] heard. I have written to thee also at other times, and asked. Farewell: and let the neophytes who are with me be comforted from thee, and through thee, and in thee. Amen.

To which letter the Mother of God satisfied [replied] with this response: [4]

> To Ignatius, [her] beloved disciple, the humble handmaid of Christ Jesus.
> THE [things] concerning JESUS which thou hast heard and learned from John are true. Believe them, cleave to them, and firmly hold the vow of Christianity, and conform [thy] morals and life to the vow. And I will come, together with John, to see thee, and those who are with thee. Stand, and act manfully in the faith. Nor let the austerity of persecution move thee; but let thy spirit be strong, and exult in God thy salvation. Amen.

St. Bernard makes mention of Ignatius's letter, [5] on the ninetieth psalm, in the seventh sermon, in these words: THAT GREAT Ignatius — a hearer of the disciple whom Jesus loved, our martyr, with whose precious relics our poverty is enriched [6] — salutes Mary, in several letters which he wrote to her, as CHRIST-BEARING. An excellent title of dignity indeed — that is, a commendation of immense honor. Dionysius the Carthusian, in the commentaries which he published on the book of Dionysius the Areopagite On the divine names, thus writes concerning the letter of Ignatius: [7] SAINT Ignatius, in one of his letters to the most sacred Virgin, fervently asks her that, for the consolation and comforting of himself and of many neophytes, she would deign to come to him. But of both letters Marcus Michael, a presbyter of Cortona, in the book Of illustrious men, makes record in this manner: [8] IGNATIUS wrote four letters to various [recipients]: the first to the Ephesians, the second to the Magnesians, the third to the Colossians [so; the genuine third is to the Trallians], the fourth to the Romans. There are also extant his letters to John the Evangelist, his teacher, and to Mary, the most blessed Virgin, and the most humble mother of our Lord the Saviour; to whom she herself did not humbly disdain to render a brief letter in response.

THE GREAT QUESTIONS OF MARY, and the Small Questions of the same, are books filled with execrable impieties and blasphemies by the Gnostic and Stratiotic heretics [9]; in which, among other mysteries of detestable foulness, is handed down a rite of the Lord's Supper, celebrated among those same heretics with such abomination that the mind shudders to speak [it], and the hand recoils from writing [it]. But, that it may appear from this into how great a deep of prodigious blindness, and abyss of diabolical madness, they rush who imitate the Gnostics (so called from the knowledge of all things which they professed) [10] — that is, who, relying on their own wit and wisdom, depart from ecclesiastical discipline and the traditions of the holy fathers — I shall not be reluctant briefly to report what Epiphanius writes concerning this in the first [book] of the Panarion against the Gnostics. [11] These, then, in the aforesaid volume of the Great Questions, have [it] that the Lord Jesus Christ revealed to the Virgin Mary a rite of the synaxis and of the Lord's communion, afterward observed by the Gnostics in this manner: All — men and women — assembled together into the same dining-room; there, when they had dined largely and sumptuously, the husbands, all shame cast aside, exposed their wives to the public, and invited one another into the embrace of his [own] wife with these words: Rise, brother, and make love with thy brother. And when the invited [man] mingled with the offered woman, each with his own hands received the flux of the male seed. Then, with palms spread and hands stretched out after the manner of suppliants, he offered this very [thing] to God, with this little prayer added: We offer to thee this gift, namely the body of Christ; [12] and immediately, taking the seed itself with the mouth, and eating [it], they added: For this is the body of Christ, and this is the Pascha, that is, the passion: therefore our bodies suffer, and in this manner confess the passion of Christ. In the same manner also, when it happened that a woman was in the flux of blood, they offered to God the menstruum collected from her; and immediately, eating [it], they said: And this is the blood of Christ. Now for the confirmation of this most base foulness they used not only the aforesaid volumes of the Questions, but — what can scarcely be believed — also the testimonies of the divine scriptures [13]; God so permitting, lest we should lightly believe those who strive to build up their dogmas (contrary to the traditions of the Church) from the divine letters, wrested in some way [to their purpose] — after the example of the Gnostics, who interpreted of this prodigious turpitude that which was said by Christ: [14] WHEN you shall see the Son of man returning where he was before — that is, the flux of the human seed returning thither whence it had gone out. And likewise that [saying]: [15] UNLESS you shall have eaten the flesh of the Son of man, and drunk his blood — that is, [they said, this means] in the human seed and the menstrual blood. To the same [purpose] they referred what Solomon said: [16] DRINK water from thy cisterns. And that which is had in the first psalm: [17] LIKE a tree planted beside the courses of waters, it shall give fruit in its season — and they expounded [it] of the genital member, which in the flux of the seed gives the fruit of pleasure. And that [phrase], [18] ITS leaf shall not fall, they said was added for this [reason]: that one should not let the drops of the seed fall to the ground, but should eat [it when] collected. Similarly, what is read in the Apocalypse concerning the tree bearing twelve fruits in the year, through the several months — which is the tree of life — they figuratively interpreted of the menstrual blood of a woman, flowing in the several months. [19] Thus Epiphanius. Augu-

[→ Thus Epiphanius.] But Augustine, in the book On heresies, to Quodvultdeus, writes that the Manichaeans in his own time, at Carthage, addicted to this execrable superstition, [1] were accustomed to take a Eucharist sprinkled [mixed] with flour and the human seed of those coupling.

THE STOCK, or LINEAGE, OF MARY — as, in the place cited above, Epiphanius reports [2] — is a book famous among the Gnostics, containing a horrible and pernicious doctrine; in which, among other portents, it is narrated that the priest Zechariah, having entered into the inner parts of the temple to burn incense before God, saw a certain form endowed with an ass's head [3]; and when he wished to reveal this vision, and to admonish the people not to worship an ass, he who had appeared took away from him the use of voice and tongue, but a few days after restored [what had been] taken away. Which [faculty] being received back, Zechariah disclosed the vision to the Jews; [and] they, indignant, cut him down. Moved by this cause, the lawgiver of the Hebrews commanded the priest that, entering to perform the sacred [rites], he should wear little bells hung on [his] garment: so that, warned by the sound, that ass-headed God might hide himself, lest his form, unseasonably beheld, should bring destruction on the beholder. Serapion, bishop of Thmuis, in the book against the Manichaeans, affirms that from the occasion of this book the Christians were once accused by the pagans [4], that — mingled with the Jews — they worshipped an ass as the deity of the Jews. Tertullian, however, in the Apologeticus, supposes that the Gentiles came into this suspicion from the writings of Cornelius Tacitus; who, in the fifth book of the Histories, relating the origin of the Hebrew religion, says that the Jews, driven out of Egypt — when in the vast solitude of Arabia they were wasting away with thirst — learned [the location of] the springs of water from wild asses, which by chance were making for drink from [their] pasture; and, mindful of the benefit, they honored the beast with divine honors, and afterward consecrated its image in the temple; and thence [it was] presumed by the Gentiles that the Christians, as [being] near to the Jewish religion, venerated an ass for [their] god. Whence also a certain hirer-out of beasts of burden dared, in the times of Tertullian, at Carthage — before the stable of the beasts, as it were the emblem of his trade — to hang up a placard, in which was painted a man wearing a toga, holding a book in [his] right hand: from whose head asinine ears projected; and on [his] feet the hoofs of an ass were seen; with this inscription: THE GOD OF THE CHRISTIANS, ONONYCHITES — that is, [having] ass's hoofs.

THE PASSING OF MARY [Transitus], or the Book of the passing of St. Mary, is rejected by Gelasius among the Apocryphal writings. James, Archbishop of Genoa [Jacobus de Voragine], in the Book of the Yearly Festivities, reports that he lit upon a certain Apocryphal volume of the same subject and title, ascribed to St. John the Evangelist [5]: in which it was written that the Virgin Mary, in the twenty-fourth year from the ascension of her Son, departed from this life; and that all the Apostles, snatched through the air in a moment of time, were present at [her] dying; and that they bore out her body with a public funeral and solemn obsequies, and laid [it] in a stone monument; and that she, after the third day, revived; and, with body entire, the Angels leading [her], flew up into heaven. But that Thomas — since he had been absent, and returning refused to believe — received, as a proof of the resurrection and of the bodily assumption into heaven, the girdle with which the body of the Virgin had been girded, let down from on high. Augustine, in sermon 35 On the saints, refutes the inscription, narration, and authority of this work in these words: [In] what order the Virgin Mary passed hence to the highest [places], no Catholic history narrates. [6] Not only, moreover, is this Church said to spit out the Apocrypha, but even to be ignorant [of these things]: since there are some [writings] composed, without the name of an author, concerning her assumption; which, as I said, are so guarded against that they are by no means permitted to be read for confirming the truth of the matter. Hence indeed some are troubled, because neither is her body found on earth, nor is her assumption with the flesh — as is read in the Apocrypha — found in Catholic history. But it is not worthy that anyone should be anxious about the knowledge of her body — [she] whom he doubts not to reign with Christ, exalted above the heavens. [7] But neither is any of the treatise-writers found to have said anything openly concerning her death. And what do I say of these, when not even he who received her before the cross of the Lord into his own [care] — that is, John the Evangelist — committed anything of this in writings to be retained by posterity? For no one could have narrated this more faithfully, had God willed it to be manifested. It remains, therefore, that a man should not mendaciously feign as manifest what God willed to remain hidden. But the true opinion concerning her assumption [8] is that — according to the Apostle, [whether] assumed in the body or out of the body, [we] not knowing — we should believe her to be above the angels. Thus Augustine concerning the passing and assumption of Mary: who seems openly to dissent from this opinion in the little book On the assumption of Mary, which, under his name, is reckoned among the writings of the ninth tome. [9] Jerome — or Jerome's companion Sophronius — in the sermon On the assumption of the Virgin, making mention of this book, thus writes: [10] IF that Apocryphon Of the passing of the Virgin Mary should come into your hands, receive not doubtful [things] for certain; which many of the Latins, out of love of piety and zeal for reading, embrace [too] fondly. And her sepulchre is shown, even to the present, in the midst of the valley of Josaphat. These [things] I would say for this reason, because many of our [people] doubt whether she was assumed together with the body, or departed [her] body being left [behind]; but how, or at what time, or by what persons her most holy body was taken away from thence, or where it was transferred, [and] whether she has risen again, is unknown. Although some wish to affirm that she is already raised up, and clothed with blessed immortality with Christ in the heavenly [places]. Nevertheless, which of these is to be reckoned the truer, we are in doubt. Better, however, [that] we commit the whole to God, to whom nothing is impossible, than that we should wish to define anything rashly by our own authority. But also, whether she has returned into the dust of the earth, we hold [it] not certain. Trithemius, in [his] catalog, reckons the book Of the passing of St. Mary among the works of Melito, bishop of Sardis — whose beginning is, MELITO, THE SERVANT OF CHRIST — which, however, Jerome, enumerating the writings of Melito, passed over. BEDE the presbyter, concerning this book, in the Retractations on the Acts of the Apostles, expounding that [verse], [11] All were dispersed through the regions of Judaea and Samaria, except the Apostles, left [it] thus written: IF, the Church being dispersed, the Apostles remained in Jerusalem, as Luke says, it is evident that he wrote a falsehood who — composing a book, in the person of Melito, bishop of Asia, concerning the death of the blessed Mother of God — says that in the second year after the ascension of the Lord all the Apostles were [→ all] divided over the whole world for preaching, each into his own province: who all, as the death of blessed Mary drew near, were lifted up on clouds from the places in which they were preaching the word of God, [and] snatched to Jerusalem, and set down before the door of her house; among whom also Paul, lately converted from a persecutor to the faith of Christ, who was taken up with Barnabas into the ministry of the Gentiles. Which writing also relates specially concerning John the Apostle, that at that time he was preaching at Ephesus — [things] which all contradict the words of blessed Luke; by which [words] he narrates that the Apostles, the other faithful being driven from Jerusalem, remained in that same place [1], and preached throughout all [things], until the Church had peace through all Judaea, and Samaria, and Galilee — which [peace] could have been achieved in one year, [of which] there is no doubt to anyone. [Luke] also manifestly insinuates that Paul was ordained into the ministry of the Gentiles with Barnabas [2], not in the second year after the ascension of the Lord, but a long time afterward. But far be it that we should believe [that] blessed John the Apostle — to whom the Lord on the cross commended his virgin mother, [entrusting the] virgin to [the] virgin — departed after one year, and left her alone, and so long cast down that she even feared that her body, [when] dead, would be burned by the enemies; and that she, on whose account he was snatched up on the clouds, anxiously begged that he — as if forgetful or careless of her — would return to her, saying: I BEG thee, son John, that thou be mindful of the word of thy master, my Lord Jesus Christ, who commended me to thee. For behold, [being] called, I shall enter the way of all the earth. And I have heard the counsels of the Jews, saying, Let us await the day when she dies who carried Jesus the Nazarene, and let us burn her body. Now therefore, son, take care of my obsequies. These [things] I have taken care to relate for this reason, because I have known some to give assent, by incautious rashness, to the aforesaid volume, against the authority of blessed Luke. Thus far Bede.

MATTHEW the Evangelist [3] is falsely made the author of two books, of which the one is inscribed Of the birth, or lineage, of Mary, the other Of the infancy of the Saviour: which are figments of the Valentinians and Gnostics. To these books certain foolish [persons], desiring to claim authority [for them], added prefaces feigned under the name of the bishops Chromatius and Heliodorus, to Jerome, and of Jerome to them; which [prefaces] would testify that both works were translated by Jerome, for the favor of those same bishops, from the Hebrew volume of Matthew, and purged from the falsifications of the heretics. But since in these books there now stand the same old-wives' fables which Irenaeus, in the first [book] against the heresies of the Valentinians, and Epiphanius, in the first [book] of the Panarion, section three, refute out of those same volumes, the deception of the impostors plainly appears. Gelasius, in the 15th distinction, casts out both among the books condemned by the Church.

THE GOSPEL OF THE APOSTLE MATTHIAS [4] — among other non-canonical gospels, Origen enumerates [it] in the first homily on Luke. The Traditions of the same [Matthias] Clement cites in the second book of the Stromata; and in the seventh book of the same work he writes that Marcion and Basilides confirmed their heresies from the authority of these. Eusebius, in the third book of the Ecclesiastical History, chapter twenty-five, reckons the Gospel of Matthias among the books forged by the heretics.

THE BOOK OF REMEMBRANCE [Memorial], or Of the Monument, in Hebrew ספר זכרון Sepher zikkaron. The Prophet Malachi, in the third chapter, recalls this, saying: [5] THE LORD attended, and heard, and wrote a book before [him], for those fearing the Lord, and thinking upon his name. This book signifies the particular memory and consideration which God has of his elect. The impious, seeing them afflicted, think that they are in forgetfulness with God. But the prophet says that God bears so great a care of them, and attends, and hears, that he numbers and writes all the groans of his own, lest they come into forgetfulness; and he always has the book before [his] eyes: so that, when the opportune time shall have come, there be no need of anyone suggesting [reminding him] — just as, in Isaiah also, he says that he has written [it] on [his] hands [6]. Therefore no one is to despair in afflictions. For the devil tempts us — like the friends of Job — saying that God has forgotten us, and does not consider our [affairs]. Whence they say: How long wilt thou forget [us] unto the end? To whom God answers that he has a memorial book of everlasting remembrance, which no forgetfulness shall ever blot out.

MENANDER, among the ancient comic poets of Greece a most celebrated poet (some of whose plays — especially the Andria and the Perinthia — Terence confesses he made Latin) [7], wrote, as Athenaeus in the Deipnosophists is witness, forty-nine comedies [8]: out of one of which Paul the Apostle (as Jerome, writing to Magnus the Orator, attests) — when, in the former epistle which he wrote to the Corinthians, he dissuaded them from the conversations of seducers — took an iambic senarius [verse] of this kind: [9]

He flourished in the 115th Olympiad — in the first year of which he publicly exhibited his first play, surnamed Orge [Anger] — and died in the first year of the 122nd Olympiad.

THE INSCRIPTION OF THE GREAT HARLOT (concerning which John in the Apocalypse says: [10] I SAW a woman sitting upon a beast, and upon her forehead a name written, BABYLON, THE GREAT MOTHER OF THE FORNICATIONS AND ABOMINATIONS OF THE EARTH) signifies ancient Rome [11] — [showing] that, while she still served the uncleannesses and abominations of idols, she most impudently and without any blush perpetrated execrable crimes; and, among other [things], that she cruelly shed also the blood of the martyrs, who were rebuking her, that she might more freely enjoy the fornications of her gods.

Thus Arethas, bishop of Caesarea, in the commentaries on the Apocalypse. For the same cause Papias, [Jerome], Oecumenius, and Bede think that Peter, at the end of [his] former epistle, called Rome by the name of Babylon [12], when he said: The church which is gathered in Babylon saluteth you.

THE BOOK OF DEATH is the most certain and immovable knowledge of God, recognizing them, and holding [them] reckoned in [his] count, whom the divine justice — by a hidden but nevertheless most just judgment — from eternity and unto eternity reprobated, and condemned to eternal punishment not without preceding demerit [13]; in which volume indeed are written all the evil and reprobate, whom God foreknew [would] die outside charity and grace, without penance — which book, however, although the divine

[→ although the divine] scriptures have not expressed [it] in bare and open words, and some schools of the theologians do not receive [it]; yet from many places they have latently indicated its necessity. For since the sacred letters everywhere teach that there is with God — to whose eyes all things are naked and open — a book of life, that is, a clear and infallible knowledge and record of predestination and of the predestined; [1] it is necessary also — since the knowledge of opposites is one and the same — that there be in God, from whom nothing can be hidden, a clear knowledge and certain record of reprobation and of all the reprobate; and this is called the Book of Death, in which are described, one by one, the names, and the evil merits, and the sins of all the reprobate, whom God — [they] having so deserved — has consigned to perpetual damnation. Concerning whom Augustine, in the 28th chapter of the Soliloquies, thus addresses God: THE DEATH of sinners is most evil — of those, I say, whom, before thou madest heaven and earth, according to the deep abyss of thy hidden judgments (ever just), thou didst foreknow unto eternal death: whose numbering of names and of depraved merits is with thee — [thou] who hast numbered the number of the sand of the sea, and hast measured the depth of the abyss. JOHN also, in his Revelation, attests that the names of the reprobate are numbered in the divine foreknowledge, when, speaking of the impious, he said: [2] AND there were slain in the earthquake names of men, seven thousand. Whence also St. Jerome, in the commentaries on Isaiah, explaining that [text], [3] THE HEAVENS SHALL BE FOLDED UP LIKE A BOOK, said that the heavens, on the day of judgment, are to be folded up like a book, so that the sins of the wicked be no longer written in them. And just as our Saviour — saying, [4] REJOICE, BECAUSE YOUR NAMES ARE WRITTEN IN THE HEAVENS — wished to signify those whose names are written in the book of life: so Jeremiah wished to signify those who are written in the book of death by those whom he asserted to be written in the earth, when he said: [5] O LORD, all they that depart from thee shall be written in the earth. But whether some can be deleted from this book of death, that they may be saved, and again rewritten, that they may be damned [6]: there is no slight difficulty among the Theologians, especially the scholastics — which is easily resolved if, just as we said elsewhere [that] in the book of life some are written within, some without: so now also we say that the book of death is written within and without [7]; and that some are written in it within and without [8], but some only externally. Those are written within and without whom God, according to [his] eternal and firm wisdom, foreknew either [as] about to persevere in evil unto the end, or at least [as] about to depart from this life in [their] iniquities; whom, according to the foreknowledge of everlasting damnation, and according to the purpose of perpetual misery, he irrevocably rejected from eternity, and proscribed with an indelible proscription — as Cain, Judas, Esau, Pharaoh, Antiochus, and other reprobates; who indeed can by no means be deleted from the inner writing of this book. For although sometimes they are deleted, or seem to be deleted, from the external circumscription of the book — while they exercise in some way a certain temporal grace of present righteousness (with Cain, offering sacrifices; with Judas, following Christ in a state of the highest perfection; with Esau and Antiochus, doing penance, and imploring mercy with many tears): yet within they remain indelibly written. But those are written in this book only on the outside [9] whom God foreknew [as] about to remain in [their] crimes for a while and for a time, but afterward to be saved through penance — as Paul, Peter, and Augustine; who, although they were in the book of death, and for a time circumscribed [written on the edge], and externally deleted from the book of life, on account of the lethal and death-bringing crime of infidelity; nevertheless were not written within, in the book of death, eternally and indelibly, and deleted from the inmost pages of the book of life; but were inscribed in the inner part of that same book of life, and numbered among those who — as Augustine says — can by no means perish; to whom all things cooperate unto good [10], even [their] very sins: [11] who, when they fall, are not dashed to pieces, because God puts under his hand, guarding their bones, that not one of these be crushed. Not that their sins are not sins, and worthy of death and eternal damnation; but that they themselves, after [their] fall, recognizing the gravity of the crime and the weakness of their own strength, rose again more easily, repented more sharply, walked more cautiously, and — with more ardent zeal and stronger effort — strove, as it were, violently to seize the kingdom of God. The Jews make mention of this Book of Death [12], of which we have now spoken, in the second order of the Talmudic volumes, tractate eight: [13] where they fable that God, in each year, in the first ten days of the September moon [Tishri], writes the good in the book of life, but the evil in the book of death.

THE ASCENSION OF MOSES, in Greek ἀνάβασις τοῦ Μωσέως, is a book; concerning which it is said that Jude the Apostle, in his Catholic epistle, took the testimony [14] of the Archangel Michael contending with Satan concerning the body of Moses. Origen [15] recalls this writing in the 3rd book of the Periarchon, chapter 2, in these words: FIRST indeed, in Genesis, the serpent is described to have seduced Eve: concerning whom, in the Ascension of Moses (which little book the Apostle Jude mentions in his epistle), Michael the Archangel, disputing with the devil concerning the body of Moses, says to the devil that the instigated serpent was the cause of the transgression of Adam and Eve. Thus he. Now this book is inscribed, as I judge, the ASCENSION of Moses, [16] because it contains the ascent of Moses from the plains of Moab up to Mount Nebo, on the top of Phasga [Pisgah], over against Jericho; likewise the conversations of Moses — now on the very point of dying — held with God, and his sepulchre dug out in a hidden place by the hands of the Angels; also the dispute of Michael and the devil, concerning which Oecumenius [17], in the commentaries on the epistle of Jude, thus writes: IT IS SAID that Michael the Archangel furnished [his] ministry in burying Moses. This the devil did not endure, but brought an accusation on account of the slaying of the Egyptian, as if Moses were his [own]; and therefore he did not permit that [Moses] should obtain honorable burial. But when Michael, in this controversy, had occasion to assail the devil with a curse on account of his impudence, he did not do this, but only brought this against him: [18] THE LORD REBUKE THEE, O DEVIL. Thus far the words of Oecumenius. Jerome [19], in the commentaries on the epistle to Titus, being in doubt about the book whence the Apostle received this, says: FROM WHAT scriptures Jude took this testimony, is not easily evident. But nevertheless it must be known that we find something like these [things] in the prophet Zechariah. For he himself says: [20]

NATHAN the Prophet, inspired by the Holy Spirit of God, was of the tribe and stock of Tock, sprung from the city of Gabath of Galilee. [3] This [Nathan], as Epiphanius in the Lives of the Prophets hands down, the day before David sinned with Bathsheba, wife of Uriah [4], foreknew that crime, and straightway set out on a journey toward Jerusalem, [intending] to draw the king away from that foulness: but when on the way he had come upon a man lately deprived of life, and could not endure to leave the unburied corpse to be torn by beasts, he buried it, the earth being dug out [5]; in which pious office, when the now-darkening day had overtaken him, that same night David fulfilled the ardor of the lust he had conceived. But the Prophet, the matter being known, grieving and sorrowing, returned whence he had come. But when David killed Uriah, Bathsheba's husband, by evil guile [6], [Nathan] again, by God's command, hastened to Jerusalem; and there, an elegant apologue [parable] being composed — concerning the rich man seizing the ewe-lamb of [his] poor neighbor [7] — led the king to the recognition of the guilt committed, gravely rebuked [him], and converted [him] to penance [8]. And not long after, having returned into his own country, he lived there a long time; and there at last, worn out by long old age, he died, having left to posterity two volumes of history [9]; in the former of which he had written the deeds of David, king of Jerusalem, and in the latter the acts of Solomon, king of Jerusalem. The first book of Paralipomenon, in the last chapter, and the second [book] of Paralipomenon, chapter nine, make mention of these volumes. [10]

NEHEMIAH HACHALIAH, נחמיה חכליה, or Nehemiah, son of Hachaliah, a Jew by race [11], cupbearer of Artaxerxes, king of the Persians and Medes — besides that book which is reckoned among the divine writings under the title of SECOND ESDRAS, wrote one book of commentaries and descriptions: in which he most diligently comprehended all those [things] which befell the Jews returning from the Chaldaic captivity; but especially the finding of the sacred fire, which the priests, when the holy city was destroyed, had buried in a very deep well [12]; and the furnishing of the Library built by him, and the most abundant supply of all books — both sacred and profane — gathered together in it. The second book of Maccabees, chapter 2, makes mention of these commentaries. [13]

NICODEMUS the Pharisee, and a master in Israel, who came by night to hear Christ [14], is said to have written a gospel Of the passion and resurrection of the Lord; [15] which is reproved by the holy Church. Its beginning is, ANNAS AND CAIAPHAS.

THE NICOLAITANS, followers of Nicolas of Antioch, an Apostolic deacon — whose most wicked deeds John in the Apocalypse detests [16] — wrote certain books of pernicious superstition under the name IALDABAOTH, fashioning in them infinite and barbarous nomenclatures of the princes and powers dwelling in each heaven. Epiphanius, in the first book of the Panarion, heresy 25, and Gelasius, distinction 15, number the writings of this Nicolas among the condemned scriptures. [17]

THE NAME OF GOD, inscribed on the foreheads of the saints, is mentioned by John in the Apocalypse in these words: [18] HE WHO shall have overcome, I will write upon him the name of my God, and the name of the city of my God, the new Jerusalem, and my new name. And again, in another place: [19] AND I saw, and behold a lamb stood on Mount Sion, and with him the number of a hundred forty-four thousand, having his name, and the name of his father, written on their foreheads. And again, in the same volume: [20] THE THRONE of God and of the Lamb shall be in it: and his servants shall serve him; and they shall see his face, and his name [shall be] on their foreheads. The Name of God, inscribed on the foreheads of the elect, according to the exposition of Arethas of Caesarea, is twofold [21]: one, which is impressed on the hearts of the saints in the present life, signifying the knowledge and imitation of those [things] which are signified by the name of God — that is, the knowledge of the divine goodness and justice, and also the meditation of those [things] which God has prepared, in the heavenly Jerusalem, for those who love him. Those, therefore, who in this world retain, with indelible memory, the immortal goods of God and of the heavenly Jerusalem, bear the name of God and of Jerusalem engraved on heart and mind, and possess the pledge of future glory. The other name is that which is also called new, superadded to the foreheads of the saints in the other life — that is, the reward of the divine vision, and the light of the divine splendor, diffused from the blessed and glorious essence of the three Persons into the souls, and from the souls into the bodies of the saints, bringing with it incorruptible felicity, overflowing with an abundance of all delights. Those, therefore, bear the name of the Lamb, and the name of his Father, described on [their] foreheads, who are sealed with the blessed light of the divine countenance itself in the heavenly fatherland.

THE NAME, and the Number of the name, of the beast: concerning this John [says] in the Apocalypse, chapter thirteen [so printed: "capite tertio" = ch. 3; the passage is Rev 13:16–17], [22] AND HE MAKETH, he says, that no one may be able to buy or sell, unless he have the character [mark], or the name of the beast, or the number

[→ the number] of his name. Here is wisdom: he who has understanding, let him compute the number of the beast. For it is the number of a man; and his number is six hundred sixty-six. The character [mark] of the beast, the Name of the beast, and the Number of his name, are one and the same. [1] And whosoever communicates in the works of the beast — that is, of the devil, or of Antichrist — bears impressed in himself the character, mark, name, and number of his name. But that thou mayest know what the Number of the name of the beast (which denotes Antichrist in this place) signifies, it must be observed that the Greeks make their number out of the letters of the alphabet — whence any Greek word consists of as many numbers as letters. The numbers of a Greek word being known, therefore, the letters also, out of which the word itself is composed, are easily known. Since, therefore, the Number of the name of Antichrist is 666, the letters comprising this number will contain in themselves the number of Antichrist. But what these letters are, and what names result from them, cannot be held for certain. [2] Yet the ancient authors, for the sake of exercise, gathered various names out of these; which to write down here will not be unseasonable.

The NAME of Antichrist, according to Irenaeus and Hippolytus [3], is TEITAN (ΤΕΙΤΑΝ), that is, Giant: [4] whose letters render this number — Τ 300, Ε 5, Ι 10, Τ 300, Α 1, Ν 50; and the sum will be 666.

According to Tyconius [5], the Name of Antichrist is ΛΑΜΠΕΤΙΣ [LAMPETIS], that is, Illustrious [Shining]. And the numeral letters which make up the name are these: Λ 30, Α 1, Μ 40, Π 80, Ε 5, Τ 300, Ι 10, Σ 200; sum 666.

According to Arethas [6], his Name is ΛΑΤΕΙΝΟΣ [LATEINOS], that is, Latin: whose letters have these numbers — Λ 30, Α 1, Τ 300, Ε 5, Ι 10, Ν 50, Ο 70, Σ 200; sum 666.

According to the opinion of Primasius [7], the Name of the same Antichrist is ΑΝΤΕΜΟΣ [ANTEMOS]. And the elements of the numbers [are] these: Α 1, Ν 50, Τ 300, Ε 5, Μ 40, Ο 70, Σ 200; sum 666.

O.

OCTAVIUS AUGUSTUS — from whom, as Luke the Evangelist hands down in chapter 2, an edict went out that the whole world should be enrolled [8] — composed many little works of various kinds [9]: among which are: the Replies to Brutus, concerning Cato; Exhortations to philosophy; Of his own life, or Of the deeds done by him in war up to the Cantabrian [campaign], thirteen books; Of an heroic poem, whose subject and title is SICILY; Of Epigrams, extemporaneous, one book; a TRAGEDY, whose title is AJAX — which, when he had begun [it] with great impetus, he afterward, the style not succeeding, abolished; and to friends asking what Ajax was doing, he answered that his Ajax had fallen upon the sponge [had been sponged out]. He also left a volume of familiar letters. But also of the books which pertained to the Roman religion he was so diligent an investigator and preserver, that of the prophetic books of the Greek and Latin kind — which were commonly circulated under no, or scarcely fit, authors — he burned more than two thousand, gathered from every side [10]; only the books of the Sibyls being reserved from the fire, and out of these too a selection being made: and those which seemed spurious being burned, he laid up the remaining ones in two gilded cases under the base of the Palatine Apollo. Thus Suetonius, in [the life of] Augustus.

There is also celebrated, among Christian authors, an Inscription and title engraved by the same Augustus on the Capitoline altar [11]; which he himself, first of all, erected to our Saviour Christ — although not knowing him. Of which thing Nicephorus makes mention, in the first book of the Ecclesiastical History, chapter seventeen, in these words: CAESAR AUGUSTUS — illustrious for very many affairs gloriously and happily done, and himself first proclaimed Monarch — [when] now of more advanced age, came to the oracle of Pythian Apollo; and, a sacrifice greatest of all (which is called a Hecatomb) having been offered to the demon, he inquired who was to administer the Roman empire after him. But when no answer was returned, he added a second sacrifice also, and asked again, why the oracle — accustomed to use many words — had now at last fallen silent. Then it, a little delay being interposed, answered in this manner:

> Παῖς Ἑβραῖος κέλεταί με, θεὸς μακάρεσσιν ἀνάσσων,
>
> τὸν δὲ δόμον προλιπεῖν, καὶ αὖθις Ἄϊδος ἱκέσθαι·
>
> λοιπὸν ἄπιθι σιγῶν ἐκ βωμῶν ἡμετέρων.
>
> A Hebrew boy — God himself, governing the gods —
>
> bids me yield [my] seat, and return, sorrowful, beneath Orcus.
> Depart, therefore, henceforth silent from our altars.

Such an answer having been received, Caesar returned to Rome, and there in the Capitol built a great altar with a Latin inscription of this kind: THE ALTAR OF THE FIRSTBORN OF GOD. Suidas relates this same [thing], under [the entry] Augustus.

THE BOOK OF OG, king of Bashan — of which Moses makes mention in the books of Numbers, chapter 11, and Deuteronomy, chapter 3 [12] — is numbered by Gelasius, distinction 15, among the condemned scriptures.

ONIAS [so; the Spartan king was Areus, Onias being the Jewish high priest — the roles are here conflated], king of the Lacedaemonians, wrote two letters concerning friendship and alliance to be entered into with the Jews [13]: one to Jonathan, high priest of the Jews (a copy of which is extant in the first [book] of Maccabees, chapter 11); the other to Simon, high priest of the Jews, which is had in 1 Maccabees 14.

THE CHOROGRAPHY OF PALESTINE, or the Description of the Holy Land on this side of the Jordan — of which the history of Joshua, chapter eighteen, makes mention — twenty-one Jewish men wrote [14]; whom Joshua, in the fourteenth year after the entry of the sons of Israel into the land of promise, sent (three out of each of the seven tribes which had remained without possession) to traverse and describe all the regions of the Canaanites which are on this side of the Jordan, from Mount Lebanon even to the borders of Egypt, which had not yet been divided. (For up to that time only five tribes had received their possessions — namely, the tribe of Reuben, the tribe of Gad, and the half-tri-

[→ the half-]tribe of Manasseh beyond the Jordan; but Judah and Ephraim, and the half-tribe of Manasseh, on this side of the Jordan). Those twenty-one men, therefore — since they were surveyors of the fields and most skilled estimators of lands — described the whole province, with its cities, towns, mountains, valleys, and the other level places, in a Geographic volume large enough; which, according to the number of the seven tribes, they divided into seven tables [maps], or portions — unequal indeed in size, but equal in the total of fruits and produce and in estimation of value. Whence also the tribe of Benjamin, which obtained the narrowest region of all [1], had [it] nevertheless — in beauty, and in fertility of soil, and in the nobility of [its] cities — superior, [and] equal to the rest, as Josephus is witness. The estimators of the land, therefore, returning after the seventh month, brought the book of the description to Joshua: who, having diligently inspected it, distributed that whole province among those seven tribes by lot, in the two thousand eight hundred thirty-fourth year from the founding of the world.

THE TESTAMENT OF THE TWELVE PATRIARCHS, sons of Jacob, is a very ancient book [2]; which — translated from Hebrew into Greek — Robert, bishop of Lincoln [Grosseteste], rendered into Latin. In it are narrated very many things — both prophetic oracles, and exhortations to virtue and the worship of God, which each of the Patriarchs, on the last day of [his] life, having called to himself his sons and grandsons, uttered. Many prophecies also are inserted in it out of the book of Enoch, concerning those [things] which were to befall the sons and grandsons of the twelve patriarchs; Of the future crimes and punishments of the Hebrews; Of the Saviour of the world to be slain by the Hebrews; Of the overthrow, captivity, and perpetual dispersion of the Hebrews among the nations. Origen makes mention of this work in the fifteenth homily on Joshua, and Procopius of Gaza in the commentaries on the thirty-eighth chapter of Genesis.

PAUL THE APOSTLE, besides the fourteen epistles received in the sacred canon, and enumerated by us in the volume above, is said also to have left the writings noted below [3], namely:

- A GOSPEL.
- To the Laodiceans, one epistle.
- To the Corinthians, a third epistle.
- To the Thessalonians, a third epistle.
- To Lucius Annaeus Seneca, six epistles.
- Of an Apocalypse, that is, of a Revelation, or Anabaseos, that is, of an Ascension, or Of his own rapture, one book.
- Of his own acts, one book.
- The Acts of Paul and Thecla, one book.

Concerning which writings, those [things] which I have found among the ancient authors are these.

THE GOSPEL OF PAUL. Concerning this, Paul himself writes in the latter epistle to Timothy: [4] BE MINDFUL that the Lord Jesus rose from the dead, of the seed of David, according to my Gospel, in which I labor. Which words very many of the ancients so expound as to think that Paul, as often as in his epistles he said, According to my gospel, signifies the Gospel of Luke [5] — because Luke learned it, Paul teaching. Others think that Paul called the Gospel his own, in order to distinguish it from the many false gospels of the pseudo-apostles, which were carried about without any certain authority: from which he not undeservedly distinguishes his own — true, undoubted, and approved by the Apostles in the Council of Jerusalem. Nor are there lacking those who say that the Apostle, by his Gospel, understood nothing else than the Evangelical doctrine preached by him with the oracle of the living voice. [6]

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL TO THE LAODICEANS. This the Apostle commends to the Colossians, writing thus at the end of the epistle which he gave to them: [7] SALUTE the brethren who are at Laodicea: and when this epistle shall have been read among you, cause that it be read also in the church of the

Laodiceans; and that [the one] which is of the Laodiceans be read to you. [8] St. Thomas affirms that the author of this epistle was Paul [9], who sent it to the Laodiceans; and that it was not received by the Church into the canon of the divine scriptures — whether because its authority was not plainly established, or because it was corrupted by the heretics, or because it had perished by the injury of time, or because it contained the very same [things] which are had in the other epistles of Paul. Chrysostom [10] reckons that this is not an epistle which Paul sent to the Laodiceans, but [one] which the Laodiceans sent to Paul; because the Apostle did not say, That [epistle] which [is] to the Laodiceans, let it be read to you, but καὶ τὴν ἐκ Λαοδικείας — that is, And let that which was written from Laodicea be read. Theophylact [11] thinks that this is the former epistle of Paul to Timothy — which, as the Greek copies attest, was sent by Tychicus the Deacon, from Laodicea, the metropolis of Phrygia Pacatiana. Epiphanius, bishop of Salamis [12], in the first book against the heresies, asserts that this epistle is not Paul's, and produces a testimony cited by the heretic Marcion out of the epistle to the Laodiceans, in these words: [13] ONE God, one faith, one baptism: one God and Father of all; who is above all, and through all, and in all — which testimony indeed is had among us, in the same and just so many words, in the Epistle to the Ephesians, chapter four. Tertullian [14], in the fifth book against Marcion, indicates that Marcion himself was of this opinion — that he believed the epistle which among us is inscribed TO THE EPHESIANS to have been written and inscribed by Paul not to the Ephesians, but to the Laodiceans. Philastrius [15], in the catalog of heresies, chapter eighty-nine, hands down that the epistle was received by some as Paul's, but that there was not the custom in the churches that it should be read publicly before the people, on account of certain ambiguous sentences rashly inserted by some. Jerome [16], in the catalog of ecclesiastical writers, says: SOME read also an epistle to the Laodiceans, but it is hissed off by all. This epistle is extant, as we have heard, at Paris, in a very ancient codex of the Sorbonne Library. [17] I myself also saw it at Padua, in the Library of St. John of Verdara [Viridarium]; from which also I have copied the appended copy:

> PAUL, an Apostle not from men, neither through man, but through Jesus Christ, to the brethren who are at Laodicea: grace to you, and peace, from God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ. I GIVE thanks to Christ through all my prayer, that you are abiding and persevering in good works, awaiting the promise in the day of judgment. Nor let the empty talk of certain [persons] disturb you, who insinuate [falsehood against] the truth, to turn you away from the truth of the Gospel which is preached by me. And now God will make beware of all filthiness in all gain [lucre]. Let all your petitions be openly before God. Be firm in the mind of Christ; and whatsoever things are sound [integra], and true, and modest, and chaste, and just, and lovely, do; and what things you have heard and received, retain in [your] heart: and peace shall be to you. All the saints salute you. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit. Amen. Cause this to be read to the Colossians, and that which is of the Colossians, [to be read] to you.

This, therefore, is the copy of the epistle to the Laodiceans: whether it be Paul's own makes me doubt [1] — both [on account of] the aforesaid testimony, cited by Epiphanius out of the book of Marcion, which is not had in this epistle; and also because whatever is in this Laodicean epistle, the same is had in the epistle to the Colossians, and more copiously: wherefore it was not fitting for Paul to enjoin the Colossians that this too should be read among them. I suspect this copy to be that same one [2] concerning which Theodoret, in the commentaries on the epistle to the Colossians, thus wrote: SOME think that Paul also wrote an epistle to the Laodiceans; and so they even produce a forged epistle. But the divine Apostle did not say, "That [epistle] which is TO the Laodiceans," but "That [epistle] which is FROM Laodicea." For they had written to him concerning certain matters. Now it is likely that they [the Laodiceans] either had made accusation of those [things] which were being done at Colossae, or had themselves also labored with the same disease: and therefore he said that this epistle too was to be read by them [the Colossians].

THE THIRD EPISTLE OF PAUL TO THE CORINTHIANS. [3] There are those who think that Paul, besides the two epistles to the Corinthians which are had in the canon, wrote also another epistle to the same — not enumerated among the canonical [ones] [4] — the argument being taken from this, that Paul in the fifth chapter of the former [epistle] to the Corinthians says: [5] I WROTE to you in an epistle, not to keep company with fornicators. Not indeed with the fornicators of this world, or the covetous, or the rapacious, or those serving idols; otherwise you must have gone out of this world. But now I have written to you not to keep company &c. Chrysostom judges that Paul here named not some other epistle different from this, but this very epistle [6] — wishing by these words to correct what he had a little before written in it, when he had said: [7] IT IS ABSOLUTELY heard [reported] that there is fornication among you, and such fornication as [is] not even among the Gentiles: so that one should have his father's wife. And you are puffed up, and have not rather mourned, that he who has done this deed might be taken away from among you. And then: [8] DO YOU NOT KNOW that a little leaven corrupts the whole lump? Purge out the old leaven, &c.

It was credible, therefore, that the Corinthians suspected that all fornicators were to be shunned [9] — not only those who are defiled with the foulness of bodily lust, but also those who follow spiritual fornication; which happens as often as the soul departs from God through any sin whatsoever, whether it be infidelity, or avarice, or drunkenness. Excluding therefore this vain suspicion of theirs, Paul says: I WROTE to you in an epistle, Not to keep company with fornicators, &c. — as if he should say: Lest you err in this, that I enjoined a little above that you flee the custom of those defiled with infamous lust: I do not mean this, that I demanded you shun all the fornicators of this world, both bodily and spiritual, nor that you keep no dealing at all with anyone fornicating spiritually — that is, with idolatry, or avarice, which is the worship of idols. For, if you strove [after that], all Greece — nay, the whole world — would have to be abandoned by you, since fornicators of this kind occur everywhere; however much I too might wish it, if it were lawful. Now what cannot be done, I do not exact. But this I have now written, and in this epistle write to you: that, if any Christian be openly infected with vices of this kind — which for the most part are far removed from the Christian profession, such as fornication, avarice, the worship of images, evil-speaking, drunkenness, rapacity — you deem the familiarity of such a man so [utterly] to be shunned, that you should not think it worthy even to take food with him, until he come to his senses.

THE THIRD EPISTLE OF PAUL TO THE THESSALONIANS. [10] Origen, in an epistle which (Rufinus being witness) he wrote to his friends at Alexandria, thus speaks: NOTHING seems wonderful to me, if my doctrine is adulterated by my enemies, and corrupted with such adultery as that with which the epistle of Paul the Apostle was corrupted. For certain [persons] wrote a false epistle under the name of Paul the Apostle, to trouble the Thessalonians, as though the day of the Lord were at hand, and to seduce them. On account of this epistle, in the second epistle which he wrote to the Thessalonians, he said this: [11] NOW WE BESEECH you, brethren, by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and by our gathering together unto him, that you be not quickly moved from your mind, nor be terrified, neither by spirit, nor by word, nor by epistle as sent by us, as if the day of the Lord were at hand. Let no man seduce you by any means. Thus far Origen.

THE EPISTLES OF PAUL TO SENECA, AND OF SENECA TO PAUL. [12] Concerning these I have found it written, among various authors of approved faith, that Lucius Annaeus Seneca of Cordova — a philosopher of the Stoic sect, a disciple of Photinus the Stoic, paternal uncle of Lucan the poet, a man of most continent life, whom Jerome numbers in the catalog of the saints [13] — wrote eight epistles to Paul the Apostle [14], most friendly to him; before whose martyrdom, by nearly two years, he himself also was slain by Nero, his most cruel disciple. To him Paul wrote back — in the Latin tongue, as is believed [15] — six small and familiar epistles, writing to him not as to one regenerated and plainly faithful, but as to a friend, and one who pursued the Christians not with hatred but with benevolence, and who approved their discipline. Now Seneca seems to have somewhat obscured his own style in these epistles on purpose [16], and to have dissembled [it], so that, if perchance the epistles came into other hands, although they were inscribed with the name of Sene-

[→ …although inscribed with the name of Sene-]ca, they could nevertheless not, [amid such] danger, appear to be Seneca's. For there was danger — and [it was] against the Emperor's edict then [in force] — for a Christian or a Jew to enjoy [such] familiarity. Some of the most ancient fathers bear witness to these epistles; but first of all Linus, the second Pontiff after Peter [1], who at the beginning of the book On the Passion of Paul, speaking of the friendship of Paul and Seneca, thus says: CONCOURSES [of people] from the house of Caesar were made unto him [Paul]. But the emperor's tutor also was so knit to him in friendship — seeing in him divine knowledge — that he could scarcely restrain himself from converse with him; so that, when he could not address him mouth to mouth, by frequent letters given and received he enjoyed his sweetness, and friendly converse, and counsel. And St. Jerome, in the book On Illustrious Men, numbering Seneca among the ecclesiastical writers [2], says: I WOULD NOT put Seneca in the catalog of saints, did not those epistles invite me — which are read by very many — of Paul to Seneca, and of Seneca to Paul; in which, though he was Nero's master and the most powerful [man] of that age, he says that he desires to be of that rank among his own people which Paul is among the Christians. And Augustine, in the fifty-third epistle to Macedonius, making mention of these epistles, says: DESERVEDLY does Seneca say (he who was in the times of the Apostles, some of whose epistles to Paul the Apostle are also read): HE HATES ALL, WHO HATES THE WICKED. These [things] they [say] concerning Seneca and Paul's epistles; which, since they are exceedingly brief and known to few, I judge it will not be amiss if I set them down here in this place.

Annaeus Seneca, to Paul, greeting.

I BELIEVE it has been reported to you, Paul, [the discourse] which yesterday we held with our Lucilius concerning the apocrisis [so printed; the common text reads apocryphis, "apocrypha"] and other matters. For there were with me certain companions of your teachings; for I had withdrawn into the gardens of Sallust, in which place these [companions] of whom I have spoken, bending their course elsewhere as we chanced [to be there], joined themselves to us. Assuredly we longed for your presence. And this I wish you to know: that, your little book being read — that is, [some] out of the many letters, certain epistles which you directed to some city or capital of a province, containing with wonderful exhortation the moral life — we were thoroughly refreshed. Which thoughts I judge to have been uttered not [merely] by you, but through you; certainly at times [both] by you and through you. For so great is the majesty of those matters, and they shine with such nobility [3], that I scarcely think the ages of men would suffice by which [men] might be instructed and perfected. I wish you well, brother. Farewell.

Paul, to Seneca, greeting.

YOUR letter I received yesterday with gladness; to which I could straightway have written back, had I had at hand the presence of the young man whom I was about to send to you. For you know when, and by whom, and at what time, and to whom, anything ought to be given and entrusted. I ask, therefore, that you not think yourself neglected, while I have regard to the quality of the person. But whereas you write that you are refreshed by my letters, I count myself happy in the judgment of so great a man. [4] For you would not be called Censor, Sophist, and master of so great a prince — nay, of all — were it not that you speak the truth. May you long fare well.

Annaeus Seneca, to Paul, greeting.

CERTAIN volumes I have set in order, and given them their finished form by their own divisions. These, too, I am resolved to read to Caesar. And if only chance shall favorably assent, perhaps you also will be present; but if otherwise, I will appoint you a day, that we may examine this work together. I had resolved not to publish this writing to him before I had first conferred with you — if only this could be done with impunity — that you might know that you also are not passed over. Farewell, dearest Paul.

Paul, to Seneca, greeting.

AS OFTEN as I hear your letters, I think upon your presence; nor do I reckon otherwise than that at all times you are with us. As soon, therefore, as you begin to come, we shall see one another, and that at close hand. I wish you well.

Annaeus Seneca, to Paul, greeting.

WE ARE distressed by your too-long withdrawal. What is it, or what matters, that make you tarry? If [it be] the master's [Nero's] indignation — because you have departed from the ancient rite and sect, and are again converting others — there will be place for pleading, that he may esteem this [as done] by reason, not by levity. Farewell.

Paul, to Seneca and Lucilius, greeting.

CONCERNING those [matters], or those [things], which you have written to me, it is not permitted to speak out with reed [pen] and ink: whereof the one marks and designates something, the other plainly shows [it] — especially since I know that there are among you, as among us, and in our [company], those who understand me. Honor is to be rendered to all, and so much the more to these who catch at occasion for taking offense; to whom, if we show patience, we shall in every way overcome them on whatsoever side — provided only they be such as bear repentance for themselves. Fare you well.

Annaeus Seneca, to Paul, greeting.

I DECLARE myself well pleased in the reading of your letters, which you sent to the Galatians, the Corinthians, and the Achaeans. For the Holy Spirit, [being] in you and above you, expresses exalted, more sublime, and exceedingly venerable meanings. I could wish, therefore — since you bring forth surpassing matters — that a cultivation of speech [elegance of style] be not wanting to their majesty. And, that I may not filch anything from you, brother, or owe [it] to my own conscience, I confess that Augustus [the Emperor] was moved by your sentiments [5]: to whom, when the exordium of your letters had been read, this utterance was [made] — that he could marvel that one not lawfully imbued [instructed] should think in such wise. To whom I answered, that the gods are wont to speak by the mouth of the guileless — after the example of the rustic little man of Vaticanum, to whom, when two men had appeared in the Reatine field (who are named Castor and Pollux), he was divinely instructed. Farewell.

Paul, to Seneca, greeting.

THOUGH I am not ignorant that Caesar is an admirer and lover of our affairs, you will nevertheless permit that you be not harmed, but admonished. For I think you have acted gravely, in that you wished to bring to [his] notice what is contrary to his rite and discipline; since he indeed worships the gods of the nations. What has seemed [good] to you, that you would have him know this, I do not see: but I judge you do this out of your excessive love for me. I ask you, for the future, that you do it not. For heed must be taken, lest — while you love me — you cause offense to the master [lord]: whose offense indeed will neither hurt, if he persevere [in it], nor, if it be not [taken], profit. If she be a queen, she will not be indignant; if she be [merely] a woman, she will be offended. [the closing sentence is corrupt in the printed copy] Farewell.

Annaeus Seneca, to Paul, greeting.

Indeed, [I am moved] as one who by many proofs hold this now for a most certain thing. Therefore let us act anew: you, if anything in [regard to] the past has been lightly done, will grant [me] pardon. I have sent you a book On the Abundance of Words. Farewell, dearest Paul.

Paul, to Seneca, greeting.

AS OFTEN as I write to you, and set my own name before yours, I do a grave thing, and one incongruous with my sect [profession]. For I ought, as I have often professed, to be all things to all men; and to observe toward your person the same [rule] which the Roman law has granted to the honor of the senate — namely, in a letter to choose the last place [for myself]; lest, with perplexity, I should out of [regard for] decorum wish to effect what would be [a matter] of my own choosing. Farewell, most devoted Master. Given on the fifth [day] before the Kalends of July, Nero for the fourth [time] and Messala being Consuls.

Annaeus Seneca, to Paul, greeting.

HAIL, my dearest Paul. If to me and to my name a man so great and beloved in every way — I say not, be joined, but of necessity be mingled [united] — it will fitly have been done concerning your Seneca. Since, then, you are the summit and the peak of all the loftiest mountains, deem not yourself unworthy to be named at the head of the letters, lest you seem not so much to try me as to make sport [of me]; for you know that you are a Roman citizen. For what place is mine with you, [let it be] yours; what is yours, I would have [to be] mine. Farewell, dearest Paul. Given on the tenth [day] before the Kalends of April, Aprianus and Capito being Consuls.

Annaeus Seneca, to Paul, greeting.

HAIL, my dearest Paul. Do you think that I am not saddened, and not full of grief, that again and again punishment is exacted upon your innocence [upon you, [though] innocent]? And, further, that all the people judge you so liable to guilt, thinking that whatever contrary thing happens in the city is wrought by you? But let us bear it with equanimity, and make use of the [public] tribunal which chance has granted, until unconquered good fortune set an end to [these] evils. The age of the ancients bore also Philip's son the Macedonian [Alexander], and Dionysius; our own [age bore] also Caius Caesar [Caligula]: to whom whatever pleased was lawful. Whence the city of Rome so often suffers conflagration is manifestly clear. But if human lowliness could speak out, and it were permitted to speak with impunity in this darkness, all [men] — Christians — would now see all things. And the Jews are wont to be visited with punishment as [though they were] contrivers of the fire. That cutthroat, whoever he be — whose delight is the butchery, and whose covering [cloak] is falsehood — is destined to his own time; and just as the head [life] of each best man is given [in ransom] for one head, so one head shall be given for many, and this [man], devoted [as a victim], shall be burned with fire for all. A hundred thirty-two houses [and] four blocks [insulae] burned in six days: the seventh gave a pause [respite]. I wish you well. Given on the fifth [day] before the Kalends of April, Frigius and Bassus being Consuls.

Annaeus Seneca, to Paul, greeting.

HAIL, my dearest Paul. Allegorically and enigmatically are many works everywhere composed by you; and therefore so great a force of matters and of [your] office, bestowed upon you, is to be adorned not with ornament of words, but with a certain [inner] cultivation. I very often retain [in memory] that you have said [that] many who affect such things [only] corrupt the meanings, and shun the [true] virtues of things. But this I would have you grant me: comply with [good] Latinity, put a fair appearance [upon it] with honorable words, that the bestowal of [your] noble gift may worthily be set forth by you. Farewell. Given on the fifth [day before] the Nones of July, Leo and Savinus being Consuls.

Paul, to Seneca, greeting.

TO YOU, [being] one who weighs [these things], are revealed those [things] which the Divinity has granted to few. I therefore, assured, now sow in a fertile field the strongest seed — not indeed matter, which seems [liable] to corruption, but the stable word of God, the derivative [outflow] of [Him who is] ever growing and abiding unto eternity. Which [word], since your prudence has attained it, must needs be unfailing. Reckon that the observances both of the Gentiles and of the Israelites are to be shunned. Those [truths] which you have nearly attained, you will instill into the temporal king [Nero], and into his household, and into [his] faithful friends. To whom, although your persuasion will be harsh and hard to grasp — since the most of them are by no means bent by your insinuations — yet the word of God instilled into them will bring forth in them a new man, hastening hence toward God. Farewell, O Seneca, most dear to us. Given on the Kalends of August, Leo and Savinus being Consuls.

James Faber [Lefèvre], bishop of Vienne [so identified by Sixtus], wrote brief little commentaries upon these epistles.

THE RAPTURE OF PAUL, OR APOCALYPSE. [1] Epiphanius, in the first book of the Panarion, refuting the heresy of the Caians [Cainites], says: [2] AGAIN, the Caians forged another little book under the name of Paul, stuffed with nefarious deeds — which those also called Gnostics use — which they call the ASCENSION OF PAUL, the occasion being taken from that which the Apostle says: that he ascended even to the third heaven, and heard secret words which it is not lawful for a man to speak. And these, they say, are [those] secret words. Augustine, in the ninety-eighth tractate on John, confuting the madness of these [men], adds this: CERTAIN of the spiritual [men] attained to those [things] which it is not lawful for a man to speak. On which occasion sundry [persons], with most foolish presumption, forged an Apocalypse of Paul — which the sound Church does not receive — [3] full of I know not what fables, saying this to be that whence he had said he was caught up into the third heaven, and there heard unspeakable words which it is not lawful for a man to utter. However tolerable the audacity of these [men] might be, had he said that he heard [things] WHICH IT IS NOT YET lawful for a man to speak; but since he said [things] WHICH IT IS NOT lawful for a man to speak — who then are these who dare to speak these things impudently and unhappily? Nicephorus, in the twelfth book of the Ecclesiastical History, introduced mention of this Apocalypse in this manner: AGAIN, that [book] which is called the Apocalypse of Paul the Apostle — which none of the men of old ever saw — many monks admire with veneration. A report indeed grew rife, in this very time of the reigning Theodosius, that by divine revelation a book had been found — laid up in the fatherland and paternal house of Paul at Tarsus of Cilicia, in a marble chest, and buried in the earth; which [report] that it was plainly false, a certain very aged presbyter of the church of Tarsus (for his hoary hairs bore witness to that [age]) confessed; for he affirmed that nothing of this kind had happened in his time. And when he asserted this, he wondered whether that report had not been fabricated by heretics — which thing we have said before was done in many other [cases] also.

THE ACTS OF PAUL AND THECLA. [1] Gelasius, distinction 15, reckons the Acts of Paul and Thecla among the reprobate scriptures. I suspect this to be the writing concerning which Jerome, in the catalog of writers, under the title of LUKE, has these [words]: THEREFORE the "periods" [journeyings] of Paul and Thecla, and the whole fable of the baptized lion, we number among the apocryphal scriptures. For what likelihood is it, that Luke, the inseparable companion of the Apostle, among the other affairs of his should have been ignorant of this one alone? But Tertullian too, near to the times of the Apostles, relates that a certain presbyter in Asia — a σπουδαστήν [a zealous devotee] of the Apostle Paul — was convicted before John, because he was the author of the book; and that he confessed he had done this out of love for Paul, and on that account was deposed. The argument [content] of this book was [2] — as is gathered from the third book of Epiphanius Against the Heresies, from the second book of Ambrose On Virgins, and from the eighth book of the Histories of Vincent, bishop of Beauvais — of this kind: While Paul was preaching at Iconium, the virgin Thecla, having heard his sermon on Virginity, suddenly loosed herself from [her intended] nuptials; and left her betrothed — a young man, a leading citizen of the city, renowned for beauty and riches — and, cleaving to Paul, gave herself to him as a companion of [his] pilgrimage: in which, when she was compelled by persecutors to undergo grave perils of death — now plunged in the waters, now cast into the fires, now exposed to wild beasts — at last, freed from all these (Paul protecting her), she came safe to Rome together with him.

THE APOSTLE PETER, besides the two Catholic epistles received into the sacred canon, is said to have written five books of Christian doctrine — [which] Sophronius, as [taken] from Jerome, reports:

- The FIRST is entitled Κήρυγμα, that is, PREACHING.
- The SECOND, Εὐαγγέλιον, GOSPEL.
- The THIRD, Πρᾶξις, that is, ACTS.

- The FOURTH, Ἀποκάλυψις, that is, REVELATION.
- The FIFTH, Κρίσις, that is, JUDGMENT.

Of these, I have found that only the first and the fifth were in authority among the ancients — since the most ancient fathers used their testimonies [3], especially Clement of Alexandria and Origen; of whom the former, in the sixth [book] of the Stromata, cites a fragment, from which you may have some specimen of this book, in these words: PETER, IN THE PREACHING, says: Know that there is one God, who made the beginning of all things, and holds power over [their] end; and who falls not under sight [is invisible]; who sees all things; who, though he cannot be grasped, grasps all things; needing nothing, [while] all things need him, and through whom are all things; who cannot be comprehended, eternal, free from corruption, unmade — who made all things by the word of his power, that is, by [his] Son. Worship this God, not as the Greeks [do] — inasmuch as they too worship the same God whom we [worship] (those of them who are honest men among the Greeks), but not with a perfect and absolute knowledge, as [men] who have not so learned [what was] handed down by the Son; for while they are carried along in ignorance, and know not God as we [do] with perfect knowledge — with the means which he gave them for [their] use — they fashion wood, and stones, and iron, and gold, and silver, and worship gods made out of their own material; and — the [creatures] which he gave them for food, the birds of the air, and the swimming things of the sea, and the serpents of the earth, and wild beasts, with the cattle of the field and the four-footed beasts — they sacrifice [these] to [idols in the form of] men, and, offering dead things to the dead as to gods, are ungrateful toward God. Neither worship [him] as the Jews [do]: for they, thinking that they alone know God, know not that they worship Angels and Archangels, the months and the Moon; and unless the Moon appear, they keep not the sabbath which is called the first, nor the new-moon, nor the unleavened bread, nor the great day. Wherefore do you also — learning the [things] which we hand down to you — keep [them] holily and justly, worshipping God anew through Christ. For we find in the scriptures, as the Lord says: Behold, I make for you a new testament [covenant], not as I made for your fathers on Mount Horeb. For he has given us a new testament: for the [things] of the Jews and of the Greeks are old; but we, who worship him anew in a third kind, are Christians. Thus far the words of Peter: which indeed Origen, in the thirteenth tome on John, resuming [them] in an epilogue, expounds more openly. Yet he says that it must be inquired concerning this book, whether it be true, or supposititious [spurious], or mixed.

THE JUDGMENT OF PETER. But concerning the work whose title is THE JUDGMENT OF PETER, Rufinus, in the explanation of the Creed to Laurentius, thus writes: But in the New Testament, the little book which is called [THE BOOK] OF THE SHEPHERD, or OF HERMAS, and THE JUDGMENT ACCORDING TO PETER — the fathers indeed willed [these] all to be read in the churches, yet not to be brought forward for confirming authority of faith out of them. [4]

THE GOSPEL OF PETER. Concerning the Gospel of Peter, Serapion — who in the two-hundredth year of the Lord was bishop of Antioch — composed a particular book to the brethren of Rhossus in Cilicia, [who] on occasion of this scripture were declining into heresy; in which, reproving certain false [things] contained in it, he thus speaks: FOR WE receive both Peter and the other Apostles as [we receive] Christ; but the false [writings] which under their name have been composed by others, we decline [reject], as [men] aware of their [true] meaning and mind, knowing that such [things] were not handed down to us. For I, when I was among you, supposed that all were of the right faith among you; and, the little book not yet perused which was offered to me — in which a gospel written under the name of Peter was current — I said: If this is the only [thing] which seems to bring in enmity and dissension among you, let the book be read. [5] But now, having learned that these who assert that book ought to be read demanded that this be done with a view to a certain hidden heresy (as has been told me), I will hasten to come to you again. For [I know] of whose heresy these [were]: Marcianus, who also stood contrary to his very self, not understanding what he was saying — which [things] you also will understand — [and I learned it] from those who had learned this same gospel according to his tradition, and became successors of his opinion, whom we call Δοκητάς [Docetae], that is, "Opiners." These words of Serapion [are] gathered out of Eusebius.

THE ACTS OF PETER. [1] Concerning the Acts of Peter, and his other books, Eusebius, in the third [book] of the Ecclesiastical History, chapter three, has thus: But that little book which is called the ACTS OF PETER, and [that] which is named a GOSPEL of his name, and also that which is called his PREACHING, and his APOCALYPSE, are not had among the canonical scriptures; nor indeed is any of the ancients found to use their testimonies. And in the third book, chapter twenty-five: AFTER these, he says, is the scripture which is called the Acts of Paul, and the little book which is called [that] of the Shepherd, and the Apocalypse of Peter: concerning which there is the greatest doubt. Nicephorus likewise, in book 12, relating that the Apocalypse of Peter was accustomed to be read in the churches of Palestine, [says]: That [book] which is called the Apocalypse of Peter — as [being] supposititious and illegitimate, judged [so] by the ancients — we find to have been accustomed to be read for a [certain] time among the Palestinians, in certain churches, once every year on the day of the Parasceve [Good Friday]; [2] on which day the people fast, with great devotion and contrition, for the memory of Christ's saving passion.

Moreover, Origen — by whom a testimony is cited out of the Acts of Peter in the twentieth tome on John — likewise, in the first book of the Periarchon, makes mention of another book, which is inscribed the DOCTRINE OF PETER, [3] in this manner: If anyone should wish to bring forward to us, out of that little book which is called the Doctrine of Peter, [the saying] which the Saviour seems to say to the disciples — A DEMON IS NOT INCORPOREAL: it must be answered him that that book is not had among the ecclesiastical [books]; and it must be shown that that scripture is neither Peter's, nor of any other who was inspired by the Spirit of God.

THE ITINERARY OF PETER, published under the name of Clement, Gelasius, distinction 15, places among the books of suspect faith.

THE MARTYRDOM OF PETER AND PAUL, Pope Linus wrote in two volumes.

THE PHYLACTERIES OF THE ANGELS are numbered among the condemned scriptures by Gelasius, distinction fifteen, in these words: ALL PHYLACTERIES, which are composed not by Angels (as the heretics feign) but rather by a demon, are Apocryphal. Which words indeed can be understood of magical amulets — which, against enchantments, incursions of enemies, falls of thunderbolts, and other perils of this kind, certain superstitious [persons] wear hung about the neck. [4] For that the ancients sometimes called these Phylacteries, Epiphanius is witness, in the first book Against the Heresies. Concerning these there is extant a decree of Pope Gregory in Burchard, bishop of Worms, book ten, chapter 23, in these words: IF ANYONE SHALL HAVE OBSERVED [consulted] SOOTHSAYERS, DIVINERS, OR ENCHANTERS, OR SHALL HAVE USED PHYLACTERIES, LET HIM BE ANATHEMA.

THE PHYLACTERIES OF THE SCRIBES AND PHARISEES — which in the Hebrew Gospel of Matthew [5] are called טוטפות Totaphot, [and which] the Rabbis of the Hebrews call תפילין thephilin [tefillin], the Greeks φυλακτήρια, that is, Preservatories, so called ἀπὸ τοῦ φυλάττω [from phylatt■, "I guard"], because they preserved the memory from oblivion; but Jerome names [them] Pictatiola, that is, little white tablets, fitted for inscribing very brief little sentences. Now these Phylacteries — concerning which Christ censures the hypocrisy of the Pharisees and Scribes [who] enlarge [their] Phylacteries out of ambition — were little papers, or [strips of] parchment, or certain very tiny little scrolls, written with the words of the divine law, which the Pharisees and scribes wore upon the forehead. [6] For since (as Chrysostom says) the Jews easily forgot the commandments of God, God ordered these to be written on tablets and hung upon the forehead and the hands, saying: [7] [8] Bind these for a sign upon your hand; and let them be as frontlets before your eyes. For just as mothers, tying a thread about the finger of forgetful boys, bring them back to remembrance of the [things] which have been enjoined them, [9] so God commanded the Jews — as [if they were] little children — to bind these upon the hands and forehead; wishing in this way to admonish [them] that they should meditate on the law of the Lord day and night, and fulfill his commandments in deed. But the Pharisees, wrongly interpreting this, [10] thought (as they also now think) that it was enough for the assiduous observance of the law if they bound these Thephilin upon head and arms. For thus Rabbi David Kimchi writes, concerning the continual observance of the whole law, on the first Psalm, expounding that sentence — AND IN THE LAW OF THE LORD SHALL HE MEDITATE DAY AND NIGHT — saying: He shall meditate day and night, that is, he shall always be occupied in the study of the law. But if you object: How can it be that a man should be wholly [taken up] day and night in meditating on the law — which, when it is done, leaves no room [time] for when a man may attend to [his] remaining works, which are of domestic care? — the sages of the Hebrews answer in this manner: [11] Whosoever keeps the precept concerning the putting-on of the Thephilin, to him the scripture attributes as much as if he studied day and night. Jerome, in the commentaries on Matthew, writes that this custom of wearing Thephilin flourished even in his own times among the Babylonians, Persians, and Indians. In whose place Chrysostom, in the seventy-third homily on Matthew, relates that many Christian women in his own age were accustomed to carry the Gospel, hanging from the neck, [12] that they might the more easily recall the evangelical precepts to memory. Further, as to what was wont to be written in these phylacteries, the opinion of the Christians and of the Hebrews differs: [13] Jerome, Chrysostom, and Theophylact assert that the Decalogue of the law — that is, the ten precepts of the two tables — was wont to be written in them. Lyra [Nicholas of Lyra], according to the opinion of the Rabbis, testifies that it is by the ordinance of the Jews that in the Thephilin there be inscribed twelve Pasuch — that is, verses or sentences out of the book of Deuteronomy: namely five out of the sixth chapter, and seven out of the eleventh chapter of the same volume — which are these:

These [things] concerning the writing of the Thephilin. But concerning the manner and rite in which these ought to be written, the Rabbis prescribe many things; [7] of which, that nothing be wanting to the curiosity of readers, I will adduce a few — which I once read, in the order [Seder] of the Talmudic volumes, in the tractate ראש השנה Rosh haShanah; from which, if the reader draw nothing else of good, he will at least learn utterly to despise the ridiculous fooleries of the Jews. They are these: The Tutaphoth, or Thephilin — that is, Phylacteries, or Preservatories — are little parchments in which certain Biblical sentences are written; and it is necessary that they be made from a domestic beast, or a clean wild animal, as the scripture says, that the law of the Lord may be in your mouth. One must also write with one's own right hand, even if one can use both hands. But if one can use only the left hand, that will be to him in place of the right. And [for] one who cannot make a straight line without a drawn line, it is permitted that he draw a line over which he may write. Now the little parchment ought to be whole, without a hole, lest the ink flow through it. And if one of the letters be effaced, and an untaught boy who is not stupid can [still] read it, it will be fit; if not, it will be unfit. Nor is it needful that a space be left above, except what suffices for the [upstroke] of the ל lamed; but below, let it be made according to the measure of the length of the ק kof [qof] and the ן nun. Further, they write the writing itself only from that side of the parchment where it touched the flesh. One must also enclose the writings with four lines around the circuit of the leaf; but it is not needful that lines be made between the written lines. And a man ought not to go through a cemetery when he has the Thephilim on his head, nor to approach it within a space of four cubits. In the place where the Thephilin — or also the book of the law — are, it is forbidden therein to give attention to Venus [conjugal intercourse], unless first he has carried them out, or laid them up within some vessel, and again laid up that vessel within another vessel; and when he has thus laid the vessel within a vessel, it will be permitted also to place them under the pillow, between the bed-covering and the bolster. These [things] the Jews, interpreting according to the dead letter, observe the commandment of the Lord with such superstition — whereas the better and truer sense of it is, that they keep the law of God with heart and mind, and fulfill it with hands and in deed. [8] Epiphanius, in the first book of the Panarion, heresy 15, asserts that the Phylacteries of the Pharisees — concerning which Christ speaks in the Gospel — were no kind of scripture, but certain broad marks [bands] of purple, bordering the conspicuous places of [their] cloaks; [9] which the very phrase of the Gospel also indicates, saying: [10] FOR they broaden [their] phylacteries, and magnify the fringes of [their] cloaks — understanding by fringes the edges and margins of the cloaks, but by phylacteries their purple marks, such as are set both on the breast and on the back of the Dalmatics [dalmatic vestments].

PHILIP THE APOSTLE [11] was allotted a Gospel by the Gnostic heretics — forged under his name — concerning which Epiphanius, in the first [book] of the Panarion, has this: NOW the Gnostics bring forth, in the name of Philip the holy Apostle, a forged Gospel, in which it is written: "Since the Lord revealed to me what the soul must say, in that [moment] when it ascends to heaven, and how it must answer to each of the powers above — [saying:] For I have known myself, and have gathered myself together from every side, and have not sown children to the prince [archon], but have rooted out his roots, and have gathered the scattered members, and I know thee, who thou art. For I am of the [powers] above," &c. Gelasius, distinction 15, lists the Acts of Philip in the catalog of the Apocrypha. [12]

THE WRITING OF THE PEOPLES. [13] Concerning this, according to the edition of the Seventy, in Psalm 86 [87] it is read: THE LORD shall narrate ἐν γραφῇ — that is, in the writing of the peoples, and of these princes, who were born in her. Euthymius, expounding this place, says: Out of the writings OF THE PROPHETS, Christ shall teach [the things] which pertain to himself. For Luke says: [14] And the book of Isaiah the Prophet was delivered to him; and, the book being unrolled, he found the place where it was written, The Spirit of the Lord [is] upon me, and the rest. This kind of writing of the prophets, therefore, he [the Psalmist] calls the writing of the peoples, and the writing of their princes — as [being that] which was given both to the peoples of the Jews and to their princes, and was the proper possession of those who were born in her, that is, born in Sion. Thus he. According to the Hebrew verity it is thus read: THE LORD numbered [them], writing down the peoples: this one was born in her forever. Which the Jews thus expound: So great will be the future multitude of the peoples in Jerusalem, that the Messiah alone — in whose knowledge is written the number of all the Jews — will be able to number it: inasmuch as he was born in that city to reign in it always, and without end.

THE INSCRIPTION OF THE PONTIFICAL VESTMENT [15] was threefold: namely, on the head, on the shoulders, and on the breast. The first was displayed on a golden plate, fixed above the forehead of the Pontiff's mitre or diadem; on which was inscribed the name of God in four Hebrew letters — [16] י Iod, ה he, ו vau, ה he — which is reckoned ineffable by the Hebrews. The second writing two huge emeralds contained, which the Pontiff wore one on each shoulder, enclosed and bound in gold: on the right of which were engraved the six names of the elder Patriarchs — that is, Judah, Reuben, Gad, Asher, Naphtali, Dan; but on the left, the other six names of the later Patriarchs — namely, Simeon, Issachar, Zebulun, Manasseh, Ephraim, Benjamin. The third writing the Pontiff bore before him upon [his] breast, in a certain square jewel [breastplate], of gold and four-

[→ …of gold and four] colors interwoven, which was called the Rational [breastplate]: into which were inserted twelve stones of diverse color, of marvelous size and price, in four rows; so that in each little row three stones were set, and on each of the stones one of the twelve names of the patriarchs, according to their ages [order of birth], was written. The causes of these inscriptions, and their mystical significations, the author of the book of Wisdom — touching [them] in very few words — [1] states thus: [2] UPON the vesture, [namely] the poderis [long robe] which Aaron had, was the whole world; and the great deeds of the fathers were graven in the four rows of stones; and the magnificence of God was written in the diadem of his head. Philo, in the third book On the Life of Moses, and in the second book On Monarchy; Josephus, in the third book of the Antiquities; and Jerome, in the epistle to Fabiola — beginning somewhat further back, and unfolding the matter more amply — hand down the occasions of these inscriptions, and their significations, to be of this kind.

The whole vesture of the Pontiff [3] consisted of six ornaments — that is, of two tunics, the thorax [breastpiece], the necklace, the girdle, and the diadem. Now of the two Tunics, [4] the inner was a linen [garment] of the whitest byssus [fine linen]; the outer wholly of hyacinth [blue], with little bells and golden pomegranates hung about its lowest hem. The Thorax, [5] or superhumeral [ephod], was interwoven of four colors — namely hyacinth, byssus, scarlet, and purple — and of gold. The Necklace, [6] which was also called the Rational, distinguished with twelve gems, hung from the neck of the Pontiff before [his] breast. The Diadem, [7] or Thiara, adorned with a golden plate and inscribed with the name of God, was placed upon the head of the Pontiff: whose thorax the Girdle, [8] let down about the breast even to the ankles, bound fast. This was the vesture of the Pontiff.

But what it signifies — both as a whole and by [its] parts — is this. [9] The whole garment carries back the likeness of the whole world: so that the Pontiff, wearing upon [his] vestments the image of the whole universe, may know himself to be the mediator of the whole world before God; and may perform the divine service not only for [his] familiar friends and fellow-citizens, but for the whole human race, and for all the parts of nature — [both] heaven and the elements — either rendering acts of thanksgiving, or offering supplications to God the creator of all. Moreover, [that he may know] that he ought to study to express, by [his] life, doctrine, and virtues, the order, adornment, and harmony of the whole world, lacking in no respect; and to become, in a manner, a microcosm — that is, a little world — thus representing the likeness of the greater world in [his] manners, even as he bears it upon [his] vestments. But the several parts of the vestment represent the several parts of the universe. The Byssine Tunic, [10] because byssus is engendered from the earth, shows the earth. The Hyacinthine Tunic [11] demonstrates the air — stretched out from the lunar orb even to the lands — on account of the likeness of [its] color. The sound of the little bells hanging from it, and their golden gleam, indicate [12] the lightnings and thunders begotten in the air. The ornament of the Thorax, [13] resplendent with gems, figures the beauty of the starry heaven: for the two round emeralds on each shoulder bear the type of the Sun and the Moon — the [luminary] of the one being of the day, of the other of the night. In the Rational, the twelve gems of divers color, distributed three by three into four rows, hint to us the zodiac [sign-bearing] circle, divided into four parts, each consisting of three signs. The Girdle has the pattern of the equinoctial circle, which the astronomers call the girdle of the world.

But the Diadem, [14] which is a royal ensign, set upon the highest summit of the whole body, and containing the name of God on a golden plate, hints at the empyrean heaven and the seat of God — [a seat] loftier than the whole compass of created things — from which the King of kings, presiding over all, most wisely governs all the [things] that are below. The Diadem also signifies, [15] overtopping every ornament of the Pontiff, that the power and honor of the high priesthood is more eminent not only than [that] of private men, but even than [that] of all kings and emperors of the world. These are the enigmas which lie hidden beneath the Pontifical vesture: now let us see what his inscriptions mean.

THE NAME OF GOD, [16] graven upon the golden plate — which the Greeks call τετραγράμματον, that is, Quadriliteral [four-lettered], because it is written with these four letters, יהוה — is reckoned ineffable among the Hebrews: either because the letters which compose the name are voiceless, and can of themselves express no articulate utterance; or on account of reverence for the divine majesty, whose most proper name they think it not lawful either to hear or to name. Whence, as often as it falls [to them] to read it in the sacred letters, they pronounce [it] by another name — that is, Adonai, which is interpreted Lord. Clemens of Alexandria, in the fifth book of the Stromata, says that the Hebrew utterance of this name יהוה is [17] IEHOVA; which, according to him also, is expounded, He who is, and who shall be. Theodoret, in the fifteenth question on Exodus, says that the expression of the same name is, among the Samaritans, Iaue; but among the Jews, Ia. Jerome, in the exposition of the eighth Psalm, explains this same name by the word Iaho. But Philo asserts that this very name Iehova — which signifies Being, or He who is — is most justly attributed to God; because no word agrees with God more reasonably and more truly than To Be. For thus He named Himself, when, to Moses asking, What is thy name? He answered: [18] I am, who am; or, as the Hebrew has it, אני אהיה אשר אהיה Ani eheieh, ascer eheieh, that is, I will be, who will be — which is the same [thing] among the Hebrews, to whom it is proper to use futures for presents. And from this place Augustine, bishop of Chisamus [Chisamensis], judges [19] the name Tetragrammaton to have been derived — [the name] whereby the Divinity named itself from being: because, in the first utterance of the substantive verb Is, the Hebrews thus write היה haia, that is, He was; to which, in the future of the third person, iod is added, and it becomes יהיה iheieh, that is, He shall be. And this very [word] is the quadriliteral name — only [with] the iod drawn out, so that it becomes vau [vav]; and the same bishop thinks that in the place of that which is now vau, there was [formerly] iod, because the passage from iod to vau is easy, on account of the very great affinity of the like letters. The name of Being, therefore, graven on the golden plate, indicates that supreme and greatest Being of all to be the principle and the bond of all the things whose images the Pontiff puts on — containing and constraining all the parts of the universe, and not suffering them to be dissolved or to slip away, nor anything to be in the world which could be without His aid; who is the fullness of all essence and of all life, from whom all things live, are moved, and have proceeded; and who embraces the whole of being in Himself, as it were a certain infinite and immense sea of essence; which indeed always was, and is, and always shall be — nay rather, always is. For Was, or Shall be, are divisions of fluxile [ever-flowing] nature and of time; but God transcends the reckoning both of nature and of time. Which [truth] those ancient Egyptians also — heathen though they were — acknowledging, [20] described God in their temples (as Eusebius, in the eleventh book of the Preparation for the Gospel, is witness) with these words: I AM THAT WHICH WAS, WHICH IS, AND WHICH SHALL BE. MY VEIL NO ONE HAS EVER UNCOVERED. This, then, is what the name of God impressed upon the plate signified.

Moreover, the names of the twelve sons of Israel were graven on twelve gems before the breast in the Rational, and again on two emeralds upon the shoulders of the Pontiff — [21] as Moses says, for a memorial; that is, that the high priest, entering the holy of holies, might remember that he bears upon [his] shoulders the sins especially of his own people, and might make expiations and sacrifices first for it, then for the other nations. Again, these same names, written on the front part of the Thorax — which designates heaven — mystically show that the names alone of the sons of Israel, and of those who descend from them not according to the flesh, but according to the spirit, the promise, and the inheritance of faith, are written in the heavens; and that to them alone pertains that most welcome announcement of the Savior: [22] REJOICE THAT YOUR NAMES ARE WRITTEN IN HEAVEN. And this is what Solomon said, [23] that the great deeds of the fathers were described in the Rational — that is, that the magnificent and illustrious deeds of the patriarchs, and of their spiritual posterity, were written in the heavens (whereof the Rational was the exemplar), not with ink, nor as men are wont to write, but in the everlasting memory of God: in that manner in which God is wont to write in the book of Life those whom He willed to be enrolled citizens of the eternal city. And the six names of the patriarchs engraved on the emeralds of each shoulder — [the emeralds] signifying the Sun and the Moon — indicate the eternity of the seed of Israel, [a seed] destined to endure as long as the everlasting stars of the Sun and Moon shall remain. See what we have noted concerning the Pontifical vesture in the third book, in the Sciographic [Shadow-drawn] Method of divine Scripture, where we have also set a picture of the several parts of the pontifical adornment.

PONTIUS PILATE, governor of Judaea, when he had condemned our Savior — the cause unpleaded — to gratify the Jews, and, wishing to show that he had done it for a weighty cause and, beyond the ordinary order of law, most justly, set upon His neck the title and cause of Christ's condemnation, expressed most briefly in four words, in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, in this manner: [24]

> ישוע הנצרי מלך היהודים
> ΙΗΣΟΥΣ ΝΑΖΩΡΑΙΟΣ Ο ΒΑΣΙΛΕΥΣ ΤΩΝ ΙΟΥΔΑΙΩΝ.
>
> JESUS OF NAZARETH, THE KING OF THE JEWS.

This title Pilate — in his own judgment most ignominious, but in very truth most glorious —

[→ …but in very truth most glorious —] devised as an excuse and defense of the detestable sentence pronounced by him against Jesus: as it were, an apology for his own injustice, [1] written to all the nations of the whole world in three tongues, confident that he could defend himself before all, as though he had put to death a seditious [man], an aspirant to kingship, and an enemy of the Roman empire. But the Holy Spirit, who had impelled Pilate to this writing, intended [2] something far otherwise — namely, to signify by this title the name and title of the kingdom which Christ, through His cross, was soon to receive over all the Jews; that is, according to the interpretation of the Jewish name, over all who confess [Him] — [all] who throughout the whole world confess and worship the true God — and [to signify] that those nations especially would pass under the empire of Christ whose tongues were included in the title of His kingdom. Whence also, when the Jews strove to change the title, Pilate, saying [3] WHAT I HAVE WRITTEN, I HAVE WRITTEN, firmly resisted — God so willing it, [God] who had decreed that the title of Christ's kingdom should remain unchangeable and uncorrupted forever. This title, still whole after three hundred and thirty years, [4] found together with the Lord's cross by Helena, mother of Constantine, among the ruins of the city of Jerusalem, Rufinus records in the tenth book of the Ecclesiastical History, chapter eight.

THERE ARE CARRIED ABOUT also certain other [writings] under the name of Pilate, among which the first place is held by the ACTS OF PILATE — [5] which, as Eusebius relates in the ninth book of the Ecclesiastical History, chapter 4, were forged by the enemies of the Christian name, by the zeal and effort of the emperor Maximinus; who, when he wished to seem to persecute the Christians for just causes, ordered certain Acts to be published abroad — as though composed before Pilate concerning our Savior — in which every kind of blasphemy against Christ was heaped up. These acts he commanded, by a public edict, to be sent through all the provinces of his realm, and to be set up in every city, in the villages, and even in the fields; he also ordered them to be handed to the schoolmasters of boys, so that — in place of the [lessons] they are wont to dictate for meditating or learning by heart — they should deliver these to the boys to be committed to memory, and recited all day long in the schools, and chanted at the crossroads. This so impudent forgery Eusebius, in the first [book] of the same history, chapter 9, easily refutes from the reckoning of the times. For [these] false Acts of Pilate record the time of the crime committed against the Savior as the fourth consulate of Tiberius — which was the seventh year of his reign — at which time [Eusebius] evidently shows that Pilate had not even yet been sent to the procuratorship of Judaea, on the testimony of Josephus, [6] a most approved historian, who most plainly indicates that Pilate took up the procuratorship of Judaea [7] in the twelfth year of Tiberius Caesar — which also agrees with the Gospel of Luke. [8]

Epiphanius, in the second [book] of the Panarion, teaches that there were also certain Acts of Pilate, which the Quartadeciman heretics used, building on them [the claim] that Pascha must always be celebrated on the fourteenth day of the moon of the month of March, because in those same Acts it is written that our Savior suffered on the twenty-fourth day of March. Eusebius, in the second book of the ecclesiastical history, hands down [9] that Pilate, after the Lord's resurrection, wrote to Tiberius the emperor [a letter] which spread a happy report throughout all Syria concerning the resurrection of Christ, and His miracles, and the opinion of His divinity; the copy of which letter — omitted by Eusebius, but found by us among the ancient monuments of the Vatican Library — is this:

Pontius Pilate to Claudius Tiberius Nero, emperor, greeting.

> LATELY it has come to pass — of which thing I myself can be a witness — that the Jews, through envy, have by a cruel condemnation destroyed themselves and all their posterity. For whereas, out of the promises of the oracles received on the authority of their forefathers, they were expecting this — that their God would send [one] by a young virgin, who should by right be called their king — [God] sent Him, I being present, into Judaea. [10] He (as is known to all) restored sight to the blind, cleansed lepers, healed the palsied [those slack in [their] sinews]. They saw also that He drove out demons, and freed those beset by unclean spirits, and likewise raised the dead out of the very sepulchres; the whirlwinds of the winds obeyed Him; He walked upon the sea with dry feet; and He did very many other miracles besides — so that even commonly, among the Jews and the people, He was called the Son of God. But the chief priests, stirred by rivalry and spite, opposed Him; and having seized Him, delivered Him to me, making Him out guilty by feigned crimes, calling Him a magician and a deserter and gainsayer of their law. [11] Led astray by these persuasions, I gave credit to their complaints, and delivered Him, scourged, to them, that they might deal with Him according to their pleasure. They crucified Him, therefore, and set guards over the sepulchre in which He was laid — among whom also were some of my [own] soldiers — who on the third day saw Him rising from the dead. But the wickedness of the Jews blazed up the more at this deed: and they counted out a great sum of money to the soldiers themselves, that they should give out that His disciples had stolen the body by night; and these [soldiers] indeed took the money, yet nonetheless everywhere publicly professed, and bear witness, that they had seen visions of Angels, and that that Jesus had truly risen from the dead. These things I have written for this cause: that no one should give credit to the trifles and lies of the Jews, if they should speak otherwise of the matter [as] done. Farewell.

TERTULLIAN, in the Apologeticus, writes [12] that the emperor Tiberius, when he had heard these [things] concerning Christ's miracles out of Syria, referred [them] to the senate with the prerogative of his own vote, that Christ might be received among the gods of the Romans; and when the Senate would not approve it, Caesar remained in his opinion, threatening peril to the accusers of the Christians.

PETER COMESTOR, in the Scholastic History, relates [13] that Pilate, accused before Caesar concerning the unjust slaughter of the Jews and [the plundering] of the sacred treasury of Jerusalem (which is called Corban), was by him banished to Lyons — which city was his birthplace [14] — that there, in the hatred and ignominy of his own race, he might die inglorious.

PROCHORUS, one of the seven deacons whom Luke in the Acts reports to have been chosen by the Apostles, is said to have written [15] the Gospel of John on the island of Patmos. Simon Metaphrastes attests this, in the life of John, in these words: JOHN bids a certain one of the seven deacons to follow him — this was Prochorus. And he takes the summit of the mountain, and is raised upright after the manner of Samuel, and is figured like Moses with hands uplifted, and withdraws [his] mind from the senses: then dreadful thunders, ter- [→ …then dreadful thunders,] terrors, and lightnings like to those which had before befallen Moses when he received the law, took place; at last the thunders are expressed into a [human] voice, and clearly resound: In the beginning was the Word, and so forth. At which [voice] Prochorus — who at first had fallen, as it were lifeless with fear — his dread a little repressed, began with trembling hand to write his [John's] words from the mouth and voice of John the Theologian (a voice which was to him [as] thunder), thus continuing until he had completed the whole gospel. But Athanasius, in the Synopsis, thinks [1] the Gospel of John was written at Ephesus by Gaius.

PTOLEMY PHILOPATOR, fourth king of Egypt, wrote to the governors of his kingdom two letters — one against the Jews, the other for the Jews — the copy of which is extant in the third [book] of Maccabees, chapters 3 and 7.

THE WRITING-TABLET OF ZACHARIAS. Luke, making mention of this, [2] said: AND asking for a writing-tablet, he wrote, saying, John is his name. Now the Pugillar [writing-tablet] — which the Greeks call πινακίδιον — is a little tablet smeared with wax, on which one writes with a stylus. Prudentius, in the Peristephanon, describing the martyrdom of Cassian (who, cut to pieces little by little by the writing-tablets and styli of his own pupils, perished), expressed the form and use [3] of the writing-tablet and of the stylus (with which the tablets were written upon) in these verses:

> Countless boys around [him] — a piteous sight —
> transfixed [his] pierced limbs with [their] little styli.
>
> Hence the tablets, wont to outrun the wax;
>
> noting the school's murmur, they had written [their lessons].
>
> Some hurl stones, and break the tablets upon [his] face;
>
> the wood, its surface struck back, flies asunder.
>
> The waxed box-wood [tablets] crackle, dashed on [his] bleeding cheeks,
> and the short swelling page grows red from the blow.
> Then others brandish goads and iron points —

[there] where the wax is written with ploughed furrows, and where the cut letter-strokes are erased; and the field of the rough surface, shining anew, is made fresh again.

There are those who think [4] that this Writing-tablet asked for by Zacharias was a public register, diligently kept by the scribes and priests in the synagogue, in which the names, tribes, and parents of circumcised infants — together with the year, month, and day of the circumcision — were noted, for the retaining of certainty and assurance both of the origin and of the age of each. This custom is still observed [5] in many cities of Italy: [namely] that the names and times of baptized infants are written down by the parish priests who baptized them, in the authentic volume of the parish. Nor is [the opinion] of these far from what Eusebius, out of Julius Africanus, relates in the first [book] of the Ecclesiastical History, chapter 7 — namely, that the Hebrews were accustomed to keep publicly, in the more secret archives of the temple, certain books in which were contained the origins of whatsoever Jews (even of those descended from foreigners) and the lineages and genealogies of all the families: which [books] Herod, thinking himself convicted by them of the ignobility of his own race, burned with flames; [6] yet he could not utterly abolish them, since many — and especially those whom a nobility handed down from [their] forefathers put in mind [of it] — kept books of this kind copied out at home. Among which the genealogy of our Savior Jesus was found closely similar to those [things] which are had in the Gospel.

THE BOOK OF KINGS, in Hebrew ספר המלכים Sepher hammelachim, is cited in 2 Paralipomenon, chapter 24. [7] That this is not that work which is contained under the name of the Four Books of Kings in the sacred Bible, the last period [sentence] of that same chapter shows clearly enough, [8] running thus: NOW [concerning] the sons of Joash, and the great sum of money which had been gathered under him, and the repairing of the house of God — these are written more diligently in the book of Kings. Which words certainly cannot be referred to the [canonical] history of Kings; wherein it is so far [otherwise] — that the [things] narrated in the present chapter of Paralipomenon should be related more fully and more exactly — that some [things] are even omitted in it out of those which are here either recorded or at least indicated. This book, therefore, is (as I judge) plainly diverse from the canonical Books of Kings. And the author of the third volume of Esdras seems to feel the same, who, distinguishing this [book] from those by a manifest difference, writes thus in the first chapter of his work: [9] AND these [things] were prescribed [written down before] in the book of the histories of the kings of Judah; and the several deeds and acts of Josiah, and his glory, and his understanding in the law of the Lord; both the [things] done by him, and those which are not written in the book of the Kings of Israel, &c. Now this book is cited both in the two latter volumes of Kings, and in the latter book of Paralipomenon, in almost every chapter, once and again, and with the words of the title a little varied: sometimes it is called the Book of the words, or of the discourses, or of the days of the kings of Judah; sometimes the Book of the discourses of the days of the Kings of Israel; and at times, too, by the joined title of both together, it is called the Book of the Kings of Judah and Israel — in which, by an ampler narration, all and singular the deeds of the Kings of Judah and Israel had been more brilliantly set in order by a most diligent author, whose name no less than [his] work devouring time has consumed, [10] leaving only, for the memory of posterity, those [things] which — in the second [book] of Paralipomenon, and in the second and third books of Kings — were gathered into a short compendium by an uncertain abridger, whom some think to be Jeremiah, others Esdras.

THE BILL OF DIVORCE, a book delivered by God to the mother of the Jews, is the execution of the divine reprobation against the Jewish synagogue. Concerning which, of old — when the Jews, on account of [their] nefarious crimes, had been repudiated by God and given into the servitude of barbarous nations — they were wont, by a certain popular kind of complaint, under the parable of a book of divorce, to accuse [11]

God as fickle, changeable, and least of all consistent with Himself: [complaining] that He had suddenly, with changed purpose of mind, repudiated and cast off the mother and Jewish synagogue joined to Himself in matrimony and most ardently beloved for a long time — and that provoked or challenged by no fault of hers, but out of the sole and mere choice of a new will; after the manner of a carnal man who of his own accord dismisses a wife sought with ardent desire and long kept, for no other cause than that her long and continual companionship and abundance has brought upon him satiety and loathing of the conjugal life. [→ …From] which so iniquitous accusations God, clearing Himself through Isaiah, says: WHO is (says He) the book of divorce of your mother, whereby I put her away? For behold, you are sold in your iniquities, and in your crimes have I put away your mother; because I came, and there was no man; I called, and there was none to answer — showing forsooth by these words [1] that the occasions and causes of the Hebrew reprobation and repudiation are not to be referred to His own good pleasure of the divine will, but rather to the perfidious ingratitude of the adulterous synagogue, which — the fidelity of the marriage-bed being violated, and the worship of God her spouse cast off — had prostituted herself to the adulterous gods of all nations, and had drawn God, well-nigh unwilling, to the book of divorce by the foulness of her fornications. Which God also, confirming through Jeremiah, says: [2] BECAUSE the rebel Israel had committed adultery, I had put her away, and had given her a bill of divorce; yet her treacherous sister Judah feared not, but went and played the harlot also. And again, repeating the same through Hosea, He says: [3] JUDGE your mother, judge; for she is not my wife, and I am not her husband. And again in Isaiah, upbraiding the children of Israel with the adulteries of [their] shameless mother, He says: [4] COME hither, you sons of the sorceress, the seed of the adulterer and of the harlot. And a little after, in the same chapter, turning His speech to their mother, He subjoins: [5] UPON a lofty and high mountain you have set your bed, and thither you went up to offer victims; and behind the door and behind the post you have set up your memorial; and beside me you uncovered yourself, and received adulterers; you enlarged your bed, and made a covenant with them; you loved their bed with open hand; and you adorned yourself with royal ointment, and multiplied your perfumes; you sent your messengers far off, and were debased even to hell. By which words God plainly demonstrates [6] that not without cause, nor out of the mere sentence of His own mind, but out of the ignominy of the Jewish baseness, did He cast off the Synagogue, [which had] deserved ill of Him. For God reprobates no one at all [7] unless a fault has first gone before in him; nor is He an avenger before someone is a sinner.

BUT to these [things], which are drawn from those prophets concerning the occasion and cause of the Jewish repudiation and reprobation, the Apostle Paul seems not a little to be at variance — [8] who, in the Epistle to the Romans, discoursing of this very reprobation of the Jewish nation, refers the cause of this rejection not to the crimes and evil deserts of the Jews, but to the very good pleasure of the divine will so willing it: [a will] which, with no inspection made of human [merits], apart from any inspection of [their] vices or virtues, receives into favor whom it wills and as it wills, and hates, rejects, and repudiates whom it wills and as it wills — even the undeserving. Which sentence indeed fights diametrically with the sayings of the Prophets set down above.

AGAIN, the same Paul, in another place of the same epistle, seems to have utterly taken away not only the [aforesaid] cause of the Jewish reprobation, but even the reprobation itself of the Jewish nation, when he thus spoke: [9] I SAY then, has God cast off his people? God forbid: for I also am an Israelite, of the seed of Abraham, of the tribe of Benjamin. God has not cast off his people, whom he foreknew — as if he should say: He is unchangeable, nor does He any more retract what He once decreed.

SINCE, therefore, according to His eternal prescience He has chosen for Himself the nation of the Hebrews as a peculiar [people], it cannot come to pass that God should repudiate and cast it off — which God Himself also, in Jeremiah, taking an argument from impossibilities, most constantly confirms, in these words: [10] THUS says the Lord: If the heavens above can be measured, and the foundations of the earth beneath be searched out, then also will I cast off all the seed of Israel for all that they have done. [11] Thus says the Lord, who gives the Sun for the light of the day, the order of the Moon and of the stars for the light of the night: If these laws shall fail before me, then also shall the seed of Israel fail, so as not to be a nation before me all the days. And, what is even much more admirable, God Himself, through Hosea, affirms that He is so far from the repudiation of the Jewish nation that He even promises to take her to Himself as a perpetual spouse, saying: [12] I WILL espouse you to myself forever: and I will espouse you to me in justice, and in judgment, and in mercy, and in compassions; and I will espouse you to me in faith. Which words indeed seem most firmly to establish that the Hebrew nation was neither at any time repudiated, nor thereafter to be repudiated.

FOR the solution of this controversy it is needful to know that the divine reprobation, or divorce, is twofold — [13] namely, eternal and temporal. Eternal divorce [14] is the order and disposition of the divine providence concerning those whom God has foreknown [as] to be excluded forever from the nuptials of the celestial Lamb, and from the fellowship and everlasting fruition of the divine Spouse. Temporal divorce [15] is the rejection whereby God, for a time, repudiates certain [persons] — as much of the number of those to be saved as of the number of those to be damned — and temporally excludes and rejects [them] from the participation of His goods, whether spiritual or corporal. Of the temporal casting-off of spiritual goods Jonas complained, when he said: [16] I AM cast away from the sight of your eyes; and David, dreading the same casting-off, was saying: [17] CAST me not away from your face, and take not your holy Spirit from me. And in another psalm: [18] I said in the excess of my mind, I am cast away from the face of your eyes. Of the divorce from temporal goods the same David says: [19] WHY have you repelled me? and why do I go sorrowful, while the enemy afflicts me? And Jeremiah, in the Lamentations, embracing both divorces — the eternal as well as the temporal — in one sentence, says: [20] THE Lord will not cast off forever; for if he has cast off, he will also have mercy.

SINCE, therefore, the divorce is twofold, of each

[→ …Of each] of them two [things] can be particularly investigated — namely, whether the penalty of each divorce reaches to the whole race of the Jews, and what were the causes of each divorce.

IN THE FIRST place, if we ask whether the whole Jewish nation has been cast off by eternal divorce, [1] Paul answers: God forbid. As if he should say: although out of the Jews an innumerable multitude (as the Prophets everywhere testify) has been repudiated by God with eternal reprobation, yet God forbid that I should believe the whole seed of Israel condemned to the penalty of eternal divorce: for I also am an Israelite, [2] of the tribe of Benjamin; for God has not cast off his people, whom he foreknew. But if anyone should ask whether temporal divorce [3] excludes the whole Jewish multitude from God utterly, or has at some time excluded [it], it must be answered that temporal divorce — as regards the casting-off from the temporal goods which God had granted to the Synagogue as it were a dowry — does comprehend the whole Jewish nation. For God has temporally cast off all — the good as well as the bad, the elect as well as the reprobate [4] — and has cast [them] out of the synagogue, out of the temple, out of the kingdom, and out of the possession of the promised land, into captivity and servitude. But as regards spiritual goods, and the grace of present justice, not all have been repudiated.

IN THE SECOND place, if we desire to know what was the cause why the greater part of the Jews has been cast off by perpetual divorce, [5] we ought to consider that, in the whole progress of the Jewish repudiation, certain degrees are prior and eternal, but certain [are] later and temporal — or (what is the same) that in the whole work of that divorce the beginning and the completion are to be regarded. If we consider the beginning, or the prior and eternal degrees — which are hatred, rejection, and repudiation, opposed in a privative manner to love, election, and predestination — Paul answers that the cause why the Jews are cast off eternally is none, save the good pleasure of the divine will; and he proves it by the example of the reprobation of Esau, concerning whom, before he was born or had done anything of evil — not out of foreseen evil works, but out of the choice of His own will — God said: [6] ESAU I have hated; and the elder shall serve the younger. But if we look to the later, temporal degrees, and to the last completion of the eternal repudiation [7] (which is concluded in eternal damnation), the cause of this final outcome is in the Jews — namely, their incredulity, arrogance, ingratitude, and obstinacy: out of which they have fallen into the damnation of perpetual perdition, God saying to them through Hosea the Prophet: [8] THY perdition [is] from thyself, O Israel; only from me [is] thy help. Which Paul likewise demonstrated when, proposing that question — Why Israel did not deserve to be justified — he said: [9] WHAT then shall we say? that Israel, following the law of justice, is not come unto the law of justice. Wherefore? And answering, he added: [10] Because [it was] not by faith, but as it were by works: for they stumbled at the stumbling-stone, and the rock of scandal — because they did not believe that they could be justified through Christ, who is the rock of offense, against which they, by their own incredulity, dashed themselves: and for that cause they have been repudiated forever.

FINALLY, if it be asked whence [comes] the cause of the temporal divorce of the Jews — [11] that is, why God has dismissed from Himself the Jewish race, and cast off in His fury the whole seed of Israel, and given it for a prey and for a plundering to all the nations — God Himself answers through Jeremiah: [12] Because the rebel Israel has committed adultery, I had dismissed her, and had given her a bill of divorce. And again through Isaiah: [13] In your iniquities are you sold, and in your crimes have I dismissed your mother; because I came, and there was no man; I called, and there was none to hear. The Bridegroom Himself came; He called the adulterous synagogue; He provoked [her] with benefits, invited [her] with blandishments, entreated [her] with prayers, deterred [her] with threats, goaded [her] with scourges, that — the adulterer forsaken — she might return to Him. He sent prayers before, when, speaking out of the mouth of Jeremiah and Hosea, He said: [14] IT IS commonly said: If a man dismiss his wife, and she, departing from him, marry another man, shall he return to her any more? but you have fornicated with many lovers: yet return to me, says the Lord, and I will espouse you [15] to me forever, and in mercy, and in compassions. Threats He added, when He spoke to her — through Hosea, to [her] sons — saying: [16] Judge your mother, judge; for she is not my wife, and I am not her husband: let her put away her fornications from her face, and her adultery from between her breasts; lest perhaps I strip her naked, and set her as in the day of her nativity, and make her as a wilderness, and set her as a trackless land, and slay her with thirst; and I will not have mercy on her children, for they are the children of fornication: for their mother has committed fornication. Scourges, finally, He applied, when He afflicted her with various captivities; but when she could by no means be brought — neither by sweet nor by bitter [things] — to forsake the adulterers utterly and to cleave perseveringly to God her Spouse, at length, by the desert of her ingratitude, [17] she was cast off by her Spouse with a temporal divorce, for perpetual time.

THE BILL OF HUMAN DIVORCE, in Hebrew ספר כריתות Sepher cherithuth, but in Greek according to the Seventy interpreters βιβλίον ἀποστασίου, is the book which a husband was bound by law to hand to a wife soon to be dismissed — [the law] which Moses promulgated [18] in the twenty-fourth chapter of Deuteronomy in these words: [19] IF a man take a wife, and have her, and she find not favor before his eyes on account of some foulness, he shall write a bill of divorce, and shall give it into her hand, and shall send her away out of his house. And when, having departed, she has married another husband, and he also hates her, and has given her a bill of divorce, and has sent her away out of his house, or is indeed dead, the former husband cannot take her again to wife: because she is polluted, and is become abominable before the Lord. Thus Moses. This bill the Rabbis of the Hebrews call גט ghet, because it is, as it were, a witness of the divorce, in which the husband resigns all the right which he had over the wife. Now the Hebrews of our times use, in composing bills of this kind, a certain formula taken out of the book of the precepts of Rabbi Moses of Coucy [de Cozi], in well-nigh these words:

ON THE SIXTH [day] of the week, on the twelfth of the month Adar, in the year from the creation of the world five thousand three hun-

THUS, therefore, the Jews believe that they rightly understand and piously observe the law concerning the bill of divorce, thinking that Moses commanded husbands to dismiss hateful wives for whatsoever cause, and to marry another. But Christ showed [2] that this law was not so to be understood, when — the Pharisees asking, in the nineteenth chapter of Matthew, whether it was lawful for a man to dismiss his wife for whatsoever cause — He answered that it was not lawful for a man to separate those whom God had joined into one flesh. And again, when the Pharisees objected that Moses had commanded to give a bill and to dismiss the wife, He straightway added: [3] MOSES, for the hardness of your heart, permitted you to dismiss your wives: but from the beginning it was not so. And I say to you, that whosoever shall dismiss his wife, except for fornication, and shall marry another, commits adultery; and he that shall marry her that is dismissed, commits adultery — willing (as Augustine says) to declare by these words that not the whole of this law is a precept, but that one part of it (namely, that which pertains to the divorce) is a permission; but the other, which speaks of the bill of divorce, is a command and a mandate. [4] For Moses did not say, Whosoever will, let him dismiss [his] wife — which was contrary to the law of God — but he said, If any man dismiss [her], let him not dismiss [her] except a bill of divorce being first given: so that, forsooth, a delay being interposed, the mind — [otherwise] headlong into discord and separation — being checked by the writing of the bill, might desist, and might consider what an evil it was to dismiss a wife; especially because (as they report) among the Hebrews it was lawful for none [5] to write the sacred letters — that is, the Hebrew [letters] — except for the scribes alone, since they professed a more excellent wisdom. To these scribes and judges, therefore — endowed with wisdom and justice — the law sent [the parties], that by their persuasions the husband might be recalled to conjugal concord. But if only such hatred should intervene that it could not be extinguished or amended, then He permitted a divorce to be made, and another to be married — not as something lawful, but [6] as a remedy prepared for avoiding a greater evil, lest the husband, from weariness and the despair of an inseparable marriage, should turn to the murder of the wife. For it was always an evil to repudiate a wife for whatsoever cause, and to take another — nay, [it is] against the very inseparable nature of matrimony, founded from the beginning of the human race, whose law is: [7] Wherefore a man shall leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave to his wife: and they shall be two in one flesh. Not, therefore, was it a precept for the Jews to dismiss a wife and to marry another, but only a permission. To us Christians it is neither a precept, nor in any part permitted — Paul saying: [8] TO THOSE who are joined in matrimony I give commandment, not I, but the Lord, that the wife depart not from the husband; but if she depart, that she remain unmarried, or be reconciled to her husband. [9] Albeit a bill of repudiation and of divorce — from the bed and cohabitation only, and in the sole cause of fornication, and to those alone who are free from fornication — is permitted to be given, and is even sometimes just (namely, when the adulteress is incorrigible), lest we fall into that sentence of the proverbs: [10] HE WHO holds [retains] an adulteress is foolish and senseless. Augustine treats this argument [11] in the first book On the Lord's sermon on the mount; in the first book of the Retractations, chapter nineteen; and in the nineteenth book against Faustus, chapter twenty-six; but most copiously in the two books On adulterous marriages, to Pollentius — a most religious man, who, moved rather by a certain human commiseration of husbands than by solid reasons, thought it not unlawful for a Christian man, in the cause of fornication, to give a bill of divorce to an adulterous wife and to marry another; lest the unhappy husband, who cannot live continently, should — by the necessity of satisfying human frailty and of having offspring — be compelled to lie with the adulteress, or be driven to slay the adulteress without any mercy, if, she living, it were not lawful for him, according to the laws of the Romans, to marry another wife. Now the ancient Romans permitted [12] the divorces of wives with such liberty that, while the republic yet flourished, it was lawful for anyone, and for whatsoever cause (even a hidden one), to cast out a wife by a bill sent [to her]. Whence, when Paulus Aemilius had repudiated his wife Papyria [13] — daughter of Musonius, a man of consular rank, with whom he had lived a long time, and out of whom he had raised a most noble offspring, that renowned and greatest Scipio Aemilianus — he would indicate no cause of the divorce, but thought that he abundantly satisfied those inquiring [of him] if, holding out his foot, he answered: This shoe is new, and fair: but none of you knows where it pinches my foot. This so unbridled license of divorces the later Roman Emperors [14] (as appears in the fifth book of the Code, title seventeen) restrained with some curbs, laws being published that it should not be lawful for anyone, without open and designated causes, to repudiate his own spouse, nor in any way to expel [her], unless [she were] an adulteress, or a murderess, or a kidnapper, or a poisoner, or a violater of sepulchres, or sacrilegious, or guilty of treason, or liable to some other crime like to these. Now the formula of the bill of divorce, which the Romans concluded in exceedingly brief words, [15] was this: PAPYRIA, DAUGHTER OF MUSONIUS, ATTEND TO YOUR OWN AFFAIRS; KEEP YOUR OWN THINGS FOR YOURSELF.

RHEUM BEELTHEB [Rehum Beeltheem], whom Josephus calls Rathymus, wrote to Cambyses, king of the Persians, one letter, by which he petitioned that the rebuilding of the temple of Jerusalem be prohibited. See the first book of Esdras, chapter 4.

THE SENATE AND PEOPLE OF THE ROMANS sent forth various writings in favor of the Jews, [1] concerning which these [things] are had in the sacred letters:

A DECREE OF THE SENATE concerning the friendship and alliance entered into with Judas Maccabaeus and the Jews, inscribed on brazen tablets in the Capitol; a copy whereof, sent into Judaea, is had in the first [book] of Maccabees, chapter eight, and in Josephus, in the twelfth book of the Antiquities, chapter seventeen.

A LETTER to Demetrius, king of Syria, that he should not harass the Jews with war. 1 Maccabees 8.

A LETTER written by T. Manlius and Q. Memmius to the senate of the Jews, whereby it is granted to them to live freely according to their ancestral laws. Second [book] of Maccabees, 11.

COMMENDATORY LETTERS to the kings of Europe and Asia, that they should grant a safe return into their homeland to the ambassadors of the Jews sent from Rome by Jonathan. 1 Maccabees, twelve.

A DECREE OF THE SENATE concerning the league and alliance renewed with Simon Maccabaeus, leader of the Jews, engraved on brazen tablets, and kept among the monuments of the Romans; a copy of which Simon set up on brazen tablets in the vestibule of the temple, and laid up the autograph [original] of it in the treasury of Jerusalem. 1 Maccabees 14.

COMMENDATORY LETTERS to the kings and free peoples, that they should permit the ambassadors of Simon Maccabaeus to return safely from Rome into Palestine. 1 Maccabees, fourteen.

S.

SOLOMON, king of Jerusalem — besides those three books which are placed in the first order of the sacred canon (namely Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, [and] the book of Canticles), and two psalms (that is, the seventy-second and the hundred twenty-seventh), and besides the book of Wisdom (which is numbered among the canonical volumes of the second order) — published a well-nigh infinite number of books, [2] of which the [ones] written below are cited in the sacred letters:

משלי Mishle, that is, three thousand books of Parables — concerning which, at the close of the book of Ecclesiastes, Solomon himself speaks thus: [3] AND whereas Ecclesiastes was most wise, he taught the people, and declared the [things] he had done; and, searching out, he composed many parables: he sought profitable words, and wrote most upright discourses, and full of truth. Which is more amply explained in the third volume of Kings, in these words: [4] GOD gave to Solomon wisdom, and understanding exceeding much, and largeness of heart as the sand that is on the sea shore: and the wisdom of Solomon surpassed the wisdom of all the men of the East, and of the Egyptians; and he was wiser than all men, &c.; and he spoke three thousand parables, &c. Which words the author of the book of Hebrew Questions (whether that were Jerome, or some other) explains, saying that this work of three thousand parables is the book of Proverbs, [5] in which there are pesuchim [verses] — namely, nine hundred and fifteen verses — wherein three thousand parables are contained. But Josephus, in the eighth [book] of the Antiquities, expounding this place otherwise, [6] writes that Solomon made three thousand books of parables and similitudes; which the Rabbis of the Jews hand down to have been burned, in the devastation of the holy city, together with the books of the law, by Nabuzardan, prefect of the soldiery of the Chaldaeans, and afterward could not be repaired by Esdras.

Solomon likewise wrote [7] שירים Hashirim — that is, five thousand Canticles, or Songs, [8] as the same third [book] of Kings testifies — or (as Josephus expounds) five thousand books of Songs; of which one book only, which is inscribed שיר השירים Shir hashirim, that is, THE SONG OF SONGS, remained, the rest being consumed in the burning of Jerusalem.

He published also [9] דברי הטבע Dibre hatteva, that is, [the discourses] of the words of nature — or a huge work of Natural disputations, filled with an admirable wisdom of all things — which the third book of Kings recalls, at the place already cited, in this manner: [10] SOLOMON disputed concerning trees, from the cedar which is in Lebanon unto the hyssop which comes out of the wall; and he discoursed of beasts, and of fowls, and of creeping things, and of fishes — that is (as Jerome says) of their force, natures, and habits, and at what time they are born, and why not all [things] are born in every land. Which work was burned up in the same fire with the rest of the books. Georgius Cedrenus, in the compendium of histories, relates [11] that the Greek iatrosophists [physician-sages] filched the matter and the arguments of the art of Medicine out of this work — which indeed Hezekiah, king of Jerusalem, took away out of the midst [suppressed], offended (as the same author writes) by the negligence of the Jewish people, who, seeking the remedies of diseases from these writings, neglected to demand the healing of them from God.

He wrote also [12] מכתב היכל Michtav hechal, that is, the Writing of the temple, or a Description of the temple of Jerusalem — in which, after the imitation of his father David, he most copiously set forth an exemplar of the temple to be built, showing the form, the site, the measure, and the price of the several parts of the temple; and likewise explaining the dispositions, and the several offices of the Priests, Levites, Doorkeepers, Singers, and the other ministers, which were to be performed in the temple. Of this work the second book of the sacred Annals makes mention. [13] Rabanus judges this book to be the same as that which the first [book] of the Annals records David to have written on the same subject; [14] but the second book of the Annals gainsays [it], distinguishing the one from the other in these words: [15] PREPARE yourselves by [your] houses and kindred

There was also published by him a Prayer to God for the dedication of the temple, which he himself — on bended knees before the altar, and with hands lifted up to heaven — offered to God, saying: O LORD God of Israel, &c. — which [things] are written in the whole sixth chapter of the second [book] of Paralipomenon.

There is also cited, in the third book of Kings, chapter eleven, [1] ספר דברי שלמה Sepher divre Shelomo, that is, the book of the words of Solomon: in which he himself — or, as others think, the Prophet Ozai [Iddo] — wrote the life and all the deeds of Solomon; which book the Chaldaeans burned together with the other sacred scriptures.

AND these are the writings of Solomon of which mention is made in the sacred letters; beyond which he is reported to have written also certain others, concerning which [these things are noted]:

Of PRAYERS, or Incantations, for soothing sicknesses, one book — of which Josephus makes mention in the eighth book of the Antiquities.

Of EXORCISMS, or Conjurations, for driving away evil demons, one book. Concerning these Josephus, in the eighth book of the Antiquities, writes thus: GOD granted also to Solomon that he should learn thoroughly the art against demons, for the utility of men, and the cures of these [diseases]; whence also he instituted incantations by which sicknesses are wont to be mitigated: he found out also the manner of the bindings by which the demons, [once] bound, do not return again after they have been driven off. And this cure is discerned to prevail much among us even to this day. For I saw a certain Eleazar, of our nation, in the presence of Vespasian and his sons, and the Tribunes, and the rest of the army, curing those who were vexed by demons. Now the manner of the medicine was of this kind. He put to the nostrils of him who was vexed by the demon a ring having under [its] seal a root shown by Solomon: then he drew out the demon through the nostrils of the [man] smelling [it]; and suddenly the man fell down. Afterward he adjured him [the demon], casting against [it] the adjurations of Solomon, that it should not return again unto him — that is, the Songs which he composed, [now] to be said over him. But, wishing to satisfy and to prove to the bystanders that he had this virtue [power], Eleazar would place before them either a cup or a basin full of water, and would command the demon that, going out from the man, it should overturn these, and give to the beholders a sign that it had left the man. Which being done, the wisdom of Solomon became known to all. Thus Josephus. Origen, in the 35th tractate on Matthew, indicating that in his own age there were not lacking [those] who out of these books adjured demons, writes thus: TO ADJURE demons is a Jewish [practice]; and if at any time such a thing is done by our [people], it is like to that whereby the demons are wont to be adjured by the adjurations written by Solomon. But those very [persons] who use those adjurations sometimes use books not even fitly composed; and with certain [adjurations] taken even from the Hebrew, they adjure demons.

THERE ARE COMMEMORATED also, among the ancient authors of approved credit, the riddling Letters of Solomon to Hiram, king of the Tyrians, [2] and of Hiram to Solomon: concerning which Josephus, in the first volume against Apion, writes in this manner: HIRAM, king of the Tyrians, was a friend to our king Solomon; but it was chiefly the love of wisdom that had procured [their] friendship. For they used to send to each other problems to be solved; and in these Solomon was the better, and appeared the wiser. Even to this day there are kept among the Tyrians many letters, which they wrote to one another. And that I may not [seem to] feign concerning the letters of the Tyrians, I will bring forward as witness Dius, who is approved as most trustworthy in the histories of the Phoenicians. He, then, in the histories of the Phoenicians, writes thus: THEY say that king Solomon sent to king Hiram riddles, and demanded [some] from him — it being added that whosoever could not solve [them] should pay a sum of money to the one who did solve [them]: and that Hiram, having confessed that he could not solve the proposed questions, [3] was fined in much money; then, that a certain Abdemon, a Tyrian man, solved the proposed questions, and himself proposed others, which, if Solomon did not solve them, he should in turn confer much money on king Hiram. Thus Josephus; to whom Theophilus, sixth bishop of Antioch, in the third book to Autolycus, subscribes in well-nigh the same words.

THERE IS reported also another book of Solomon, inscribed WISDOM, [4] diverse from that which we have in the Canon: concerning which John Pico [della Mirandola], in the preface of his Heptaplus, left [it] thus written: THERE IS extant among the Hebrews a book of that Solomon surnamed the most wise, whose title is WISDOM — not that which is now in [our] hands, the work of Philo, but another, composed in the more secret tongue which they call the Jerusalem [tongue]; in which the man [Solomon], the interpreter of the nature of things (as is thought), confesses that he received all the doctrine of that book out of the inner recesses of the Mosaic law.

THERE IS also numbered, in the Decree of Gelasius the Pontiff, among the condemned writings, a certain book most falsely ascribed to Solomon, which is entitled THE LITTLE KEY of Solomon — [5] which we once saw carried about by certain impostors, containing a kind of prodigious and maleficent superstition.

LIKEWISE also another book, called THE CONTRADICTION OF SOLOMON, [6] is enumerated in the same Decree of Gelasius, which it has not yet befallen me to see.

Cecco d'Ascoli [Ciccus Asculanus] often alleges, in [his] commentaries on the Sphere, a certain book of Solomon On the Shadows of the Ideas, [7] in which, under [that] name, the appellations, significations, and definitions of the axes of the poles, of the circles, and of the other parts of the Astronomical Sphere, are transferred to the explaining of the mysteries of magical impiety.

THE SAMARITAN PENTATEUCH, which of old was in use among the Samaritans, contained the five books of Moses written in the Hebrew tongue, but with letter-shapes and points plainly diverse [8] from these characters which the Jews now use — [characters] found out by Esdras after the taking of Jerusalem; although, before its destruction, the characters of the Samaritans and of the Hebrews (as Jerome testifies in the preface of Kings) were the same. Jerome frequently makes mention of this Pentateuch, [9] admonishing that some [things] out of it have crept into our Vulgate edition: such as that [reading] in the book of Genesis, [10] LET US GO FORTH ABROAD — which is not had in the Hebrew.

[→ …the Seventy translated it βιβλίον] δικαιώματος τῆς βασιλείας, that is, the Book of the justification, or of the Jewish kingdom, or of the Law of the kingdom: [1] in which the Prophet, after he had appointed Saul the first king of the Hebrews, wrote the institution of the royal polity, and certain laws by which the helm of the kingdom should be handled with such moderation that neither should the King exercise tyranny over the people, nor the people, out of their own caprice, despise the commands of the King. And he laid up the volume, [placing] it in the Ark of the covenant, for the perpetual instruction of the kingdom. Mention is made of this book in the first volume of Kings, chapter ten, in these words: [2] AND Samuel spoke to the people the law of the Kingdom, and wrote it in a book, and laid it up before the Lord. He wrote also [3] concerning the earlier deeds of David of Jerusalem one book, of which, at the end of the former book of Paralipomenon, it is thus read: [4] NOW the acts of David the king, the first and the last, are written in the book of Samuel the Seer, and in the book of Nathan the Prophet, and in the volume of Gad the Seer. This book Rabbi Moses Kimhi says to be the former part of the volume which by us is [reckoned] under the name of the First [book] of Kings, but by the Hebrews is reckoned, under the title of Samuel, among the scriptures of the old testament; and he asserts the same Samuel to have been the writer of the book of Judges and of Ruth.

SHEMAIAH THE NEHELAMITE — שמעיה הנחלמי Shemaiah ha-Nehelami, or Semeias the Nehelamite — a false prophet, [5] and sent by his own [authority], unbidden of God (being of the number of those who were led away into Babylon together with the impious king Joakim), wrote — as though in the name of God — to Sophonias [Zephaniah] the Pontiff, and to the whole senate and people of Jerusalem, an accusatory book against Jeremiah the Prophet, [6] charging him that (seized by a raving and malignant spirit) he had filled the whole multitude of the transmigrants [exiles] with despair, by a letter sent to them, in which he had foretold, as [it were] out of the words of God, that their captivity in Babylon would be long. And accordingly he urgently demanded that [Jeremiah] be cast into prison, and be punished after the manner of the forefathers. But this lying Shemaiah died not long after, a captive in Babylon together with his whole family — God so willing it, who had announced this very punishment to him, for the office of prophecy rashly usurped, through the mouth of Jeremiah the Prophet.

SHEMAIAH — שמעיה Shemaiah, or Semeias — a most holy prophet of the Lord, a Jew by race, [7] who, going to Rehoboam king of Judah at Jerusalem in the fifth year of his reign, foretold to him by the command of God the plundering of the temple and of the city — soon to be done — by Shishak [Sesac], king of Egypt; [and] published concerning the life and deeds of Rehoboam king of Judah one book, of which, in the second volume of the sacred annals, chapter 12, it is thus written: [8] NOW the works of Rehoboam, the first and the last, are written in the books of Shemaiah the Prophet, and of Addo [Iddo] the Seer, and diligently expounded.

Under the name of THE SCRIBES, which is so often inculcated in the Gospel, [9] some think there is signified a kind of men to whom alone, among the Jews, there was the power of writing out the sacred books of the divine law, lest they should be depraved by being written according to the caprice and pleasure of anyone. For Augustine also, in the first book On the Lord's sermon on the mount, relates [10] that it was lawful for none among the Hebrews to write the sacred letters, except for the Scribes alone, because they professed a wisdom more excellent than the rest. There are [those] who hand down that the Scribes were the chief men, and of the highest authority, and most wise, whose office it was that — as of old among the Romans, in doubtful matters, answers were sought out of the volumes of the Sibyls through the haruspices — so these, [being] consulted concerning hard and perplexed matters, should answer out of the sacred books and the oracles of the prophets: [11] whom Matthew reports that Herod also consulted, at the coming of the Magi, concerning the birth of the Messiah. [12] Epiphanius, in the first book of the Panarion, relates that they were expositors of the divine scripture, [13] and thence obtained the name of Scribes; and that they were wont to interpret the scriptures according to four expositions: [14] of which the first was called [that] of Moses the Prophet; the second, of Achiba [Akiba]; the third, of Ammani, or Ida; the fourth, of the sons of Asamonaeus [the Hasmonaeans].

SENNACHERIB, or Sancherib, king of the Assyrians, [15] when he had besieged Hezekiah, king of the Jews, within the walls of the city of Jerusalem with a most powerful army, sent to him a letter, in which he called him a fool, because — relying on the empty hope of his God — he thought that he could escape the servitude of him [Sennacherib] who had utterly subdued so many nations; and he threatened destruction to all, unless of their own accord, the gates being thrown open, they should receive the army into the city. This letter, having read [it] secretly, Hezekiah went up into the temple, and, spreading it out before the Lord, commended his own safety and that of the City to Him with many supplications. To be observed [16] in this place is the prudence of the king, who read the blasphemies of the letters to no one, lest he should diminish the faith in the divine promises among his [people], dismayed by fear; but laid [them] open to God alone, whom he knew to be the protector of the people. With the same counsel the same King asked, through his ambassadors, Rabshakeh, the leader of the Syrian army, that he would not speak in the Jewish [tongue], fearing lest he should stir up a tumult of the people by his speech: for the people, hearing Rabshakeh purposely upbraiding the King (because he had destroyed the high places and altars which the forefathers had erected in honor of God), might in a little moment waver. But when Rabshakeh, understanding well enough what Hezekiah feared, went on to speak in Hebrew with an even greater voice and much more vehemently, it was commanded that no one should answer. By which example we are admonished [17] that the books, writings, sermons, and colloquies of heretics are not to be heard; [18] and that if we be compelled to hear their blasphemies even with unwilling ears, we ought not to give them an answer, nor to dispute with them. For they are swine and dogs, before whom pearls ought not to be cast; and this is against those who say that all books are to be read indiscriminately, boasting that [saying] of Paul, [19] PROVE all things: hold fast that which is good; and likewise that saying of Dionysius of Alexandria, out of the sixth [book] of the ecclesiastical history, and of Jerome in the epistle to Minervius and Alexander: to whom we have abundantly answered in the sixth book, in the censures on the first epistle to the Corinthians, chapter fifteen.

SETH, the son of Adam — seven books. These (as Epiphanius attests in the first [book] of the Panarion) the Gnostic heretics — [those] who were called Sethians, and [those] Archontici — fashioned under the name of that Seth, [20] adding to them also seven other books, which they call [21] AL-

But they took, as I judge, the occasion of this fabrication from that which Josephus relates in the first book of the Antiquities — namely, that the sons of Seth devised [1] the sidereal science for the knowledge of celestial things; and, since they knew that Adam had foretold two universal destructions of things (the one by fire, the other by flood), fearing lest their inventions should perish before they were thoroughly known, they raised up two pillars, and inscribed their inventions on each; that, if it should befall the brick [pillar] to be destroyed by the flood, the stone one, surviving, [2] might afford to men the means of learning [them]. And that [pillar] which had been built of stone, Josephus relates to have existed, in his own times, still in Asia.

The author of the Unfinished Work on Matthew, expounding that [saying] of Matthew, chapter 2, [3] WE HAVE SEEN his star in the East, makes mention of a certain writing of Seth concerning the star to appear at the rising [birth] of the Messiah, in these words: I HAVE HEARD certain [men] relating concerning a certain writing — though not certain, yet not destroying faith, but rather delighting [it] — [namely] that there was a certain nation situated in the very beginning of the East, beside the Ocean, among whom there was carried about a certain writing, inscribed with the name of Seth, concerning this star that was to appear, and the gifts of this kind to be offered to Christ; which [writing] was held handed down through the generations of studious men, the fathers relating [it] to their sons, &c.

THE ORACLES OF THE SIBYLS. Paul the Apostle (as Clement, in the sixth book of the Stromata, is witness) exhorts his [people] to the reading of the Sibylline volumes, [4] saying thus in a certain recondite writing: TAKE the Greek books, and acknowledge the Sibyls, how they signify one God, and the [things] that are to come; and you shall find in them the Son of God more clearly and more openly written. Incited by this exhortation of Paul (whatever it be), I have received certain [things] concerning the names, the fatherland, and the writings of the Sibyls from various authors, especially Christian, which I shall here insert. The Sibyls were all women, prophetesses full of God, [5] flourishing in perpetual virginity, foreknowers and interpreters of future things — so named by the ancients because they announced the counsels of the gods: for βίος [signifies] god [θεόν], and βουλήν [signifies] counsel, in the Aeolic kind of speech. And whereas they brought forth oracles of future [things] in diverse kinds of verse, they foretold also many [things] concerning our Savior Christ, and the redemption of the human race, and committed [them] also to letters with such certainty and clarity of foreknowledge, [6] that they seem to have written past [events] rather than future. These — according to the opinion of M. Varro, who in the books of divine matters, to C. Caesar the Pontifex Maximus, discoursed copiously concerning the Sibyls — Lactantius (in the first book against the gentiles) and Jerome (in the first [book] against Jovinian) report to have been ten [7] in number; whose surnames from [their] fatherland are these: [8] the Cumaean, the Cumanan, the Persian, the Hellespontic, the Libyan, the Samian, the Delphic, the Phrygian, the Tiburtine, the Erythraean. But the [things] which I have gathered concerning each separately, according to the order of the mysteries of human salvation foretold by them, here follow.

THE CUMAEAN SIBYL took [her] surname from Cumae, a city in Campania of Italy, [9] in which she published oracles. Of her, among the heathen, Naevius (in the books of the Punic War) and Piso (in the annals) make mention; among ours, Lactantius (in the book cited a little before), and Justin Martyr in the Hortatory Address to the Gentiles — in which [work], speaking of this Sibyl's race, fatherland, and oracles, he thus addresses the nations: THAT you may in part learn the worship of God, it will easily be furnished to you from the ancient Cumaean Sibyl, [10] teaching you by some inspiration through oracles, which forsooth seem very near to the doctrine of the prophets. And they assert that she set out from Babylon, and was the daughter of that Berosus who wrote the Chaldaic history: who, when she had withdrawn into a certain part of Campania, there prophesied in the city named Cumae, which is six thousand paces distant from Baiae — in which place warm baths are frequented. We ourselves saw, when we had been in the city, the place where a very great basilica had been built, [11] a work of one polished stone, exceedingly great and worthy of all admiration: there they affirm that she poured forth oracles — [they] who received these [things] from their forefathers as [it were their] native tradition. And they showed us, in the midst of the basilica, three vessels made of the same stone, in which, [being] filled with water, she was washed; and, having received [her] robe, she would proceed into the innermost part of the same Basilica, built of the same polished stone: in the middle whereof she would ascend a lofty tribunal and throne, and thence render oracles. And of this Sibyl, as a soothsayer, both many others, and especially Plato, make mention in the Phaedo: [12] who seems to me, when he had lighted upon her oracles, to have esteemed soothsayers [to be] divine — inasmuch as he had seen those [things] fulfilled which she had long before foretold. Wherefore, in the dialogue which is entitled MENO, admiring the singers of the oracles, he praised them in these words: RIGHTLY, then, may we call those, whom we now name soothsayers, divine. [13] For not in vain do we call these divine, and inspired by a divine power, and possessed by God — since they truly foretell both great and many [things], [while yet] ignorant of the [things] which they utter. Clearly and manifestly he looked to the oracles of the Sibyl: for she had not, as poets do, the power of correcting and polishing, with metrical diligence, what she had written; but she published [them] at the time of the afflatus, in which they looked to the prediction; and this [afflatus] ceasing, the memory of them likewise ceased. And this was the cause why the measure of the Sibylline verses was not kept. For we ourselves, while we were at Cumae, learned this very thing from those who had recounted these [things], and who also showed [us] where she had prophesied, and a little vessel likewise made of bronze, where her relics were kept. [14] And among many other [things] they related this — which they had heard from their forefathers — that those who received the oracles, being for the most part unlearned, deviated in many places from the reckoning of the meter; and this cause they assign, why many of her verses lack the due measure: [15] namely, both because the Sibyl, [once] destitute of the afflatus itself, did not remember what she had before poured forth, and because the notaries, through unskillfulness and rudeness, fell away from the reckoning of the meter. Therefore, O gentile men, assent to this old and most ancient Sibyl, whose volumes it befalls to be kept in the whole world, [and] who, inspired from on high, will instruct you by oracles that those who are called [gods] are not gods. And concerning the coming of our Savior Jesus Christ, and concerning all those [things] which He was to do, she manifestly declares — the knowledge of which, [being] in some sort necessary for you, she fore-exer-

Of whom Augustine makes mention, oracle by oracle, in the begun exposition of the epistle to the Romans, in these words: [1] THERE WERE prophets also among the gentiles, in whom likewise some things are found which they sang concerning Christ — as is also said concerning the Sibyl; which I would not easily believe, but that a certain [poet], the most noble in the Roman tongue, before he uttered those [things] concerning the renewal of the age which seem well enough to accord and agree with the kingdom of our Lord, set before [them] the verse, saying: NOW is come the last age of the Cumaean song. And that the Cumaean song is Sibylline, no one will doubt. Thus Augustine. Before whom Eusebius, in the fourth book On the life of Constantine, [2] expounded that same verse of Virgil in the same manner. There is extant, in the collectanea of Stratonicus, bishop of Cumae [3] (out of which we have gathered well-nigh all the oracles subjoined), the Greek verses of this Sibyl concerning the highest tranquillity of the times [that was to be] at the coming of Christ — not wholly unlike those which Maro [Virgil] translated out of the Cumaean oracles, but most like to those which Isaiah prophesied concerning the peace-bringing coming of the Messiah. And they are these:

ὅταν ἀπ′ οὐρανοῦ θεὸς πέμψῃ βασιλῆα, τῷ γὰρ παγγενέτειρα βροτοῖς δώσει τὸν ἄριστον καρπὸν ἀπόδρεψιν, σῖτον, οἶνον, ἐλαίου· αὐτὰρ ἀπ′ οὐρανόθεν μέλιτος γλυκεροῦ πότον ἡδὺν νάματα, καὶ ῥήξει γλυκερὰ λευκοῖο γάλακτος.
πλήρεις δ′ ἔσονται πόλεις ἀγαθῶν, καὶ πίονες ἀγροί· ἔσσοντ′ οὐδὲ μάχαιρα κατὰ χθονὸς, οὐδὲ κυδοιμός· ἀλλ′ ἅμιν εἰράνη μεγάλη κατὰ γαῖαν ἅπασαν.
ἐν δὲ λύκοι τε καὶ ἄρνες ἐν οὔρεσιν ἄμμιξ ἔδονται χόρτον, παρδάλεις τ′ ἐρίφοις ἅμα βοσκήσονται· ἄρκτοι σὺν μόσχοις νομάδες ἀλισθήσονται, σαρκοβόρος τε λέων ἄχυρον φάγετ′ ὡς βοῦς· καὶ βρετέεσσι δράκοντες ἅμα σφίσι κοιμήσονται· καὶ οὐκ ἀδικήσουσιν, χεὶρ γὰρ κυρίου ἔσετ′ ἐπ′ αὐτούς.

which may be rendered thus:

When God shall send down a king from high Olympus,
Then shall the all-bearing earth render to sick mortals
Inexhaustible fruits of corn, of wine, and of oil;
Then shall the sweet cups of heaven pour forth honey,
And streams pleasant with snowy milk shall burst forth;
The towns shall be full of good things, and the rich fields shall flourish:
Nor shall the earth fear swords, nor the tumults of war:
But high peace shall flower in all lands:
And the lambs with the wolves shall crop the grass upon the mountains;
And the leopards, mingled together, shall feed with the kids;
The bears shall dwell with the calves, following the herds;
And the carnivorous lion shall eat at the manger, like the ox;
With children shall the serpents take [their] sleep by night,
Nor shall they harm [them]: for the hand of the Lord shall cover them.

AMMIANUS Marcellinus, in his history, relates that the Sibylline verses were given to the flames [4] by the Emperor Julian the Apostate, at the city of Aenus.

THE CUMANA SIBYL — born and brought up at Cumae, which is a city of the province of Ionia — is named Amalthea, and Erophile, and Demophile. [5] She is said to have written many books of divinations; concerning which Lactantius, on the testimony of Varro, relates that she brought nine [books] to king Tarquinius Priscus, and demanded for them three hundred Philippei [gold pieces]; and that the king, scorning the greatness of the price, mocked the madness of the woman; but she, in the king's sight, burned three, and demanded the same price for the rest — [so that] Tarquin thought the woman much more mad. She, three others being again burned, when she persisted in the same price, [it is said] that the king was moved, and bought the remaining [three] for three hundred gold pieces. Solinus said that her sepulchre is to be seen in Sicily. There is reported [to be] a Greek prophecy of hers concerning the incarnation of the Son of God, and His most holy name, in these words:

Δὴ τότε καὶ μεγάλοιο θεοῦ παῖς ἀνθρώποισι ἥξει σαρκοφόρος θνητοῖς ὁμοιούμενος ἐν γῇ.
τέσσαρα φωνήεντα φέρει, τὰ δ' ἄφωνα ἐν αὐτῷ δισσῶν ἀγγέλων· ἀριθμοῦ δ' ὅλον ἐξονομήνω· ὀκτὼ γὰρ μονάδας, τόσας δεκάδας ἐπὶ τούτοις, ἠδὲ ἑκατοντάδας ὀκτὼ, ἀπιστοτέροις ἀνθρώποις οὔνομα δηλώσει· σὺ δ' ἐνὶ φρεσὶ σῇ συννόησον.

that is,

Then shall come to mortals, upon the very mortals
On earth, [one] born like [them], of the almighty Father, Clothed in a body: four vowels
He bears, and two consonants of double kind;
But I will teach what is the whole sum of the number.
For eight units, and as many tens upon these,
And eight hundreds, shall the name declare
To faithless men: but do thou hold [it] in mind. [6] [7]

The reckoning of the letters of the name of Jesus, gathered by the Sibyl in these verses, Bede more clearly explains in the first book of the commentaries on Luke — the number seventy being added, which is lacking in the Sibylline verse. Now he speaks in this manner: OF THIS most sacred name IESUS, not only the etymology, but the very number also which is comprehended in [its] letters, breathes forth the perpetual mysteries of our salvation. For with six letters, among the Greeks, it was written ΙΗΣΟΥΣ — namely Ι, and Η, and Σ, and Ο, and Υ, and Σ — whose numbers are 10, and 8, and 200, and 70, and 400, and 200, which together make 888; which number indeed rejoices in the figure of the resurrection. For the eighth number, in the sacred letters, befits the glory of the resurrection: because the Lord rose on the eighth day (that is, after the seventh, [the day] of the Sabbath); and we ourselves, after the six ages of this world, and the seventh — the sabbath of souls, which now meanwhile is passed in another life — shall rise, as it were, at the eighth time.

THE PERSIAN SIBYL was from Persia: [8] of whom (on the testimony of Lactantius) Nicanor, who wrote the deeds of Alexander the Great, made mention. There is had of hers, concerning the preaching and baptism of the forerunner of Christ [John the Baptist], an oracle of this kind:

ἀλλ' ὁπόταν φωνή τ' ἐρημαίης διὰ χώρης ἥξει, ἀπαγγέλλουσα βροτοῖς, καὶ πᾶσι βοήσει εὐθείας ἀτραποὺς ποιήσειν, ἠδ′ ἀπορῖψαι ἐκ κραδίης κακίας, καὶ ὕδασι φωτίζεσθε.

that is,

Then also a certain voice shall come through the deserts of the places,

A messenger, whereby it may cry to all wretched mortals

That they make straight the paths, and purge [their] souls

From vices, and cleanse [their] bodies with pure waters.

(Rich PDF p. 127 — printed folio 110, verso. The SIBYLS continued, each with a Greek oracle + Latin verse: Hellespontic (Christ fulfilling the Law), Libyan (the healings), Samian (the entry into Jerusalem on the ass), Delphic (the buffets and gall of the Passion), Phrygian (the darkness and rent veil), Tiburtine (the resurrection and ascension). Then the Erythraean Sibyl — Clement, Apollodorus, the ~1000 verses brought to Rome, and the famous acrostic ΙΗΣΟΥΣ ΧΡΕΙΣΤΟΣ ΘΕΟΥ ΥΙΟΣ ΣΩΤΗΡ (the Last-Judgment poem cited by Constantine and Augustine), which begins here. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

THE HELLESPONTIC SIBYL, born in the Trojan territory, [1] in the village of Marmissa near the town Gergitium — whom Heraclides Ponticus writes to have been in the times of Cyrus — among many other oracles left this divination concerning the doctrine of Christ:

αὐτὸς πληρώσει δὲ θεοῦ νόμον, οὐ καταλύσει ἀντίτυπον μίμημα φέρων, καὶ πάντα διδάξει.

that is,

He shall fulfill the Law of God, [and] not violate [it], Bearing a most-like image [of the Father], and shall teach all things.

THE LIBYAN SIBYL, [2] whom Euripides recalls in the prologue of the Lamia, brought forth this prophecy of the miracles of Christ:

καὶ τότε δὴ νοσεροὺς ἰήσεται, ἠδ′ ἐπιμώμους πάντας, ὅσοι τούτῳ πίστιν ἐνὶ ποιήσονται· βλέψουσιν δὲ τυφλοί, ἀτὰρ βαδίσουσί τε χωλοί, κωφοί τ′ εἰσαΐσουσι, λαλήσουσ′ οὐ λαλέοντες·

δαίμονας ἐξελάσει, νεκρῶν δ′ ἐπανάστασιν ἔξει.

that is,

He indeed shall heal those pressed by diseases, and all

The hurt, as many as put their trust in him; and the blind shall see:

The lame shall walk: to the deaf it shall be granted to hear:

To the dumb it shall be given to form unwonted speech:

He shall drive out demons: those oppressed by death shall rise again.

THE SAMIAN SIBYL — of whom Eratosthenes writes that he found the memory in the ancient annals of the Samians — was called by the name Pitho; [3] in whose verses there is had this oracle concerning Christ entering into Jerusalem, mounted on an ass:

χαῖρε ἁγνὴ θύγατερ Σιών, καὶ πολλὰ παθοῦσα· αὐτός σου βασιλεὺς ἐπιβὰς ἐπὶ πῶλον εἰσάγει, πρᾷος πᾶσι φανείς, ἵνα ζυγὸν ὅνπερ ὑπῆμεν, ξύλον δυσβάστακτον ἐπ' αὐχένι κάμνον, ἄρῃ.

that is,

Hail, chaste daughter Sion, and maiden that hast suffered much:
Behold, thy own King enters to thee, mounted on an ass,
Gentle in the sight of all, that he may take from thee the yokes, Insufferable to thee, which thou bearest with subdued neck.

THE DELPHIC SIBYL — of whom Chrysippus speaks in the book which he composed On Divination — is thought to have been born at Delphi, by name Anthemis, [4] and lived before the destruction of Troy; several of whose verses some have believed Homer to have inserted into his own work. There is extant her prophecy concerning the Passion of Christ, in this manner:

καὶ τότε δὴ κολάφους καὶ πτύσματα φαρμακόεντα, Ἰσραὴλ δώσει μυσαροῖς ἐνὶ χείλεσι τούτῳ·
εἰς δὲ τὸ βρῶμα χολήν, καὶ εἰς πότον ὄξος ἄκρατον.

that is,

Israel shall dash upon him buffets, and wicked spittings
With [their] defiled lips; and shall set before [him]
Food of gall, and for drink harsh vinegar.

THE PHRYGIAN SIBYL, who prophesied at Ancyra, [5] sang the death of Christ in these verses:

ναοῦ σχισθῇ τὸ καταπέτασμα, καὶ ἤματι μέσῳ νὺξ ἔσται σκοτόεσσα πελώριος ἐν τρισὶν ὥραις· καὶ θανάτου μοῖραν τελέσει τρίτον ἦμαρ ὑπνώσας.

that is,

The veil of the temple shall be rent, and in the midst of the day
A dark, wondrous night shall press [the world] for three hours; and, having slept a three-day sleep, he shall accomplish the lot of death.

THE TIBURTINE SIBYL, from Tibur, an Italian city, by name Albunea [6] — whom the Tiburtines of old worshipped as a goddess by the banks of the river Anio, in whose eddies they had found her image, holding a book in [her] hand — foretold the resurrection and assumption of Christ in this manner:

αὐτὰρ ἐπὴν ἔλθῃ τρισὶν ἤμασιν ἐς φάος αὖθις, καὶ δείξει θνητοῖσιν ὕπνον, καὶ πάντα διδάξει, ἐν νεφέλαις ἐπιβὰς, εἰς οὐρανοῦ οἶκον ὁδεύσῃ.

that is,

But after he shall have come again to the light on the third day, and shown to mortals [the meaning of his] sleep, and taught all things, mounted upon the clouds he shall journey to the house of heaven.

THE ERYTHRAEAN SIBYL, whom blessed Clement, the first Pope, recalls in the epistle to the Corinthians, [7] was from Erythrae, a city of Ionia. Apollodorus the Erythraean affirms that she was his fellow-citizen, and that she prophesied to the Greeks, [as they were] making for Ilium, that Troy would be [besieged and] would perish, and that Homer would write lies. Fenestella, a most diligent author, writes that C. Curio the Consul, when the Capitol was restored, referred [a motion] to the senate, that legates should be sent to seek out and carry to Rome the verses of this Sibyl; and that accordingly P. Gabinius, M. Octacilius, [and] L. Valerius were sent, who carried to Rome about a thousand [8] verses copied out from private persons. Constantine the Great Augustus, in the oration which Eusebius appended to the books On the life of Constantine published by him, recites an oracle of this Sibyl concerning the coming of Christ to the Judgment, [9] composed in acrostic verses in such wise that in the initial letters of the verses these words may be read: ΙΗΣΟΥΣ ΧΡΕΙΣΤΟΣ ΘΕΟΥ ΥΙΟΣ ΣΩΤΗΡ — that is, JESUS CHRIST, THE SON OF GOD, THE SAVIOR. [10] And the same Emperor asserts that M. T. Cicero, when he had lighted upon this Sibylline acrostic, moved by the artifice of the poem, [11] rendered it into Latin for Latin ears, and reckoned it among his other lucubrations. Augustine, in the eighteenth book On the City of God, chapter 23, affirms [12] that he himself read the same acrostic in a Greek codex of the Erythraean Sibyl, which Flaccianus, proconsul of Africa, showed to him. Now the Greek verses are twenty-seven, namely:

ΙΔΡΩΣΕΙ δὲ χθὼν κρίσεως σημεῖον ὅτ′ ἔσται,

Ηξει δ′ οὐρανόθεν βασιλεὺς αἰῶσιν ὁ μέλλων,

Σάρκα παρὼν πᾶσαν κρῖναι καὶ κόσμον ἅπαντα,

Ὄψονται δὲ θεὸν μέροπες πιστοὶ καὶ ἄπιστοι,

Ὕψιστον μετὰ τῶν ἁγίων ἐπὶ τέρμα χρόνοιο,

Σαρκοφόρων ἀνθρώπων ψυχὰς βήματι κρίνων.

Ῥίψουσιν δ′ εἴδωλα βροτοὶ, καὶ πάντα*:*

Ἐκκαύσει δὲ τὸ πῦρ γῆν, οὐρανὸν, ἠδὲ θάλασσαν

Ἰχνεῦον· φλέξει δὲ πύλας εἱρκτῆς ἀΐδαο·

Σάρξ τότε πᾶσα βροτῶν ἐπελευθέριον φάος ἥξει

Τῶν ἁγίων· ἀνόμους δὲ τὸ πῦρ αἰῶσιν ἐλέγξει.

Ὁππόσα τις πράξας ἔλαθεν, τότε πάντα λαλήσει which may be rendered (the initials of the verses spelling Jesus Christ [Son] of God, Savior):

The earth shall sweat, when the sign of judgment shall be;

A king shall come from heaven, [he] who is to be unto the ages,

Present to judge all flesh and the whole world.

And mortals shall see God — the faithful and the faithless —

The Most High, with the saints, at the end of time,

Judging at [his] tribunal the souls of flesh-bearing men.

When at length the whole world shall [lie] waste and [full of] thorns,

Mortals shall cast away [their] idols and all [their wealth]:

The fire, searching [them] out, shall burn up earth, heaven, and sea, and shall burn the gates of the prison of Hades:

Then shall all the flesh of [holy] mortals come to the free light

Of the saints; but the fire shall convict the lawless unto the ages.

Whatsoever anyone has done in secret, then shall he tell it all —

Which [verses], ill rendered in Augustine, may — the capital letters being again restored — be translated thus (the initials of the verses spelling IESVS CHRISTVS, DEI FILIVS, SERVATOR — Jesus Christ, Son of God, Savior):

In sign of Judgment the earth shall grow moist with sweat,

And the eternal King shall descend from the highest heaven,

Namely, that he may judge all flesh and the whole world:

Whence both the faithful and the faithless shall see God,

The Most High, sitting with the saints at the end of the age,

In bodily [form], to judge the souls of men. Then, of old,

The world shall bristle all over with dense thickets [of thorns];

Men shall cast away [their] idols and their stored-up treasures;

And fire shall burn up the lands, and heaven, and sea,

And shall burn the gates of the narrow prison of Orcus [Hell].

And all the flesh of the saints, restored to freedom, shall then

Seek again the light: [but] the flame shall ever torment the wicked;

And whatever anyone has sinned in secret, he shall tell it all,

And God shall lay open to the light the closed breasts [of hearts].

Teeth shall gnash, laments shall thicken on every side,

And the light shall fail; and darkness shall enwrap the sun

And the shining stars; then the Moon's splendor shall pass away.

The valleys shall be raised up, the steep ridges brought low;

And nothing lofty shall any more hinder mortals.

The long keel shall not cleave the deep; the very fields

Shall be leveled with the mountains; for the earth, scorched by lightning,

And the dry fountains and rivers together, shall gape [be dried];

And the trumpet shall sound with a mournful blast from the starry regions.

Mourning the crime of fools, and the sorrows of the world,

The earth, yawning open, shall disclose chaos and Tartarus;

And all kings shall be set before the throne of the deity;

And a wave, flowing from heaven, fiery, mingled with sulphur,

Shall mark all men with a most-notable sign. At that time

The wood [the Cross] — through the lovely token of faith,

[Christ's] fall set against the world, yet the life of the pious —

Shall cleanse, by [re]sprinkling, the slain from the twelvefold fountain.

There is reported, besides, a divinatory Epistle of hers to the Greeks [as they were] making for Ilium, translated into Latin, whose beginning is: YOU INQUIRE of me, O most illustrious throng of the Danaï.

Besides these, there are named many other Sibyls also — the Sardian, the Rhodian, the Sicilian, and very many more — whom Ambrose, in the commentaries on the first [epistle] to the Corinthians, judges to have been seized by an evil and wicked spirit. [1] But Aristotle, in the thirtieth section of the Problems, [2] declares that these same [women] — driven by the heat of black bile, kindled about the seat of the mind — were agitated. Cornelius Tacitus writes that Augustus, since in his times many vain [verses] were displayed under the name of the Sibyls, commanded that the verses be sought out at Samos, Erythrae, Ilium, [and] Africa, and through the Italian colonies, and brought within a set day to the prefect of the city; and that the judgment and censure of the fifteen men [quindecimviri] be applied; and that it should not be lawful to keep [them] privately [3] — which had already been provided for by the forefathers. These verses, after four hundred years, Stilicho, father-in-law of the emperor Honorius — being about to stir up a sedition against his son-in-law on such an occasion — took care [4] utterly to abolish. Which deed Rutilius Claudius did not pass over in silence, saying:

Not only did the traitor, ranging with Getic arms, ravage [Italy]; before [that], he burned the Sibylline oracles of aid.

Nevertheless, in recent years there have come forth out of Germany eight books of Sibylline verses, printed [5] in Greek and Latin, in which well-nigh all the oracles set down above are had. The beginning of the work is:

εἷς θεὸς μόνος, ὃς ἀρχὴ ὑπερμεγέθης ἀγένητος.

One God alone, who reigns, greatest, unbegotten.

Theophilus, sixth bishop of Antioch, in the second book to Autolycus, recites from an unnamed Sibyl [6] about eighty verses, some of which are extant in these books somewhat diverse, but others are not extant.

THE BOOK OF THE SEVEN SEALS John, in the Revelations, mystically described [7] in this manner: AND I saw in the right hand of him that sat upon the throne a book written within and without, sealed with seven seals; and I saw a strong angel, proclaiming with a loud voice: Who is worthy to open the book, and to loose the seals thereof? And no one was able, neither in heaven, nor on earth, nor under the earth, to open the book; and I wept much, because no one was found worthy to open the book, nor to look on it. And one of the elders said to me: Weep not: behold, the lion of the tribe of Judah, the root of David, has prevailed to open the book, and to loose the seven seals thereof. And I saw, and behold, in the midst of the throne, and of the four living creatures, and in the midst of the elders, a Lamb standing as it were slain, having seven horns and seven eyes, which are the seven spirits of God, sent into all the earth. And he came, and took the book from the right hand of him that sat on the throne; and when he had opened the book, the four living creatures and the four-and-twenty elders fell down before the Lamb, saying: Worthy art thou, O Lord, to take the book, and to open the seals thereof, &c. And this is John's vision Of the Book of the seven seals; in which — lest I detain the reader too long over its several words — I will briefly note six points only, [8] whereof the whole series of the vision consists: namely, What is the [one] sitting on the throne; what the four living creatures; what the four-and-twenty Elders; what the Lion, the same being the Lamb that opens the book; what the Book sealed with seals; [and] what the seven Seals.

1. THE [ONE] SITTING ON THE THRONE is God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, sitting on the throne of his kingdom, which is [9] the Church.

2. THE FOUR LIVING CREATURES not all authors expound in the same way. Origen and Gregory Nazianzen think [them] to be the four powers, or affections, of the rational soul: [10] namely, [that] Man is the power of reason, the Lion the irascible power, the Calf the concupiscible power, [and] the Eagle the conscience set over the rest — which by Paul [is called] the spirit [11] of man—

[→ …which by Paul is called the spirit] of man. AMBROSE, in the third book On virgins, says that the four [creatures] signify the moral virtues: [1] namely the Lion, Fortitude; the Calf, Justice; the Eagle, Temperance; the Man, Prudence. ARETHAS, bishop of Caesarea, [understands] four excellent divine virtues (whatever they are) which designate the power of God about the world, [that world being] constituted of four elements. THEODORET, four created virtues which God set over the four elements — out of which the universe subsists, and which preserve it. POLYCHRONIUS, four Angels set over the four parts of the world. JEROME, the four evangelists — of whom Matthew is designated by the Man, Mark by the Lion, Luke by the Calf, John by the Eagle. AUGUSTINE, [likewise] the four Evangelists, but by another reckoning [2] — that is, Matthew in the Lion, Mark in the Man, Luke in the Calf, John in the Eagle. ANDREAS, likewise bishop of Caesarea, [understands] the four Evangelists, but otherwise: the Lion, on account of [his] eminent fortitude above the rest, signifies John; the Calf, Luke; the Eagle, Mark; the Man, Matthew. CATINA the Syrian, in the exposition of the first vision of Ezekiel (where these four living creatures are placed), refers the Man to all Israel, the Lion to the royal scepter of the Jews, the Calf to the sacerdotal and levitical tribe, the Eagle to the vengeance and retribution of God upon Israel. RUPERT, Abbot of Deutz [Tuitiensis], expounds, by the four living creatures, the four chief mysteries of Christ [3] which a Christian may not be ignorant of — that is, the Incarnation, Passion, Resurrection, [and] Ascension. GALERIDUS understands all the prelates of the Church; for a prelate shows himself a Lion [4] in terribly correcting faults, an Ox in strenuously handling earthly [matters], a Man in kindly compassionating men, an Eagle in loftily soaring aloft and subtly contemplating divine [things]. LYRA [Nicholas of Lyra] adapts the four living creatures to the four patriarchal churches: [5] namely the Lion to Jerusalem, the Ox to Antioch, the Man to Alexandria, the Eagle to Constantinople. RABBI DAVID [Kimhi] thinks that the four Monarchies — of the Assyrians, Persians, Greeks, and Romans — are adumbrated [6] by the four living creatures seen by Ezekiel. RABBI SOLOMON [Rashi] hands down that four angels, set over the four monarchies, are signified by the four living creatures of Ezekiel. JUSTIN Martyr, in the book of Questions against the Gentiles, question 44, relates that the four living creatures shown to Ezekiel were but one living creature [7] endowed with a fourfold face — namely of a man, an ox, a lion, and an eagle — and that it designated the future change of the power of king Nebuchadnezzar: [8] whom Daniel narrates to have been thus, after the elation of his pride, humbled by God and in a manner transformed into a beast — so that his hairs grew like a lion's mane, his nails were curved like an eagle's talons, and he himself ate grass like an ox; and then, after [his] penance, a mild human heart and mind was restored to him by God. God also willed (as it seems to the same Martyr), by this vision, to raise up the captive people into the hope of recovering [their] liberty, showing to it the change of the Babylonian kingdom by the conjunction of a tame and a wild animal, and likewise of a heavy and a light [one] in one and the same creature. For a tame creature is the Man, a wild [one] the Lion; heavy, [yet] light and winged, is the Eagle. By these [figures], therefore, he showed that the kingdom was to be changed from the wild empire of Nebuchadnezzar into the mild empire of Cyrus; but by these [others], that the heaviness of captivity was to be turned into a light and unencumbered liberty. For the Ox bears the yoke, but the Eagle is free of the yoke. This same thing the wheel within the wheel announced: for of these [wheels], the one adumbrated the leading-away of the Jews into captivity, the other [their] leading-back into [their] homeland.

3. THE FOUR-AND-TWENTY ELDERS, according to Ambrose, are the twenty-four books of the old testament; [9] according to Augustine, the whole body [and] number of the prophets; according to Rupert, twelve earlier and [twelve] later Judges of the Church of God. The earlier [10] are they who, before the kingdom of the Hebrews, presided over the people of God — namely from Othniel to Samuel. But the later Judges, who presided after Christ, [11] are the twelve Apostles. According to Galeridus they are the twenty-four patriarchs of the church — namely twelve of the old church (that is, the twelve sons of Jacob), [12] and the twelve Apostles, patriarchs of the new Church of Christ. [13] According to Lyra, [they are] all bishops and Pastors of particular churches; according to Ambrose, all the Doctors of the Church.

4. THE LION, THE SAME BEING ALSO THE LAMB (as it were slain, having seven horns and seven eyes), is Christ: [14] who, as in his Passion he was a lamb dumb before the shearer, and opened not his mouth, so — that same Passion being consummated — soon, like a lion's whelp (which Jacob foreshowed in his son [Judah]), ascending to the prey, he spoiled hell; and, resting and reclining in the sepulchre like a Lion, he ground down even death itself with a great roar. Now he has seven eyes and seven horns — that is, all the fullness of the illuminating and strengthening Spirit; for the eyes signify light, the horn strength; [15] and he is as it were slain, because — although after his resurrection from the dead he lives forever, no more to die — yet he keeps the signs of his death [16] (that is, the places of the nails in [his] hands and feet, and the place of the lance in [his] side) for the everlasting memory of our redemption.

5. THE BOOK WRITTEN WITHIN AND WITHOUT is (as Arethas says) the incomprehensible memory of God, which both the prophet David and Moses foresignified — the one, when he said, [17] In your book all shall be written; the other, when he says, [18] Either forgive them this trespass, or, if you do not, blot me out of your book which you have written. Moreover, that it is written within and without [means] this: that those, forsooth, are said to be written within, who are of Jerusalem, as it were worshippers of God; but without — that is, on the back and on the worse [inferior] side — those who are of the gentiles. THOMAS [Aquinas] says: the book is the divine knowledge, or the knowledge of God concerning the [things] which God has disposed to do; whence also it is placed in the right hand, because by the right hand we work. It is written within, as regards the knowledge of God, to whom the whole book is fully known; without, inasmuch as the disposition of the divine order, to be fulfilled at the appointed time, is revealed to men. AUGUSTINE [says]: the Book is all the divine—

[→ …the Book is all the] divine scripture, digested into two Testaments. Written within, in the old testament, in which the obscure mysteries of our redemption are contained; [1] without, in the new, openly explained — or, Without, according to the historical understanding, [and] Within, according to the mystical and spiritual sense.

6. THE SEVEN SEALS, as Augustine attests, signify the most obscure fullness of the mysteries lying hidden in the divine scripture; for the number seven, in the scriptures, denotes the last completion [2] of that thing whereof we speak. Arethas says the seven Seals demonstrate the varieties of days and successions of times which befall in this transitory world, whose articles and moments no one, save God alone, can exactly know. Or, as Augustine again — writing to Maximinus — says, the seven seals are the seven gifts of the Holy Spirit, of which it is read in Isaiah, chapter 11: [3] THE spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him: the spirit of wisdom and of understanding, the spirit of counsel and of fortitude, the spirit of knowledge and of piety; and shall fill him with the spirit of fear. THOMAS [Aquinas] says the septenary number of the seals is the enclosure of the divine knowledge, shutting up in itself seven secrets pertaining to the state of the Church, which are opened to John; and they are these. The first is of the white horse, which signifies the company of preachers [4] coursing about in the primitive church. The second is of the red horse, which portends the persecution of tyrants. [5] The third, of the black horse, which is a type of the heretics. [6] The fourth, of the pale horse, in which is shown the multitude of false brethren [7] and hypocrites. The fifth, of the souls of the martyrs resting under the altar of God — which designates the consolation to be present to the elect in tribulation. The sixth, of the darkening of the Moon, which figures the persecution of Antichrist. The seventh, of the silence of half an hour, which hints at the peace of the church after the death of Antichrist — but [a peace] to last a little while. PRIMASIUS says the seven seals are the seven wholesome modes [8] of the sacred utterances of the divine scripture — that is: the Indicative, as in Micah, [9] I will show you what is good; the Pronunciative, as in Isaiah, [10] I am the first and I am the last, and beside me there is no God; the Imperative, as in the same prophet, [11] Cry, cease not; the Optative, as again in Isaiah, [12] Would that you had attended to my commandments; the Conjunctive, as in Jeremiah, [13] If you will not hear my voice; the Infinitive, as in the same [prophet], [14] To know and understand me, that I am the Lord; the Impersonal, as in the Psalm, [15] Who shall declare the powers of the Lord? THEODORUS says the seven seals signify the seven regular forms of sacred understanding. [16] The first is the text of the history. The second, allegory. The third, the commixture of both, of history as well as of allegory. The fourth is of the immutable essence of the divine Trinity — [showing] when it is insinuated into the sacred oracles properly, [and] when tropically. The fifth is of parables, in which, while one thing is said, another is spiritually signified. The sixth is of the twofold coming of the Savior — lest the first be understood for the second, or the second for the first. The seventh is of the twin precepts, both of the life to be led and of [the life] to be signified. GREGORY says the seven seals are the seven mysteries of human redemption — [17] namely the Incarnation, the Nativity, the Passion, the Descent to hell, the Resurrection, the Ascension, [and] the Coming to judgment. ISIDORE says the seven seals are the seven modes of speaking in the scriptures: [18] that is, the Historical, Tropical, Allegorical, Anagogical, Figurative, Absolute, [and] Parabolic. RUPERT asserts that they are the seven spirits by which the divine scripture was inspired. LYRA says the seven seals are the seven states of the Church [19] from the ascension of Christ to the judgment. The first state, shown by the white horse, signifies the time under the Emperor Caius. The second, by the red horse, the persecution of Nero. The third, by the black horse, the times of Vespasian and Titus. The fourth, in the pale horse, the persecution of Domitian. The fifth, the persecution under Trajan even to Diocletian. The sixth, the state of the church under Diocletian. The seventh, the battles of the Church against heretics — which times follow [those] of Constantine.

THE SEALED BOOK, in Hebrew ספר החתום Sepher hachatum, signifies the volume of the whole divine scripture, whose understanding is sealed up to the unbelieving and to those lacking the spirit of God, and altogether hidden — the prophet saying, [20] UNLESS YOU BELIEVE, YOU SHALL NOT UNDERSTAND. Of which book Isaiah, speaking to the Jews (to be blinded in future ages), says: [21] THE Lord has mingled for you a spirit of deep sleep; he shall shut your eyes — the prophets and your princes, who see visions, shall he cover. And the vision of all shall be to you as the words of a sealed Book, which, when they shall give it to one that knows letters, he shall say, Read this; and he shall answer, I cannot, for it is sealed. And the book shall be given to one that knows not letters, and it shall be said to him, Read; and he shall answer, I know not letters. By which words Isaiah foretold that the prophetic visions, and the whole divine scripture, would be closed to the Jews [22] on account of their perfidy and ingratitude, and that they would be utterly blinded, so that reading they should not understand what they read. Whence Paul rightly says of them, to the Corinthians: [23] EVEN unto this present day the selfsame veil, in the reading of the old Testament, remains unrevealed (which is made void in Christ); but even to this present day, when Moses is read, the veil is laid upon their heart: but when they shall be converted to God, the veil shall be taken away. For no one is able — as John says — neither in heaven, nor on earth, nor under the earth, [24] by the powers of his own wit, to cut away the veil of this book, which by its own nature is sealed, and shut up with the seals of inaccessible mysteries; nor can anyone open the book except that seven-horned and seven-eyed Lamb [25] — to whom the four living creatures and the four-and-twenty elders, falling down, acclaim: WORTHY art thou, O Lord, to take the book, and to open the seals thereof, because thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God in thy blood. This Lamb is Christ, who, after his resurrection (as Luke says), [26] opened to his disciples the sense, that they might understand the scriptures, and through them unlocked the understanding of them to the holy and catholic Doctors. Now God willed his scriptures (as Augustine says) to be sealed and closed chiefly for three causes: [27] first, to avoid loathing [contempt]. For such is the condition of men, that things by their own nature open, and everywhere obvious, or easily investigated, they loathe and despise; [28] but things covered and hidden, they more desire; and, [being] desired, [they] more ardently seek out; and, [being] found, the more sweetly

[→ …the more sweetly] taste [them]. As, therefore, God has set many [things] in the divine books in the most open light, that from them we might be fed and drive away hunger, so he has wrapped many [things] in most useful obscurities, [1] that in these — without any loathing or satiety — we may exercise the acuteness of [our] wit. Secondly, that obscurity may conduce to a greater elucidation of the truth, while the explanations of many hidden meanings are drawn forth into the light — and one [expositor] thus, and another again thus most truly, veraciously explains what had been obscure; and, on occasion of inquiring into the proposed difficulty, he attains also the truth of other matters which he was not seeking. Thirdly, to repress the temerity of human wit, and to tame its pride by labor; [2] so that, while the swelling and puffed-up mind of man presumes that it can penetrate the abstruse recesses of the divine letters, at length, despairing, it may be forced to cry out, together with that Ethiopian Eunuch: [3] How can I understand these things, unless someone show me?

SILVANUS — whom some hand down to be called Silas by Luke in the Acts of the Apostles [4] — is thought to have been, together with Paul, the author of the two epistles to the Thessalonians, [5] because in their prefaces the name of Silvanus is joined with the name of Paul. But Photius, bishop of Constantinople, asserts that each [epistle] was elaborated by Paul alone, [6] but communicated and ascribed to Silvanus, as to a fellow-minister, out of apostolic modesty. Peter the apostle makes mention of this Silvanus at the close of [his] former epistle, saying: [7] By Silvanus, a faithful brother, I have written to you in few [words]. The Synopsis of Dorotheus the Martyr relates that he was bishop of Thessalonica.

SIMON Magus the Samaritan [8] — [his] father Antonius, [his] mother Rachel, from a village which was called Triton — [was] baptized by Philip the deacon (as is read in the Acts of the Apostles), [9] [and] wished to buy with money from the holy Apostles [the power] that by the imposition of his hand also the Holy Spirit might be given. This [man], when he had come to Rome under Claudius Caesar — using the help of a demon assisting him — so bewitched the Romans by magic arts [10] that he was decreed a god by them, and honored with a statue on the island of Aesculapius (set between the two bridges of the Tiber), having also a title written in Latin letters: TO SIMON THE HOLY GOD. Now he wrote volumes of prodigious impiety, seedbeds of all heresies, [11] in which he taught that he himself was the great power of God, whom the Greeks called Jove; but that his consort was that ancient Helen, on account of whom the Trojans and Greeks came to battle; and that Homer wrote allegorically about her whatsoever things are had in the Iliad. He also handed down the practice of a detestable filthiness — of using women indifferently; he denied that God made the world, and likewise [denied] the resurrection of the flesh; he said also that he himself was Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, and that in the person of the Father he had appeared in the time of Tiberius, and had suffered in appearance [putatively]; then that afterward he had descended in fiery tongues upon the apostles, in the person of the Holy Spirit; but that Christ had neither come, nor suffered anything from the Jews. He died at Rome, cast down from a great height by the prayer of Peter, [12] when he had challenged that same Peter into a contest of miracles. His writings are condemned by Gelasius, in the fifteenth distinction, enumerated in the first place among the works of the heretics.

THE ASSUMPTION OF THE PROPHET SOPHONIAS [Zephaniah] the Synopsis of Athanasius reviews among the impious writings.

SOSTHENES — one of the seventy disciples of our Savior, a Jew by nation, ruler of the synagogue of the Corinthians — suffered many [things] for the cause of the gospel before the proconsul Gallio, [13] as Luke relates in the Acts. This [man] is reported to have composed, together with Paul, that epistle which is the former one, to the Corinthians, [14] because the Apostle, in the salutation of the same epistle, joins him to himself no otherwise than as [one] writing and greeting [with him]. But Photius, bishop of Constantinople, thinks that it proceeded and was dictated from the very spirit and wit of Paul alone; [15] but that the Apostle easily attributed what was his own to Sosthenes, that he might make his epistle firmer and more acceptable to the Corinthians, among whom the name of Sosthenes the ruler of the synagogue was celebrated, and [his] authority greatly venerable. The Synopsis of Dorotheus shows that he was bishop of Colophon. [16]

THE WRITING OF THE SPARTANS — in which it was written that the Jews and the Spartans are brethren, and that both descended from the race of Abraham [17] — is cited in 1 Maccabees 12. Darius, king of the Lacedaemonians, makes mention of this writing in a certain epistle to Onias, pontiff of the Jews; a copy of which, taken from the twelfth book of the Antiquities of the Jews of Josephus, chapter 5, is had above, in [the entry] Darius.

Under the name of THE SPIRIT, THE PARACLETE, all the works of Manes the Persian (or Manichaeus) are inscribed by the Manichaeans — [18] whom his disciples believed to be [that Paraclete], and taught that he was that Paraclete Spirit promised by Christ in the Gospel. Now among the Manichaeans, under the title of the Paraclete Spirit, [these] more notable volumes, which follow, were had:

Of GOSPELS, one book.

Of MYSTERIES, two-and-twenty books, published in the Syriac tongue according to the number and order of the Syriac letters.

Of the GREAT TREASURE, one book.

Of the LITTLE TREASURE, one book.

Of SUMMARIES, one book.

ON FAITH, a book, whose beginning is: There was God, and Matter, light and darkness, good and evil, &c.

TO THE CHURCH of the faithful, one Epistle, which is called [the Epistle] Of the Foundation, whose beginning is: Manichaeus, Apostle of Jesus Christ, by the providence of God the Father. These are wholesome words, from a perennial and living fountain, &c. And it is had in Augustine, together with its confutation, in the sixth Tome.

TO MARCELLUS, [his] beloved son, one Epistle, whose beginning is: Manichaeus, apostle of Jesus Christ — and all the saints and virgins who are with me — to Marcellus, [his] beloved son: grace, mercy, and peace from God the Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ, &c. And it is had in Epiphanius, book 2 against the heresies, whence we have taken these [things].

VICTOR, Bishop of Vita [Vtitensis], in the second book of the African persecution, has committed to memory that the Manichaeans, out of reverence for their teacher, were wont to carry this writing on the skin of [their] thigh: [19] MANICHAEUS, DISCIPLE OF CHRIST JESUS.

THE LYING STYLUS OF THE SCRIBES [2] is cited in Jeremiah in these words: [3] TRULY the lying stylus of the scribes has wrought falsehood — עט שקר סופרים Het seeker sophrim, that is, the lying stylus of the scribes. For which the seventy interpreters translated: εἰς μάτην ἐγενήθη σχοῖνος ψευδὴς γραμματεῦσιν — that is, In vain was the false measuring-line made for the scribes. Origen interprets by this Stylus the lying traditions of the scribes and of the doctors of the law — especially those which they had proposed concerning oblations to be offered to the priests and the temple beyond the divine command, commuting the penalty of any most grievous crime whatsoever into oblations appointed at their own discretion. Which Jeremiah, a little above, reproving, was saying: [4] TRUST not in lying words, saying, The temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord it is. Prochetus, in the first book of the Victory against the Hebrews, thinks that Jeremiah, by the lying Stylus of the Scribes, wished prophetically to foretell [5] a certain correction of the divine volumes — which in the Talmudic books is very frequently recalled, called תיקון סופרים Tikkun Sophrim, that is, the Correction of the Scribes — according to which the Scribes, not long after the return from Babylon, changed certain [things] in the books of the law and the prophets: now distinguishing the scripture by certain points, now adding other [things] in the margins, which — in place of those which were written in the text — might, for civility's and modesty's sake, be read more honorably and more decently: as, for To lie with a concubine, [they put] to sleep with her; and for Dung, [they put] excrement. For which cause sometimes also, erasing that which had been written by the prophet, they replaced [it], in the place of that, with what they themselves had judged more [suited] to the decorum of Scripture. Whence it came about that in many places a sense much diverse from the prophet's meaning — and even often contrary and false — emerged. See more fully of this below, book 8, heresy two.

THE TABLES OF HEAVEN — of what kind of writing they are, see above in [the entry] Joseph [the oration].

TERTIUS, bishop of Iconium, disciple and amanuensis of Paul, wrote (the Apostle dictating) that Epistle which is to the Romans; at the end of which, adding also his own salutation, he says: [6] I, TERTIUS, who wrote the Epistle, SALUTE you in the Lord. This [man], since he was little skilled in speech, nor sufficiently practiced in writing, [7] rendered far more obscure the epistle — which, on account of the multitude and sublimity of [its] questions, is more obscure than the rest of Paul's epistles — while he tried to explain the meanings and thoughts of Paul with elocutions sometimes confused, with unfinished sentences, and with the order-series sometimes transposed. Diodorus, bishop of Tarsus, in the exposition of the epistle to the Romans, is witness of this matter. Theodolus, presbyter of Coele-Syria, in the exposition of the epistle to the Romans, reads, for Tertius, Terentius. [8]

THADDAEUS the Apostle — who is also called Lebbaeus and Judas — author of the Catholic epistle which is numbered last among the seven catholic [epistles], is said to have written a Gospel, which Gelasius reprobated in the fifteenth Distinction. [9]

THE INSCRIPTION THAV, or the letter ת Thau [Tau], is a vital, auspicious, and most salutary sign, [10] with which the divine mercy is wont spiritually to mark the foreheads of those whom it has decreed to snatch away from the fury of the divine vengeance. Ezekiel makes mention of this mystery in that celebrated vision, which he saw in the sixth year of the Babylonian transmigration, in the sixth month, on the sixth day, in these words: [11] AND the glory of the Lord of Israel was taken up from the Cherub; and he called the man that was clothed with linen, and had a writer's inkhorn at his loins. And the Lord said to him, Pass through the midst of the City, in the midst of Jerusalem, and mark Thau upon the foreheads of the men that sigh and mourn for all the abominations that are done in the midst thereof. And he said to the others, in my hearing — to the men in whose hand were the weapons of destruction — Go through the city, following him, and strike: let not your eye spare, nor be moved with pity: the old man, the youth, and the virgin, the little one, and the women, slay unto utter destruction; but upon whomsoever you shall see Thau, kill [him] not. These [things] Ezekiel [says] concerning the letter Thau — which God therefore willed to be inscribed on the foreheads of those to be saved, [12] to show that he deservedly snatched such [men] away from so great a slaughter of the whole people, because they alone in the whole city had kept the law of God, whose first letter they bore before them on [their] forehead. For Thau is the letter with which begins the Hebrew word תורה thorah, which signifies the divine law; and ת Thau is likewise the last of all the Hebrew letters — the completion, end, and consummation of the whole Jewish alphabet: by whose mark God willed those to be discerned who had fulfilled the whole will of the law (so far as human frailty permits), and had accomplished all the precepts of the divine scripture from the first even to the last letter. And hence, I judge, flowed that custom of distinguishing the living from the dead among the notaries of the ancient soldiery of the Gentiles, [13] who — when in the little rolls, in which the proper names of the soldiers were contained, they wished to show how many of the soldiers survived and how many had fallen in war — set the mark T (tau) at the head of the line to designate a survivor; but Θ (Thita [Theta]), [14] because it is transfixed through the middle with a dart (that is, with the sign of death), they set beside the name of each dead man. And judges set the same Θ Theta before the names of those whom they visited with punishment. [15] This same [mark], too, painters and sculptors used to write on the epitaphs of tombs — because it is the capital letter of the Greek word Θ θνήσκω, which signifies I die, or θανάτου, which signifies death. To which the Etruscan poet Persius not ungracefully alluded, when he urged the slaying of vice, in this verse:

> And one can set the black Theta before a vice.

And again another Poet:

> O letter Theta, unhappy far beyond the rest.

Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)*

[→ …as Jerome, in] most places of his works, is witness — that the Jews, before the Babylonian captivity, had other [letters] (that is, of another shape than now), [1] letters common with the Samaritans, received namely from Moses; whose shapes afterward Ezra, having returned from the captivity, changed, [2] so that the Jews — who in the number, order, sound, and signification of [their] letters agreed with the unbelieving Samaritans, [those] enemies of the Jewish name — might at least differ from them in the shape of the letters: the last of which is called, by the common word of both nations, Thau; and which formerly represented the figure of a cross †, [3] Ezra transformed into this mark ת, which the Jews now use. It was, therefore (unless I am mistaken), the sign Thau written on the foreheads of those who were rescued from the devastation of the city — [4] the figure of the life-giving cross, the symbol of human salvation, and the sign of the redemption of the whole world. By the inscription of which sign it was mystically signified that no one escapes the punishment of everlasting death who has not been marked with the seal of the cross: that is, who has not had inwardly impressed the faith of the cross, passion, and death of Christ; and who, outwardly on his forehead — which is the index of inner confidence, boldness, and constancy — has not borne the cross of Christ; that is, [who has not] with bare and open forehead intrepidly preached the cross of Christ, and reposed all his glory in it, saying, together with Paul: [5] FAR be it from me to glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified to me, and I to the world. In the cross, I say, of Him who summons his soldiers with these words: [6] IF anyone wishes to come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me — indicating by this saying that no one can enter into eternal life with Christ, unless he first, in this world, through the way of tribulations, follow the footsteps of Christ going before, bearing before him the sign of Christ's cross in heart, mouth, and hand. [7] This is that sign of the living God, concerning which the Angel in the Apocalypse cries out to the devastating Angels: [8] HURT not the earth, nor the sea, nor the trees, until we sign the servants of our God on their foreheads. Assuredly a sign of victory and of triumph, [9] by which whosoever shall have been protected will break the efforts of all enemies, invisible and visible; neither sin, nor death, nor the world, nor Satan, nor the gates of hell shall prevail against him.

Nevertheless I judge it not to be passed over, that the name Tau is taken as much for the last letter of the Hebrew Alphabet as for any sign whatsoever; whence, since in Ezekiel not the sole figure of the letter Thau itself, ת, is written separately, but the whole word — which almost all interpret as Sign — it is indeed uncertain [10] whether the words of the prophet are to be understood of the letter Thau itself, or of some other sign. Theodotion understood [it] of Thau, the last letter of the alphabet; and for that which the Seventy, Aquila, and Symmachus translated sign, he put the Hebrew ת itself. Isidore, bishop of Seville, judged that by Thau is signified the Greek letter T (taf), because it represents the figure of the Lord's cross. But Chrysostom, in the eighteenth homily to the people of Antioch, expounds by Thau nothing else than an indeterminate sign. Finally, Origen, in the homily On the Epiphany, concludes that the letter Thau was the very figure of the cross.

THOMAS the Apostle. The Gospel which was familiar to the Manichaeans under the name of the same Apostle [11] (Gelasius being witness) he is believed to have written: of which Origen makes mention, in the first homily on Luke, saying: I KNOW a certain Gospel which is called ACCORDING TO THOMAS and ACCORDING TO MATTHIAS; and we read several others, lest we should seem to be ignorant of anything, on account of those who think they know something if they have known these [things]: but in all these we approve nothing else than what the Church [approves], that is, only four gospels. Cyril, bishop of Jerusalem, in the sixth catechetical oration, hands down that the author of this gospel was a certain Thomas, [12] disciple of Manes the Persian. Athanasius in the Synopsis, and Gelasius in distinction 15, reject [it] among the condemned scriptures. [13] Epiphanius, in the second book of the Panarion, relates that the Encratite heretics had in use a certain book whose title is THE ACTS OF THOMAS — which Innocent, the first Pope, reprobates in the epistle to Exuperius. [14] Augustine, in the first book On the Lord's sermon on the mount, and in the book against Adimantus, and in the 22nd book against Faustus, attests that the Manichaeans [15] had writings of this kind, in which it was read that the Apostle Thomas — when he was, at a certain marriage-feast, a stranger and wholly unknown — being struck on the palm [cheek] by a certain servant, imprecated upon the man a continual and savage vengeance. Him [the servant], when he had gone out to the fountain to serve water to the guests, a Lion, rushing upon [him], slew; and his hand — with which he had struck the Apostle's head with a light blow — torn from the body (according to the word of the Apostle desiring and imprecating it), a dog brought to the table at which the Apostle was reclining. There are enumerated by Athanasius in the Synopsis, together with the repudiated books, the Circuits, or Itinerary of Thomas the Apostle; and by Gelasius, distinction 15, his Apocalypse is repudiated. It is also SAID that this Apostle wrote to Clement (who was pontiff after Peter) an epistle concerning the [things] seen by him in Parthia, Media, Persia, and India — of which Clement himself makes mention in the ninth volume of the Recognitions.

TIBERIUS CAESAR — in whose fifteenth year Luke writes that John preached [16] — published writings of various kinds, in an affected and harsh style, after the imitation of Messalla Corvinus, whom, as a youth, he had attended [as an old man]. [17] He composed also a lyric poem, whose title is: A COMPLAINT ON THE DEATH OF JULIUS CAESAR. He made also Greek poems, imitating Euphorion, and Rhianus, and Parthenius — with which poets he was so delighted that he dedicated their writings and images in the public libraries, among the ancient and chief authors. Suetonius [attests this], in [the life of] Tiberius.

TIMOTHY of Lystra — born of a gentile father [and] a Hebrew mother [18] — was made first bishop of Ephesus by Paul, while yet quite a youth, on account of his eminent virtues. Him the Apostle, in the salutations of his letters, seems to indicate to have been a co-adjutor to him in the writing and composing of some epistles, [19] which are inscribed with the names of Paul and Timothy joined together. And these are:

These, however, Photius, bishop of Constantinople, judges to have been first composed by Paul alone, [7] and then communicated and ascribed to [his] uniquely beloved disciple Timothy, out of the inborn modesty and charity of the Apostle.

THERE ARE carried about, likewise, under the name of Timothy the bishop, four Books to the catholic church, [8] which Salvian, bishop of Marseilles — prefixing a preface to them — shows not to be of this Timothy, but published by a certain writer of his own times; who, fleeing the breath of human praise, [his] own name concealed, feigned the word Timothy (by which the honor of the Divinity is expressed), that he might signify that he had written not to catch the honor of men, but for the honor of God alone — imitating in this the example of Luke the evangelist, who, in the exordium of each of his works, feigned the name of Theophilus, [9] pretending that he was writing to a man, when he was directing [his] writings to the love of God, by whom he had been impelled to write. [10] [11] The character of this work, unless my taste deceives me, savors of the phrase and style of that same Salvian.

TITULUS, in the sacred letters, sometimes signifies [12] ἐπιγραφή, that is, an inscription which is written over things, that at once, at first sight, it may be known what the superscribed thing is. [13] So the Evangelists report the title set over the Lord's cross by Pilate, written in Greek, Latin, and Hebrew letters, [14] [15] that thereby the cause of Christ's death might be manifest. Sometimes it signifies [16] marble columns, pyramids, pillars, or arches, inscribed with the names and eulogies of illustrious men, for preserving the memory of the [things] brilliantly done by them. Thus in the first volume of Kings we read [17] that Saul, the nation of the Amalekites being conquered, erected for himself a title [18] — or, as our edition has it, a triumphal arch — on Mount Carmel. So in the second book of the same work we read [it] written: [19] NOW Absalom had erected for himself, while he was yet alive, a title [pillar], which is in the King's Valley: for he had said, I have no son, and this shall be the monument of my name. And he called the title by his own name; and it is called THE HAND OF ABSALOM even to this day. Which words Josephus, expounding in the seventh book of the Antiquities, [renders]: NOW Absalom had erected for himself, in the King's Valley, a marble column with an inscription, distant two stadia from Jerusalem, which he willed to be called the Hand of Absalom — saying that, if it should befall his children to perish, yet in this his name would remain. Sometimes Titulus, in the sacred letters, is the same as a statue, [20] image, and likeness set up for the veneration and worship of some man — which, [under] the setting-up of a Title, God, forbidding in the third volume of the law, [21] says: YOU shall not make for yourselves an idol and a graven thing, nor erect titles. Sometimes also Titulus denotes [22] an unshaped stone — standing without any inscription, and without any polishing of art, and erected on the surface of the earth — such as we read in Genesis was the stone which Jacob, sleeping at Bethel of Luz, put under his head, and, [23] roused from sleep, set up as a title, pouring oil upon it, and saying: THE Lord shall be to me for a God, and this stone [shall be] a title. From these words it is clear that that Title was not a column or a pyramid, but a rude stone, at first lying on the ground, then erected on high, for the perpetual remembrance of the [things] which had befallen the Patriarch Jacob in that place. This Moses called מצבה matsevah, that is, a standing Stone; and the seventy interpreters at times translated [it] λίθον, that is, Stone.

TITULUS, or the Inscription of the cross of Jesus Christ [24] — see above, [in] those [things] which are written by us in [the entry] Pontius Pilate.

THE BOOK OF TOBIAS THE YOUNGER, forged by sorcerous men, [25] contains incantations and certain magical images, by which Tobias, son of Tobit, is feigned to have driven off the demons from his spouse Sara. The Senate of the Sacrosanct Roman Inquisition condemned the book, [it being] rejected among the works of magical impiety.

THE TRADITIONS OF THE JEWS Epiphanius very frequently cites, certain [of them] without the author's name: out of whose authority he himself brings forward — against the Hieracites — the Genealogy of Melchizedek [26] from the nation of the Sidonians; and against the Melchizedechians, the Genealogy of the prophets Elijah and Daniel. Likewise, against the Antidicomarianites, he shows from the same traditions that Joseph, the spouse of the Virgin Mary, had another wife before Mary, [27] and had by her four sons — who in Mark and John are named James, Joseph, Jude, and Simeon — and two daughters, Mary and Salome; [and] that, she being dead, when he was a widower and eighty years old, he took the Virgin Mary to wife. Likewise, against the Collyridians, he relates that the parents of the Virgin Mary were Joachim and Anna. Again, disputing against the Manichaeans, he proves from the same [traditions] that Lazarus, when he was raised by Christ, [28] was thirty years old, and after the resurrection survived thirty other [years]. Jerome also cites other Hebrew traditions in the book of Hebrew Traditions, very often. Euthymius, in chapter 23 of Matthew, alleges a certain kind of Jewish traditions, which — because they are not written — are called ἄγραφα [unwritten].

THE TRADITIONS OF THE ELDERS — which Matthew in Hebrew called גזירות הזקנים Ghezerot ha-zekenim, that is, the Constitutions of the Elders (but the Greek codex, in the singular number, calls [it] τὴν παράδοσιν τῶν πρεσβυτέρων, that is, the tradition of the Elders) — the divine scripture commemorates in several places, especially in Matthew chapter 15, [29] where the Pharisees, accusing the Apostles, question Christ, saying: WHY do your disciples transgress the Traditions of the Elders? for they wash not their hands when they eat bread. Whom Christ, convicting of a greater crime, and in turn questioning, says: [30] WHY do you also transgress the commandment of God for your tradition? And a little after he adds: [31] IN VAIN do they worship me, teaching the doctrines and commandments of men. At the observers of these Traditions God, being angry, threatens through his prophets, saying in Isaiah: [32] BECAUSE they have feared me with the commandment and doctrines of men, wisdom shall perish from their wise men. And in Jeremiah: TRULY [→ TRULY] the lying stylus of the scribes has wrought falsehood. The wise are confounded… they have cast away the word of the Lord, and there is no wisdom in them. [1] These same Traditions Paul the Apostle, everywhere deriding — and calling [them] now Jewish fables, now old-wives' trifles, now foolish questions and profane vanities — deters Timothy from the handling of them, in these words: [that they] should NOT attend, he says, to endless Genealogies, [2] which afford questions rather than the edification of God which is in faith — as some, wishing to be teachers of the law. And again to the same he says: [3] Avoid FOOLISH questions, and [those] without instruction. And again: Avoid silly and old-wives' fables. And, to Titus, repeating the same: Avoid [4] [5] foolish questions, and genealogies, and contentions of the law; for they are unprofitable and vain. Nor does he warn this in vain, [being] himself experienced [in it], how much the observance of these traditions had harmed himself and others; for on account of these (as the epistle written to the Galatians testifies) [6] he himself persecuted beyond measure the Church of God, and assailed it, being a zealot of the paternal traditions in Judaism. Since, therefore, both Christ and Paul so sharply inveigh against Traditions of this kind, therefore — lest anyone should perhaps think that human Traditions of whatsoever kind are universally condemned — it will not be beside the purpose briefly to indicate [7] what are the doctrines and commandments of men reprobated by God.

THE MANICHAEANS impiously affirmed that, by the Traditions of the Elders, all the Scriptures of the old Testament are to be understood; [8] and these, they said, were called by Paul Jewish fables and profane vanities. [9] But against the madness of these, Paul himself, writing to the Romans, [10] cries out: [11] THE LAW indeed [is] holy, and the commandment holy, just, and good. And to Timothy he says: [12] BUT do you continue in the [things] which you have learned, because from infancy you have known the sacred letters, which can instruct you unto salvation by the faith which is in Christ Jesus: for all Scripture, divinely inspired, is profitable to teach, to reprove, to correct, to instruct in justice, that the man of God may be perfect, furnished unto every good work.

THE PTOLEMAITE Heretics, as Epiphanius hands down in the first [book] against the heresies, understood, by the Traditions condemned by Christ, not all, but some, Scriptures of the old Testament, [13] which they divided into three parts: of which one they said was founded by God, another by Moses, the third written by the Elders of the Jews, and afterward rejected by Christ, saying: [14] WHY do you also transgress the commandment of God for your tradition? For God said, Honor father and mother; and, He that shall curse father or mother, let him die the death. [15] [16] But you say, If a man shall say to father or mother, KORBAN ([which is] a Gift), whatsoever from me shall profit you: and you no longer permit [17] him to do anything for his father or mother — rescinding the word of God by your tradition, which you have delivered, &c. But since the words of this tradition are nowhere found in the whole old testament, it is manifest that Christ, under the name of Traditions, condemned no part of the divine Scriptures, [18] but other Jewish constitutions, foreign to sacred Scripture, and contrary to the word of God.

LUTHER, and all the foul filth of the Lutherans, interpret — by the traditions and doctrines of men rejected by Christ — all ecclesiastical Sanctions [19] which have not, in the divine letters, an open and express testimony of God. But it appears that they lie wickedly, [20] from this: that Christ and Paul, in the places already cited, do not condemn good and just traditions of men (although these have not the express word of God), but only Jewish constitutions — that is, [those] repugnant to the commandments of God; such as was that [tradition] of the Pharisees, [21] Whatsoever GIFT is from me shall profit you [22] — which destroyed the divine precept concerning piety toward parents. But the ecclesiastical Sanctions, and the decrees of the Fathers, which promote and increase the worship of God, [23] Christ wills to be observed — so that through Paul he says: STAND, and hold the traditions which you have learned, whether by our word or by our epistle. [24] And he himself, establishing a law concerning the traditions of the Pastors to be kept, says: [25] ALL THINGS whatsoever they shall say to you, observe and do. And to the Pastors he says: [26] HE who hears you, hears me; and he who despises you, despises me. And: [27] IF he will not hear the church, let him be to you as the heathen and the publican. For no less does he deserve to be cast out among the Heathen who refuses the ecclesiastical traditions [28] than he who refuses the gospel; since — the constitutions of the church being rejected — the gospel too must needs be cast off. [29] Which also blessed Basil, in the book On the Holy Spirit, plainly attests in these words, chapter 27: If we shall attempt once to repudiate the unwritten ordinances and customs — as though a great force were not in them — we shall, secretly and by degrees, disapprove the very established sentences of the gospel, or rather shall contract its preaching into an empty name. I judge it therefore Apostolic to continue in these traditions also, which are not written. But of these we have spoken more fully elsewhere.

STRATONICUS, Bishop of Cumae, in his Collectanea, judges that these Traditions were the tenets and decrees of the Jewish sects. [30] For there were four modes of life among the Jews (as Josephus and Epiphanius write): [31] of which the Pharisees professed one, the Galileans another, the Sadducees a third, the Essenes a fourth.

Now the dogmas of the Pharisees were of this kind: [32]

1. That all things are done by Fate — that is, by the prescience and immovable decree of God — the free assent of the human will nevertheless remaining. [33] For with such a tempering does God, the best, govern the affairs of men, that, although all things depend on his deliberation, yet in man there is entire the faculty of approaching to virtue and to vice.

2. That souls are incorrupt and immortal, and that their judgments take place beneath the earth, and that rewards befall to each according to the desert of virtue and of malice.

3. That the souls of the pious return from the lower regions into this life, to new bodies, and again pass from these into other bodies; [34] but that the souls of the wicked, condemned to perpetual prisons, are tormented with unending punishment.

4. That the elders are to be venerated, and that it is not lawful either to answer back to those admonishing, or to gainsay [them].

5. That the traditions of the elders — which are not written among the Mosaic laws, but delivered by the forefathers from hand to hand — are to be received with the highest veneration, and to be honored with equal honor with the Mosaic law.

(Rich PDF p. 136 — printed folio 119, verso. The Jewish sects continued: the Galileans (Judas of Galilee — God alone is Lord, refusing tribute; John 8:33); the four dogmas of the Sadducees (no fate, no immortality, no angels, only the Mosaic books); and the fifteen rules of the Essenes (the monastic community — celibacy, common goods, white garments, the latrine-mattock, the fifth-hour meal, the three-year probation). Then the Traditions of the Elders per Epiphanius, Jerome (the deuteroseis — Shammai, Hillel, Akiba…), and Thomas Aquinas (the Talmud). Running head: LIBER SECVNDVS.)

THE GALILEANS, who took their origin from Judas the Galilean, of the country of Gamala, followed the same tenets as the Pharisees, [1] adding only this one thing of their own: namely, that God alone is to be held for Lord, and that no mortal prince is to be obeyed, but that, for the asserting of liberty, all hard and harsh [things] are to be endured. Josephus relates that this kind of men often stirred up the peoples to cast off the empires of kings and lords, and to refuse the payment of tribute [2] (which is a manifest testimony of servitude); and among these he writes that there were, in the time of Herod, six thousand men who — when the whole nation of the Jews had bound their fidelity by oath to Caesar and the King — these alone would neither take the oath nor promise fidelity. There are also [those] who think that of this sect were those Jews whom we read, glorying in liberty, [3] to have said to Christ (in whom they had lately believed): [4] WE ARE THE SEED OF ABRAHAM, AND WE HAVE NEVER SERVED ANYONE; and that they therefore had adhered to Christ, because they hoped that he would one day be the asserter and vindicator of Jewish liberty.

The SADDUCEES had opinions diverse from these, [5] namely:

1. That there is no Fate at all, nor any decree of divine deliberation, but that all things are so in the power of men that each is the author to himself of his happiness as well as of his misfortune.

2. That souls are altogether extinguished together with the body, [6] and that no rewards or punishments remain after this life.

3. That there is no nature of Angels, [7] but only names — by which either the motions which God breathes into men are designated, or those demonstrations of his power which he himself puts forth.

4. That, besides the Mosaic books and the divine laws comprised in the same volumes, [8] no other authority of scriptures, nor tradition of men, is to be received.

The ESSENES, more notable cultivators of piety, and not much unlike Christian monks, [9] had bound themselves to these laws and sanctions:

1. That all things are ruled by fate — that is, by the will of God — and that nothing befalls men beyond the determination of fate.

2. That souls are immortal, and that to them, after this life, the rewards and punishments of their deeds are repaid — to the good, indeed, beyond the Ocean, where there is a region which neither cold nor heat oppresses, but a pleasant Zephyr breathes; but to the wicked, among the lower regions, where the places are wretched and full of groanings.

3. That every oath is to be avoided as a kind of perjury, because whatever a perfect man shall say ought to have the force of an oath; and that he is condemned as guilty of a lie, who is not believed without God as witness.

4. That the highest reverence, after God, is to be shown to Moses the lawgiver — whom, if anyone shall blaspheme, let him be condemned to death.

5. That the chief study is to be applied to the divine letters, and to the writings of the ancient fathers; and thence are to be sought the [things] that avail for the care of souls.

6. That the prefect of the common fellowship is to be so obeyed, that nothing may be done without his command.

7. To lead a continent and celibate life, and to abstain from all wedlock through the whole [of] life.

8. That all goods are common, and [that there is] one patrimony of all, which is dispensed through common stewards.

9. That they neither buy nor sell anything among themselves, but that it is free for all to receive, from whom they please, what is needful.

10. That white garments are to be used, and that the cloak and shoes are not to be changed, unless the former be altogether torn, or consumed by long use.

11. That so great a care of cleanliness is to be had, even in natural [bodily] purgations, that each one daily, in the most secret places, digs for himself a pit with a little mattock, in which he may relieve his belly [10] — the garment being first let down all around for the sake of covering the body, and then the earth which he had dug out being brought back into its place — namely, lest an injury be done to the splendor of the divine light.

12. That before the rising of the Sun, the author of the light about to be born is to be celebrated with public praises; but afterward each is to go to his own arts and studies.

13. That at the fifth hour of the day they come together into a common dining-hall, clothed in sacred garments (that is, in linen coverings); and there, sitting in silence, they eat of the same bread and pottage; nor is it lawful for anyone to taste anything, unless a public prayer precede the meal, and follow [it] — [a prayer] which praises God, the giver of sustenance, both before and after food.

14. That after the meal, the sacred vestments being laid aside, each withdraws to his own works until evening.

15. That those lately approaching to the discipline of the Essenes are not at once to be taken into fellowship, but — clothed in a white garment and an apron [perizoma], and girt with a little mattock — are to be tested by their curators for three whole years, until they give approved proofs of [their] virtue.

EPIPHANIUS, in the first book against the heresies, says that the Traditions of the elders are four Jewish Expositions of the divine law, [11] devised by certain masters of the Hebrews — that is, by Moses the Prophet, by Rabbi Akiba, by Rabbi Ida, and by the sons of Asamonaeus — who, out of the aforesaid expositions, deduced certain constitutions, full of superstition and vanity, which they also commanded to be observed, together with the rest of the commands of the divine law, with equal obligation.

JEROME, in the third commentary [12] on Isaiah, and in the tenth question to Algasia, and on the third chapter of the epistle to Titus, writes that these are certain constitutions of the Jews, called by the Greeks δευτερώσεις [deuteroseis], which the first among the Hebrews, before the coming of Christ, taught — Shammai and Hillel, whose school Akiba took up (the teacher of Aquila the proselyte); and after him Meir, whom Jochanan the son of Zaccai succeeded; and after him Eliezer; and in order Delphon; and again Joseph; and lastly Joshua — even to the last destruction of the holy city.

THOMAS Aquinas, in the commentaries on both epistles to Timothy, once and again asserts that by the name of Traditions is signified that huge and vast work of Jewish traditions, [13] called by the Jews תלמוד Talmud, that is, Instruction [Discipline]; in which are collected—

(Rich PDF p. 137 — printed folio 120, recto. The Talmud entry: its contents and dating (the Mishnah ~150 after Jerusalem's fall; the Jerusalem Talmud ~300; the Babylonian Talmud, AD 476, at "Babylon of Egypt" = Cairo); its blasphemies; the papal burnings (Gregory IX 1230, Innocent IV 1244, Julius III 1553, Paul IV 1559 — 12,000 codices burned at Cremona); Sixtus's rebuke of Galatinus's defense (the Council of Vienne's decree misread); and his announcement of a catalog of the Talmudic volumes. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

[→ …in which] are collected all the decrees of the aforesaid masters — Shammai, Hillel, Akiba, Joseph, and the sons of Asamonaeus — together with innumerable other statutes, opinions, and expositions of the Rabbis, both of divine and of human laws, by which the whole nation of the Jews is now governed. This work had its beginning [1] (as the Talmud expositors themselves write) in the year one hundred and fiftieth after the last destruction of Jerusalem, [made] by Judah, son of Simon, who gathered into one volume the explanations of the law and the prophets, and all the writings which the above-mentioned Rabbis and the other doctors — as much before as after the coming of Christ — had thus far written; which [volume] they called משנה Misna, that is, Repeated reading, or Repetition. But in the three-hundredth year from the same last devastation of Jerusalem, Rabbi Jochanan — taking to himself as colleagues Rab and Samuel — joined this Misna and certain other writings into one volume, which they called the JERUSALEM TALMUD, [2] because it was written among the ruins of the city of Jerusalem. Again, in the year four hundred thirty-sixth from the same destruction (which was the year of Christ four hundred seventy-sixth), Rabbi Ashe and Rabbi Hammai — dwelling in Babylon of Egypt, which is now called Cairo [3] [4] — reducing all the writings of [their] predecessors into one, constructed a new body of many volumes, called the BABYLONIAN TALMUD; which, since they could not (being prevented by death) complete it, Rabbi Meir, son of Rabbi Ashe, put the finishing hand to the work. But since both he, and his forefathers and posterity, had gathered through the several books of this Talmud not only many and execrable contumelies and blasphemies against Christ our God, [5] but had also written many sanctions and precepts against that very law of Moses which they profess, and against all the law of nations, and all the law of nature (which they — as being men — are bound to keep), it seemed [good] to the Supreme Pontiffs and to other Christian princes [6] that the reading and use of so nefarious a doctrine should be forbidden to all the Jews who live under the dominion of Christians, and that all the Talmudic books throughout the whole Christian world should be given to the flames. Which also has often been done, certain writers worthy of credit attest. Among whom Bernard of Luxembourg, in the catalog of heretics, book two, relates that Pope Gregory the ninth of that name, in the year of the Lord 1230, adjudged all the Talmudic volumes to the flames; and likewise that Pope Innocent the fourth of that name did the same again, in the year of our salvation 1244. Again, when the same volumes had been restored by the Jews, and, by the help of the printing art, propagated to a well-nigh infinite number, Pope Julius III — a new edict being promulgated — commanded [them] to be sought out, and (in the year 1553, when the feast of Tabernacles was being celebrated by the Jews in the month of September) to be burned throughout all the cities of Italy. Pope Paul IV, together with the Senate of the Sacrosanct Roman Inquisition, in the year 1559, again commanded the same to be done, and willed the Talmudic books to be numbered among the writings condemned [7] by the Catholic Church.

Wherefore I cannot but here greatly marvel at the vain zeal of Peter Galatinus, of the order of the Minors [Franciscans], [8] who — when, in the first book On the arcana of the catholic truth, he had undertaken the defense of the Talmudic volumes — fell into such vanity that he not only affirmed that the Talmudic works ought to be translated into Latin and publicly expounded in the schools of Christians, [9] but even tried to establish this very [thing] by the authority of Pope Clement V, who — in the Council of Vienne, the same holy synod approving — decreed that in the schools of Christians there should be teachers skilled in the Hebrew and Chaldaic tongue, who should translate the books of the Jews into Latin and publicly teach their language (as is noted in the fifth volume of the Clementine sanctions, in the title On Masters). This decree of Clement (says Peter), since it cannot be understood of the Hebrew books of the divine scripture — because these had already been translated so many times — it is consonant that his words are to be understood of the Talmudic works of the Jews, not yet turned into Latin. A pretty argument indeed, and worthy of such a defender — who did not observe that Clement's canon speaks of the first rudiments and instructions of the Hebrew and Chaldaic tongues, [10] which are rather to be sought from those who, among the Jews, wrote grammatical traditions and Hebrew and Chaldaic dictionaries, than from those who collected the Talmudic writings.

I MYSELF had indeed decided to make no mention of such books, and to abolish by silence all memory of this doctrine, as much as could be done: but since the experience of past times has taught me that volumes of this kind, so often extinguished, revive again like the heads of the hydra [11] — the avarice of Christian princes permitting it, who, induced by any small price, sell to the Jews the faculty of restoring these books — therefore I judged that I should be doing a work worth the labor, if I should in some part make manifest certain of the basenesses, impieties, and blasphemies comprised in the Talmudic volumes, the books being named expressly where these are had; so that, if ever these nefarious writings (with which Asia, Africa, Greece, and Germany still abound) be recalled to light among us, the champions of Christian piety may have an index, by which — as it were by the hand — they may be led to finding out and detecting the particular books of this work, and the places in which the aforesaid blasphemies are written; so that, these being detected, they may again inflame the Christian princes against the necks of the reviving hydra. But that the citations, inscriptions, and arguments of the same books and places may be more easily and more openly understood, I have judged it necessary to append in this place a catalog of all the Talmudic volumes — once transcribed by me out of that most opulent Library of the Jews of Cremona, out of which, in the year of our salvation 1559, by command of the Senate of the Sacrosanct Roman Inquisition, twelve thousand Talmudic codices were burned.

A CATALOG OF THE VOLUMES OF THE WHOLE TALMUD.

The whole תלמוד Talmud is divided into six orders, which they call סדר seder. Now each seder is distributed into several tractates, which are called מסכת Massecheth; and these again contain several chapters, which are named פרקים Parachim, that is, divisions.

זרעים ZERAIM, that is, Of Seeds, the first order, containing these eleven tractates:

1. ברכות Berachoht, that is, Of Blessings, or concerning the blessings and thanks to be rendered to God; contains nine chapters. 2. פאה Phea, that is, Of the Corner, or concerning the portion of the harvest to be left for the poor in the corner of the field; has ten chapters. 3. דמאי Demai, that is, Of Doubt, or concerning the giving of tithes of doubtful things; has ten chapters. 4. תרומות Tneroma [Terumoth], that is, Concerning the fiftieth part of things to be rendered to the priests; has ten chapters. 5. שביעית Ceuiith [Sheviith], that is, Of the Seventh, or concerning the seventh year of the resting field; has ten chapters. 6. כלאים Chilaim [Kilaim], that is, Of Mixtures, or Concerning crops which it is unlawful to mix together; has nine chapters. 7. מעשר ראשון Mahaster riscion [Maaser rishon], that is, Of the First tithe, or Concerning the first tithes which were given to the Levites; has nine chapters. 8. מעשר שני Master sceni [Maaser sheni], that is, Of the Second tithe, which — after the tithes given to the Levites — had to be eaten and consumed in Jerusalem; has five chapters. 9. חלה Challa, that is, Of the Cake, or Concerning the first portion of the cake, which always had to be offered from the mass of bread; has four chapters. 10. ערלה Arla [Orlah], that is, Of the Enclosure, or Concerning the enclosure which was made for trees lately planted, in sign that before the completed third year it was lawful for no one to eat of their fruits; has three chapters. 11. ביכורים Bicurim, that is, Of Firstfruits, or Concerning the firstfruits — out of only seven things — to be offered in the temple; has four chapters.

מועד MOED, that is, the second order, of the festivals, containing the twelve tractates written below:

1. שבת Sciabath [Shabbat], that is, Of the Sabbath, or Concerning the Sabbath and the [things] which on it are lawful, or not; contains twenty-four chapters. 2. עירובין Eruuin [Eruvin], that is, Concerning the associations which were mutually lawful to the Jews on the Sabbath; has ten chapters. 3. פסחים Pesachim, that is, Of the Passovers, or Concerning the [things] which pertain to the celebration of the Passover; contains ten chapters. 4. שקלים Sekalim [Shekalim], that is, Of the Sicles, or Concerning the exaction of the Sicles which had to be made for the buying of the lambs which were daily offered in sacrifice; eight chapters. 5. יומא Ioma [Yoma], that is, Of the great Day, or Concerning the day of propitiation, and the [things] to be done on it; has eight chapters. 6. סוכה Succa [Sukkah], that is, Of the Hut, the Tabernacle, or Concerning the feast of Tabernacles; contains five chapters. 7. ביצה Beza [Beitzah], that is, Of the good Day (that is, of the feast), or Concerning all the [things] which ought to be done on it; has five chapters. 8. ראש השנה Roshasaua [Rosh Hashanah], that is, Of the head of the year, or Concerning the [things] which are to be done in the solemnity of that day; contains five chapters. 9. תענית Thaanith [Taanith], that is, Of Fasting, or concerning fasting; has four chapters. 10. מגילה Meghila [Megillah], that is, Of the History, or Concerning the history of Esther, which is to be read in the solemnity of Mordecai and Esther; four chapters. 11. מועד קטן Moed Katan, that is, Of the Little Feast, or Concerning the lesser feast-days which fell between the first and last day of the Passover of Tabernacles; has three chapters. 12. חגיגה Chagiga [Chagigah], that is, Of the Solemnity, or concerning the precept by which all males are bound to go three times a year to Jerusalem for the solemnity; has three chapters.

נשים NASIM [NASHIM], that is, Of Women, the third order, containing seven tractates, namely:

1. יבמות Ieuamot [Yevamoth], that is, Of Sisters-in-law, or Concerning the taking [to wife] of the wife of a brother deceased without children; contains sixteen chapters. 2. כתובות Chetuboth [Ketuboth], that is, Of Contracts, or Concerning the contracts of dowries, and the mutual obligations between husband and wife; has thirteen chapters. 3. נדרים Nedarim, that is, Of Vows, or Concerning the vows of women; has eleven chapters. 4. נזיר Nazir, that is, Of the Nazirite, or concerning the vow of the Nazirites, separated from the common food; contains nine chapters.

The sum of the whole Talmud contains sixty-three tractates.

A CATALOG OF SOME ERRORS, which out of the innumerable follies, blasphemies, and impieties of the Talmudic work we have collected, that from these few we might exhibit to you some specimen of these execrable volumes, in which almost infinite blasphemies are contained not only against Christ our God, but also against the Mosaic law, against the law of nature, and against the very majesty of divine sublimity.

AGAINST CHRIST OUR GOD.

The blasphemies which the impious Jews emit against Christ our God are so execrable that the mind shudders, and the hand recoils from writing them: therefore it will suffice only to have here indicated certain places where these are had.

By what birth Christ was born, and what mother he had. Order one, tractate nine, verse forty-ninth, beginning from the word Mehila.

What was Christ's profession, study, and craft. Order four, tractate four, chapter five, folio seventeen.

What God Christ worshipped. Order four, tractate four, chapter two, folio 107.

For what cause, and by what punishment, the Jews killed Christ. Order four, tractate four, chapter six, folio 43.

In what place the soul of Christ is now detained. Order three, tractate six, folio 57.

AGAINST THE SUBLIMITY OF THE DIVINE MAJESTY.

God, before the creation of the world — lest he grow torpid with idleness — exercised himself in building various worlds; which, when he had founded them, a little after he destroyed, and again restored, until he had learned to make this world which we now have. Order one, tractate four, chapter three.

God spends the whole first three hours of the day in the reading of the Jewish law. Order two, tractate one, chapter fourteen.

Moses, when he had once ascended into heaven, found God writing the accents in the holy scripture. Order five, tractate six, chapter five.

God, on the first day of the new moon of the month of September, judges the whole world; then, on the remaining ten following days of the same Moon, applies himself to writing the just in the book of life, but the wicked in the book of death. Order two, tractate eight, chapter five.

God daily makes prayers and supplications with devout mind. Order one, tractate one, chapter one.

God has a certain separate place, in which at many appointed times he weeps with tears and afflicts himself, because — angry with the Jews — he overthrew the temple of Jerusalem and dispersed his people into captivity. Order two, chapter five; and order one, chapter seven.

God daily puts upon himself, about the head and arms, fillets, or certain leathern little straps, called Thephilin [Tefillin], and clothes himself with a certain linen tunic which is called Zizith [Tzitzit]; and, thus adorned, he prostrates himself upon [his] knees, and prays. Order two, tractate eight, chapter five.

God commanded the people of the Jews that at each new moon they should perform a sacrifice of expiation, to expiate the crime perpetrated by God, when he unjustly took away from the Moon the light which he attributed to the Sun. Order four, tractate six, chapter one.

God, as often as he remembers the calamities which the Jews suffer from the Gentiles, pours out two tears into the Ocean sea, and, from grief, beats his breast with both hands. Order one, tractate one, chapter nine.

God, in the three last hours of the day, for the sake of relaxing [his] mind, once played with a certain fish of vast ma——of vast magnitude, which is called Leviathan. Order two, tractate one, chapter fourteen; and order four, tractate 8.

God, for an unknown cause being angry with the great fish Leviathan, killed it, and salted its flesh, that from it he might furnish food to the souls of the saints in the world to come. Order four, tractate three, chapter five.

God is angry once daily, and then the combs of the barnyard cocks lose their redness, and meanwhile [the cocks] stand upon one foot; then, if anyone at that same moment curse someone, he [the cursed] straightway falls down dead. Order one, tractate one.

God created the element of fire on the day of the Sabbath. Order two, tractate three, chapter four.

When once certain Rabbis had entered into a disputation against Rabbi Eliezer, God — a voice being sent down from heaven — pronounced the sentence against them in favor of Rabbi Eliezer; wherefore the Rabbis, indignant, condemned God with the penalty of anathema. Then God himself, smiling, said, "My sons have conquered me." Order four, tractate two, chapter seven.

When God, on a certain day in the court of heaven, was disputing about a certain kind of leprosy — which he himself said was clean, the other Rabbis dissenting, who affirmed it to be unclean — the matter at last, by the common assent of all, devolved to a certain most wise Rabbi; who, when he was preparing to bring forth [his] sentence, straightway his soul, leaving the body, began to cry out, "Clean, Clean." Order four, tractate two, chapter seven.

So great once was the prudence in a certain Rabbi, that by this cunning he eluded both the Devil and God at once. When the Rabbi was laboring in the last article of life, he entreated the Devil with prayers that he would lead him — now already dying — even to the gates of the heavenly kingdom, that, the place of the divine habitation being inspected thence, he might depart glad from this life. When the Devil had granted this favor to [his] old friend, the Rabbi, casting himself at once within the gates of heaven, swore by the living God that he would never withdraw thence; for which cause God was compelled to keep the man with him, lest he make him a perjurer. And thus, by this one art, the most prudent man deceived God and the Devil at once.

AGAINST THE SAINTS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.

When the Angel Gabriel had committed a grave crime, God commanded him to be scourged with a fiery whip. Order two, tractate five, chapter eight.

Adam coupled with all living things, as well males as females, nor ever satisfied his lust, until [afterward] he lay with Eve. Order three, tractate one, chapter six.

The Raven sent out by Noah at the time of the flood was unwilling to depart from the ark; for it feared lest, after its departure, Noah should couple with the crow, its wife. Order four, tractate four.

Job never was among human affairs [never existed], and his history is a fiction. Order four, tractate three.

David did not sin in adultery and in homicide; and whoever shall have believed that he sinned in these is a heretic. Order two, tractate one, chapter five.

AGAINST THE LAW OF MOSES.

That it is lawful to use one's own wife in the masculine manner. Wherefore, when two women had complained of this matter before the synagogue, the Rabbis answered that the man is the lord of the wife, and that therefore he can use the body of his wife howsoever he will — not otherwise than he who buys a fish; for he can eat at his pleasure of both the anterior and the posterior parts of his fish. Order three, tractate three, chapter two, and folio twenty, face two.

If anyone shall have joined to himself in matrimony either his own daughter or his own sister, he does a thing most acceptable to God. Order two, tractate one.

A Rabbi who does not hate his enemy even unto death, and who does not seek vengeance against him, is unworthy of the name of Rabbi. Order five, tractate one, chapter two.

That those who contradict the words of the Scribes are to be punished more grievously than [those who contradict] the words of the Mosaic law: whoever contradicts the latter can be absolved, but whoever shall have contradicted the words of the Rabbis, let him die the death. Order four, tractate four, chapter ten.

If witnesses shall have been convicted of falsity, they ought to be punished with the penalty of retaliation [talion]; but if it shall have happened that the accused was unjustly condemned, and so afflicted with punishment, then the false witnesses ought to be absolved, and punished with no penalty. Order four, tractate 4.

If the greater part of the Judges shall have condemned someone to death, he ought to die; but if all, none excepted, shall have consented in his condemnation, let him be absolved. Order four, folio seventeen.

If anyone shall have found a purse in a public place, and shall have known that its owner has already despaired of finding the purse, he is not held to the restitution of the purse. Order four, tractate two, chapter five.

AGAINST CHARITY AND HUMANITY.

We ordain that every Jew thrice in the day blaspheme the whole nation of the Christians, and pray God that he confound and exterminate it together with its kings and princes; and this the priests of the Jews do especially, praying in the synagogue thrice daily, in hatred of Jesus of Nazareth. Order one, tractate one, chapter four.

That God commanded the Jews that, by any means whatever — whether by fraud, or by force, or by usury, or by the sword — they should claim to themselves the goods of the Christians. In the same place.

It is commanded to all the Jews that they hold all Christians in the place of brutes, [and] that they treat them not otherwise than brute animals. Order four, tractate 8.

If the beast of a Jew shall have killed the beast of a Christian, the Jew is not held to pay the price for it; but if the beast of a Christian shall have killed a Jew's beast, the Jew is held to compel the Christian to make restitution for the beast. Order four, tractate one, chapter four, folio thirty-eighth.

A Jew may do to the gentiles neither good nor evil in any wise; but let him strive, with all zeal and industry, to take a Christian out of life. Order four, tractate eight, chapter two.

If any Hebrew, while he wishes to kill a Christian, should by chance happen to kill a Jew, he is worthy of absolution. Order four, tractate four, and nine.

If any Jew shall have seen a Christian near a precipice, he is bound straightway to cast him down. Order four, tractate eight — with which, in the same tractate, the author Raualfez [R. Alfasi] agrees, chapter two, folio 355, face two; and the volume Arba Turim, in the book Ioradea [Yoreh Deah], chapter one hundred fifty-eighth.

The empire of the Christians is more execrable than the empire of the other nations; and it is a lighter sin to serve a gentile prince than a Christian. Order two, tractate one, chapter five, folio eleven and fifteen.

That the temples [churches] of the Christians are houses of perdition and places of idolatry, which the Jews are bound to destroy. Order two, tractate one, chapter two.

The Gospels of the Christians — which ought to be entitled "iniquity revealed and sin made manifest" — ought to be burned by the Jews, even if the name of God should be contained in them. In the same place.

OTHER HERESIES AND SUPERSTITIONS.

That the souls of men migrate from body into body by this law: that if the soul sin in the first body, it be sent into a second; in which, if it sin again, it is sent into a third body; in which, if it cease not to sin, it is at last thrust down into gehenna. Order four, tractate 2, and in many other places.

That the soul of Abel migrated into Seth, but the soul of Seth into Moses. In the same place.

The souls of unlearned men will not receive their bodies in the resurrection. Order three, tractate two, folio three.

Two Rabbis, each several week, on the day before the Sabbath, used to create two calves, which then they ate whole. Order four, tractate four, chapter two, folio 65.

Whosoever shall have eaten thrice on the Sabbath will attain eternal life in the other world. Order two, tractate one, chapter six.

Nothing ought to be eaten in an even number, but in an odd; for in this number God is especially delighted. Order four, tractate 2, chapter 7.

If anyone shall have prayed with face turned to the south, he will attain wisdom; but to the north, riches. Order four, tractate 3, chapter 2, folio 25.

If anyone shall have passed under the belly of a camel, or between two camels, or between two women, he will never be able to learn anything from the Talmud. Order four, tractate 10, chapter 1.

If anyone shall have denied the Talmudic books — in which are contained the aforesaid most holy precepts — he denies God himself. In the Preface of the whole Talmud.

VERBORVM Domini Liber — The Book of the Words of the Lord — is cited in the Recognitions of Clement. There are those who suppose this to be the book out of which Paul (as is had in the volume of Acts, chapter twenty), speaking to the presbyters of Ephesus, brought forth the oracle of Christ, saying:[1] "It behooves [us] to remember the word of the Lord Jesus (since he himself said): It is more blessed to give than to receive." But certain others think that Paul said this either as received from tradition, or that he deduced it by reasoning out of various sentences of the Gospels signifying the same thing — such as these: "Give to everyone that asks you," and "Lend, hoping for nothing thence."

VERBA vetera — Ancient Words, in Hebrew הַדְּבָרִים הָעַתִּיקִים Haddevarim Hatthikim, or, according to the Seventy interpreters, λόγοι παλαιοί (logoi palaioi), that is, Ancient sayings — this work is cited in the first [book] of Paralipomenon, chapter four,[2] the expositors being in doubt as much about the work itself as about the things which are reported to be written in it. The author of the book of Questions, or of the Hebrew Traditions, reckons this work to be the book of Ruth,[3] because it contains those same things which in the first [book] of Paralipomenon are taken from the book of the Ancient Words. Certain of the Hebrews think it to be another work far different, comprising a particular history of the ancestors of King David. And concerning those things also which were written in the same volume of the Ancient Words, there is no less hesitation. For our Vulgate edition shows that in this book was described the history of certain princes of the tribe of Judah who reigned in Moab, and the history of a certain illustrious man of the same tribe, who — about two hundred years after Joshua the Ephraimite, leader of the Hebrews, who first made the Sun to stand still — himself, the miracle being renewed, delayed the course of the Sun. For thus it is read in the Vulgate Latin edition:[4] "AND [they] WHO made the Sun to stand still, and the Men of Lying, and Secure, and Walking, who were princes in Moab, and who returned to Lehem [Bethlehem]. These are the ancient words." But, on the contrary, in the Hebrew exemplars and in the Greek codices, nothing of these things is read, but other things far distant from these are had,[5] in these words: "And Joachin, and the men of Cozeba, and Joash, and Saraph, who reigned in Moab, and [those] dwelling in Lachem. And these are ancient words." For which the Seventy thus translated (λόγοι παλαιοί): that is, "And Joachin, men of Chozeba, and Joash, and Sapham, who had dominion over the people of Moab, and [those] dwelling in Lehem. And these are ancient sayings." Which words indeed — as well the Greek as the Hebrew (as appears even to those who have but tasted Hebrew and Greek with the outermost lips) — have nothing concerning the miraculous standing of the Sun which is read among us. Yet the author of the Hebrew Traditions, in the reading of our—

—our [edition] seems to approve; which also, expounding, he thus writes: "But that which follows — WHO MADE THE SUN TO STAND STILL — returns to the offspring of Pharez, from whom David sprang, judging it opportune to terminate in David the reckoning of the offspring of Judah, from which tribe the royal line arose. For the Hebrews hand down that this [man] was Elimelech, the husband of Naomi, the father of Mahlon and Chilion, in whose time the Sun stood still on account of the transgressors of the law — so that, such a miracle being seen, they might be converted to the Lord their God; which, because they scorned to do, therefore the famine grew strong: so that he who in the tribe of Judah had seemed the foremost, by the want of famine, together with his wife and sons, was not only driven from his fatherland, but also died, together with his sons, in that same pilgrimage. But that the 'men of lying' are Mahlon and Chilion — who here are called Securus [Secure] and Incedens [Walking], according to the proper interpretation of the name, and of whom it is said that they were 'princes in Moab,' because they took Moabite wives — is more expressly set down in the Hebrew; and we have learned from those learned in that tongue that they are to be called not 'princes,' but 'husbands.' But that which follows — WHO RETURNED TO LEHEM — Naomi and Ruth show, who returned into Lehem, that is, into Bread (the abundance of bread being heard of after the want of famine), into Bethlehem. And because this history is written in the book of Ruth, therefore there follows: AND THESE ARE THE ANCIENT WORDS." Thus far the author of the Hebrew Questions.

Lyra,[1] from the opinion of the Hebrew masters, adds that the Sun ceased from its course not by the prayers and supplications of Elimelech (who was most avaricious, and in the time of famine withdrew into the region of Moab, lest he should be compelled to bring aid from his riches to his imperiled fatherland), but that this happened by the most pious will of God, who by that miracle willed to deter his people from [their] crimes.

VITAE Liber — The First Book of Life,[2] which David in Psalm 63 names ספר חיים Sepher Chaiim, that is, the Book of the living — is the divine enrollment of the predestined unto eternal life; or, as Augustine hands down in the twentieth [book] On the City of God, it is the knowledge of God by which he predestined those to whom he foreknew that he would give eternal life. Of which book Paul, in the epistle to the Philippians, says:[3] "WHOSE names are in the book of Life." And Christ said to his disciples:[4] "REJOICE, because your names are written in heaven." Now this book is of such moment for eternal felicity[5] that no one can attain it who has not been enrolled in it — John saying:[6] "THERE shall not enter into it [any], save those who are written in the book of life of the Lamb." And Daniel says:[7] "IN that time shall thy whole people be saved, whosoever shall be found written in the book." But, on the contrary, whosoever shall not have been written in this book will either live forever in [his] sins, or at least will depart a sinner out of this life, and, after this life, will be smitten with the punishment of eternal damnation. For concerning the wicked life of those who are not in this book, John is witness, saying:[8] "ALL WORSHIPPED the beast, whose names are not written in the Book of Life of the Lamb, who was slain from the origin of the world." And again:[9] "THEY SHALL WONDER, the inhabitants of the earth, whose names are not written in the book of Life from the constitution of the world." Concerning the everlasting perishing also of the same, the same John adds:[10] "THIS is the second death: he who was not found written in the Book of Life was cast into the pool of fire." There is, then, a First Book of Life,[11] consisting of the standing and perpetual knowledge, in the mind of God, of predestination — of which Paul, writing to Timothy, said:[12] "The firm foundation of God stands: the Lord knows who are his."

But some,[13] to whom it is not altogether pleasing that the Book of Life be the knowledge of predestination, are wont to use these arguments against the aforesaid [view]. First: because the knowledge of predestination contains not all, but only some — and those very few — as elect; whereas the Book of Life seems to comprehend all men, however many there are, according to that sentence of David:[14] "In thy book all shall be written." "All," that is, not only the perfect, but also (as Augustine says) the imperfect. Then: since the decrees of divine predestination are eternal, fixed, and indelible, the knowledge of predestination cannot rightly be signified and expressed by the Book of Life — in which both that things written are deleted, and things deleted are written again, the divine letters testify in many places, especially in the volume of Exodus, where God says to Moses:[15] "WHOEVER shall have sinned against me, I will delete him out of my book"; and in the Apocalypse:[16] "HE that shall conquer, I will not delete his name out of the book of life, and I will confess his name before my Father, and before his angels." And David, among other evils which he imprecates upon the impious, says:[17] "LET THEM BE DELETED out of the Book of the living, and with the just let them not be written." Lastly: if the Book of Life were the very enrollment of the elect and predestined, Moses would never have wished and sought to be deleted out of this very Book, saying:[18] "LORD, either forgive them this offense; or, if thou do it not, delete me out of thy Book which thou hast written." For as no wise [man] ought to ask that those things be done which he already knows can in no way be done, so no one who truly loves God ought — or is able — to wish that he be cast out of the number of the friends and elect of God, and be excluded from the eternal fruition of the divine majesty.

TO THESE ARGUMENTS it is easily answered: namely, that that sentence of Psalm 138 pertains not to all — as much reprobate as elect — but to the elect alone,[19] of whom David said, "IN thy book all shall be written" — "all," namely, whosoever are elect before the constitution of the world unto eternal life, whether they be perfect, or whether they be as yet imperfect in the way of virtue. But as to what they say — that the Book of Life is different from the enrollment of eternal predestination, because the former can be deleted and changed, but the latter is wholly immovable and indelible — Augustine dissolves [this], in the exposition of Psalm 68, saying that no one[20] is deleted from the Book of Life according to the truth of the matter; because, if a man, concerning the title which he had inscribed upon the Lord's cross, said:[21] "WHAT I HAVE WRITTEN, I HAVE WRITTEN," how much more will God will that what he has written remain undeleted? But some[22] are said to be deleted according to the opinion and hope of certain men, who thought that they were written in the Book of Life — in which they had never been written. According to which manner of speaking it is said, "LET THEM BE DELETED OUT OF THE BOOK OF THE LIVING"[23] — that is, let it become known even to them, and be made manifest, that they had never been enrolled in the Book of God. In another way also, from the doctrine of Augustine, D[ivus] Thomas answers, in the 24th question of the first part, article 3: that some are [written] in the Book of God simply — that is, according to the purpose of eternal predestination unto——unto eternal life to be attained, are written [in the Book of God], and these cannot be deleted; but certain [others] according to something — that is, according to the sole grace of present justice — and these can be deleted, because they had been written in the Book of Life not for eternal time and for the attaining of eternal glory indelibly, but designated only for the brief time of present grace by a deletable writing. Which same sentence, others — expressing it in different words — say that the Book of Life is written within and without,[1] and that some are written within, who can in no way be deleted, but others without and extrinsically, whom nothing prohibits both to be deleted, and, being deleted, to be written again.

There are also [those] who add a third response similar to this, saying that there are two Books of Life:[2] one, in which are written those alone whom God has destined for everlasting beatitude by the infallible and immutable decree of predestination — and from this [Book] none of those enrolled [can] be deleted; the other, in which are written those who live according to this present justice and the disposition of temporal grace, remaining written in it so long as, exercising the grace of God, they live pleasing to God, but who are deleted straightway, when — the grace of God being rejected — they cease to live justly.

But as to that which they add — that Moses, a most wise man and most loving of God, would by no means have sought to be deleted from the Book of Life,[3] if that Book contained the indelible writing of the predestined — there are various responses of the Fathers, showing that this petition of Moses is in no way adverse to our opinion; which [responses] it does not irk [me] to relate in this place, that from these each one may choose that which shall more please him.

JEROME,[4] in the ninth question to Algasia, following the opinion of Origen (which is had in the commentaries on the epistle to the Romans), says that Moses, out of charity toward God and toward his people, was unwilling to be deleted from the Book of Life forever, but for the present — not in spirit, but in flesh, that is, through bodily death — just as Paul also wished to be made anathema for his brethren,[5] that is, to be mortified the whole day (according to the sentence of the psalm), alone to perish for them in the flesh, and to shed [his] blood, that his brethren might be saved in spirit.

JOHN Chrysostom,[6] in the book On Compunction of Heart, and in book 3 On the Providence of God, and in homily 16 on the epistle to the Romans, rejects the opinion of those who think that Moses and Paul spoke of temporal death, judging [thus]: "FOR HOW," he says, "could Paul have wished to be made anathema from Christ — that is, to be separated from him through the death of the flesh — since death itself rather joins him to that choir which is with Christ, and makes [him] obtain his glory? This suspicion, therefore, is [that] of little worms lurking in the mud; for both Moses and Paul, when they said these things, not only in thought transcended all the contests and death of the present life, but even — for God, whom they loved more than themselves — surmounting the heavens and the angels, and despising all invisible things, and, for the love of God, to fall away from the very fruition of God and [his] ineffable glory, not only sought, but (what is more) even wished. For thus the insatiable affection of charity overcame their whole mind, that even that which above all other things was more lovable [to them] — to enjoy God, and the kingdom of the heavens, and the divine fruition which they were expecting, the reward of [their] labors — they suffered to be forfeited: namely, lest God should be so mocked and blasphemed by the impious on account of the very beloved [ones], because — since he could not fulfill the promises made to his people, whom he had chosen — he should have deserted them, and should have introduced into their goods other nations, which had never known him."

AUGUSTINE,[7] in question 147 on the book of Exodus, says that Moses, out of a certain immense security of divine familiarity, interpellated God with such a reasoning: "Either forgive them this offense, or delete me out of thy book — but thou wilt not delete me out of thy book, in which thou hast enrolled me with an indelible character: forgive them, therefore, this offense." Which kind of argumentation the common crowd of Dialecticians is wont to deduce from that rule:[8] "From the whole disjunctive [proposition], affirmatively, with the destruction of one part, the argument avails unto the other part of it" — as if we should say: "It is necessary that the soul be either mortal or immortal; but it is not mortal; therefore [it is] immortal."

EUTHYMIUS Zigabenus,[9] on Psalm 68 and 138, thus writes: "The Book of God is the sum of his knowledge; but the scripture [writing], indeed, [is] the perpetual memory" — for by "books" they figuratively understand the various and manifold cognition of God, [figured] by the divine letters. But here the book of divine knowledge is threefold:[10] of which one is more universal, in which all are written, as well the just as sinners, who are to come into this mortal life and a little after are to die — which David in Psalm 68 called "the book of the living," and which in Psalm 138 he signified, saying: "In thy book all shall be written." There is also another book of the knowledge of God, more private, in which the just alone are written, for this reason: that he knows them only — that is, approves [them] — according to that which is written:[11] "THE LORD knows the way of the just"; which [book] David indicated to us, saying:[12] "AND with the just let them not be written." There is also a third, particular book, in which sinners are written;[13] for "the judgment," as Daniel says, "sat, and the books were opened, and from these were judged the living and the dead."[14] Moses, therefore, spoke to God concerning that first universal book: "if indeed thou forgive them [their] sin, forgive [it]; but if not, delete me out of the book which thou hast written."[15]

BERNARD,[16] in sermon 12 on the Canticle of Canticles, thinks that Moses sought to be deleted from the Book of Life not in this sense, that he should be excluded from eternal glory, but rather that he asked this out of a certain paternal affection — namely, lest he alone, without his nation, should remain written in the Book of Life, and he alone should be introduced into eternal felicity, his people being excluded; but, as some poor little woman, invited to the banquet of a rich man on this condition — that she leave outside the little infant which she carries in [her] bosom, because it cries and will be troublesome to the banquet — would answer that she had rather fast than, the beloved pledge being set aside, dine alone with the rich [man]: so neither does Moses wish to be introduced alone into the joy of his Lord, his people (namely) remaining outside — to which, although restless and ungrateful, he clings in turn, and with a mother's affection.

RUPERT, Abbot of Deutz, in book 3 of the commentaries on Exodus, writes that Moses wished by these words to convince God that he should pardon the people, and that he used such an argument: "If [thou do] not——delete me out of the book of the law, that the memory of my name be not had in it — preferring rather that the memory of the things done by me be deleted by perpetual oblivion, than that the people perish." And let these things concerning the First Book of Life be enough said.

HUGH,[1] presbyter Cardinalis [Hugh of Saint-Cher], in the exposition of Psalm 138, says that there are twin Books of Life: one, of present justice and grace, out of which Moses preferred to be deleted rather than that the people should perish; the other, of everlasting predestination, out of which Moses did not wish to be deleted, knowing that from it none could be deleted.

THOMAS Cajetan, Cardinal of St. Sixtus, in the commentary on Exodus, believes this book to be the ordination of divine providence concerning those who in this world are to be princes; and he calls this book "of the principate." For it is written in the divine mind, and in it — as in a book — most diligently engraved who and how many and of what sort in this life are to be, among mortals, princes, leaders, and kings. But since God had said to Moses:[2] "LET ME ALONE, that my fury may be angry against the people, and I may delete them; but thee I will make into a great nation" — Moses had understood that God had written him in the book of the principate, from this: that even if that people should be destroyed, God would nonetheless constitute him Prince over a great nation. Therefore he asks that God either pardon this sin, or delete him out of the book of the principate — signifying by this that he does not wish to be prince of another nation, if this nation be consumed.

NICHOLAS of Lyra says that, just as our Savior — according to the will of the sensitive part [of the soul], dreading death — sought that the chalice of the passion be transferred from him (which the rational will most ardently desired): so Moses, according to the desire of the lower part of the soul,[3] sought from God to be deleted out of the book of life; which, however, according to the superior portion of the soul, he did not wish [done] — explaining by this prayer not what the Mind itself, consenting to God, would will, but what the will of the flesh itself would desire for its own flesh, that is, compassionating his own people.

ALPHONSUS [Tostatus], bishop of Ávila, in the commentaries on Exodus, teaches that this saying is not to be understood according to the naked and simple signification of the word, but according to a hyperbolic trope, by which we are wont to express the most ardent desire of a thing eagerly demanded, saying: "Either grant me this, or I shall die" — which trope indeed Rachel used, when she said to her husband:[4] "Give me children, otherwise I shall die." Not that she preferred children to life did she say this, but that she might demonstrate, by this figure of pathetic speech, hyperbolically, [her] most vehement desire of having offspring.

RABBI Moses Gerundensis [Nachmanides] hands down that Moses, scarcely master of himself, and almost rapt out of himself, uttered these [words] rather from the impulse of a most abundant charity than from the deliberation of reason.

RABBI Solomon Iarchi [Rashi] the Frenchman expounds: "DELETE ME OUT OF THY BOOK" — that is, "Delete me out of the book of the law, that the memory of my name be not had in it" — as above.

VITAE Liber Secundus — The Second Book of Life, which is also called the Book of the commandments of God — is the sacrosanct and divine scripture, deservedly called the Book of Life,[5] because in it are contained the promises of eternal life, together with the precepts necessary for attaining eternal life. Speaking of which, the most wise son of Sirach said:[6] "ALL THESE THINGS are the book of life, and the testament of the Most High, and the knowledge of truth." And the prophet Baruch:[7] "THIS is the book of the commandments of God, and the law which is forever; all who hold it shall come to life, but those who forsook it, unto death." And Christ, making words about this book to the lawyers, says:[8] "SEARCH the scriptures, for you think in them to have eternal life." Divine scripture is also called the Book of Life because the argument, scope, end, and whole intent of all sacrosanct scripture[9] is Christ, who everywhere calls himself Life, and our Life; whence also in Psalm 39 it is said:[10] "IN the head of the book it is written of me." Which Arnobius and Augustine expound of the book of Psalms, in the beginning of which is written:[11] "BLESSED is the man who has not gone in the counsel of the impious, and in the way of sinners has not stood, and in the seat of pestilence has not sat." Which words indeed can suit none more than Christ, who alone is without sin.[12] But Tertullian, in the book against Praxeas, and Hilary in the exposition of the second Psalm, understand by the "head of the book" the beginning of the whole divine scripture; where, for that which we read, "In the beginning God created heaven and earth,"[13] they read "In the son" — which the truth of the matter itself proves to be false.[14] For in the Hebrew it is not read בבן be ben, that is, "in the son," but בראשית bereshith, which the Seventy interpreters, and Symmachus, and Theodotion, and Jerome interpreted "In the beginning";[15] which beginning, nevertheless, Jerome, Augustine, and Gregory assert (according to the mystical and spiritual sense) to signify Christ the Son of God — who, both in the very front of Genesis (which is the head of all the books) and also in the beginning of John the Evangelist, is approved [to be] the founder of heaven and earth,[16] where it is said:[17] "ALL things were made through him, and without him was made nothing."

VITAE Liber Tertius — The Third Book of Life — is that which, in the Revelation of John, is called τὸ βιβλίον τοῦ ζωῆς τοῦ ἀρνίου [ἐσφαγμένου] ἀπὸ καταβολῆς κόσμου,[18] that is, the Book of Life of the Lamb slain from the origin of the world. Now this Lamb is our Savior, whom it is not doubtful to have been slain for our sins; although it be not so manifest to all how he was slain from the very first constitution of the world. Certain expositors — among whom is Rupert, Abbot of Deutz —[19] say that that phrase "from the origin of the world" is not to be referred to the slaying of the Lamb, but to those whom John had said were not written in the book of Life; so that it is to be read and understood by transposition: "Whose names are not written from the origin of the world in the Book of Life of the Lamb, who was slain." But others, and perhaps more rightly——more rightly, wish the slaying of the Lamb to be joined with the very origin of the world: in which [origin] the Lamb first began to be slain — not indeed in himself, since he was not yet clothed with flesh, but in his members and elect,[1] in whom the impious began to afflict him from the very first constitution of the world, slaying him in Abel, mocking [him] in Noah, casting [him] out in Abraham, persecuting [him] in Jacob, accusing and selling [him] in Joseph, making [him] an exile in Moses — who, as Paul says,[2] "esteemed the reproach of Christ above all the treasure of the Egyptians, choosing rather to be afflicted with the people than, in the court of Pharaoh, to be held in the place of a son." Whatever things, therefore, before the coming of the Lamb into the flesh, his members suffered, the Lamb himself is understood to have borne — just as also, after the resurrection of Christ, the persecutions brought upon his servants by Saul, Christ himself testified to be brought upon himself, saying:[3] "SAUL, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" The Lamb was also slain from the very first constitution of the world — not only in a temporal [way], but in an eternal [way], from the beginning and before the ages and the secular times, in that blessed foreknowledge and predestination of the divine mind,[4] in which God, in one and the same moment, established the creation of the world, foresaw the perdition of the world in the sin of Adam, and preordained the death of Christ for the life of the whole world: which the Apostles, after the Savior's assumption, openly knowing, said:[5] "LORD, who madest heaven and earth, &c. Truly there came together against Jesus, Herod and Pontius Pilate, with the gentiles and the peoples of Israel, to do what thy hand and thy counsel decreed to be done." The Lamb was also slain from the origin of the world, because — from the founding of the world even to the taking-up of our humanity — through the diverse ages of the flowing world he was, by various and innumerable figures, types, shadows, mysteries, sacraments, oblations, oracles, prophecies, libations, victims, and sacrifices of the old testament, adumbrated and foreshown:[6] that one and everlasting sacrifice by which the Lamb, slain on the altar of the cross, offered himself to the living God for an odor of sweetness. This Lamb, therefore, lifted up and slain on the cross, is called the Book of Life[7] — not only for this, that his death is our life (life, I say, and resurrection from the death of sin — the life of present grace, and the life of everlasting felicity), but because Christ, exalted on the wood of the cross, is, as it were, a certain famous and conspicuous book: not [written] on papyrus and parchments, but fitted [written] in the very flesh and members of Christ; not with ink or vermilion inscribed, but with the precious and undefiled blood of the immaculate Lamb; not with pens and the feathers of birds, but with thorns, nails, whips, and lances engraved from head to heel; and with the twin wood of the cross, as it were within two writing-tablets, joined together and enclosed. Out of which book, indeed, any Christian can take the most perfect institution of the Christian life; nor is there anyone — however rude and dull a mannikin — who, if only he will, cannot in it (as in a compendium, and, as it were, at a single glance) at once read and learn thoroughly whatsoever things are necessary to a pious and truly Christian life: singular innocence, humility, obedience, the highest poverty, sublime contempt of the world, assiduous patience, incredible endurance of sorrows, most ardent charity, and all the other virtues most necessary for the entrance to eternal beatitude. For on this account the Book of Life of the Lamb — the pages of the whole fleshly volume being spread out on the cross — willed, as it were, to be opened and extended in a display-book [ypobiblium]: that in the very form of the cross and the effigy of the affixed body we might read, and as in a mirror contemplate, what manner of form and exemplar it behooves the best Christian to be — namely, that he compose himself to the image of the crucified man; that is, that he not only, denying himself, take up his cross daily and follow Christ, but (what is more laborious and more glorious) extend his whole body and soul, hands, feet, and works into the service of God,[8] and so affix his flesh, with all its vices, concupiscences, and carnal desires, to the cross, that he may piously glory with Paul, saying to Christ:[9] "I am nailed [crucified] with the Cross" — and likewise: "I bear the marks of the Lord Jesus in my body";[10] and again: "To me the world is crucified, &c., and I to the world." This, then, is the Book of Life of the Lamb, slain from the origin of the world; on beholding which, no one — unless utterly mad, or altogether impious — is not straightway compelled to acknowledge in what manner he ought to live.

VITAE LIBER QVARTVS — The Fourth Book of Life, or the Book of past life. This is called by another name by John,[11] the Book of the life of each one; for so the edition has [it] which he cites from the 20th chapter of the Apocalypse, and which Augustine expounds in book 20 On the City of God, and in homily 17 on the Apocalypse: καὶ βιβλίον ἄλλο ἠνοίχθη, ὅ ἐστι ζωῆς ἑκάστου — that is, "And another book was opened, which is [the book] of the life of each one." This book the Theologians say to be a certain divine power, by whose virtue, in the day of judgment, there shall so be brought back into the memory of each one his past deeds, and set before the eyes of the mind, that it shall be lawful to none then either to be ignorant of, or to dissemble, or to hide his sins.[12] Concerning this book also Augustine, in chapter 14 of book 20 On the City of God, writes thus:[13] "AND I saw," says John, "the dead, great and small: and the books were opened; and another book was opened, [which is] of the life of each one; and the dead were judged out of those scriptures of the books, according to their deeds. He said the books were opened, and a book — but the book, of what sort it is, he was not silent: WHICH IS," he says, "of the life of each one. Therefore those books which he placed in the first place are to be understood [as] the holy [scriptures], both old and new, that in them might be shown what things God had commanded to be done; but in that [book] WHICH IS of the life [of each one], what things each one had either done or not done of these [commands] — whether he had done [them], or had not done [them]. Which book, if it be carnally thought of, who could avail to estimate its magnitude or length? or in how great a time could that book be read, in which are written all the lives of all men? Or shall there be present a number of Angels equal to the number of men, that each one may hear his own life recited to him by an Angel assigned to him? There shall be, therefore, not one book of all, but single [books] of single [persons]. But this Scripture, wishing one [book] to be understood, says: another book was opened. There is, therefore, a certain divine power to be understood, by which it shall come to pass that to each one all his deeds, whether good or bad, shall be recalled into memory, and be discerned by the intuition of the mind with a wondrous swiftness, so that knowledge may accuse or excuse conscience; and thus at once both all and single shall be judged. Which divine power, indeed, has received the name of 'book'; for in it, in a certain manner, whatsoever is done by the doer is read [back]." These things Augustine, in—

THE FIFTH BOOK OF LIFE, and the last of all — which is also called the book of eternal Life — is the blessed and everlasting presence of Christ the Son of God according to [his] divinity, by the sight of which he bestows upon his beholders the eternal felicity of the glorious life. Of which book Augustine, in the treatise On the threefold dwelling, chapter 4, thus speaks: [1] "IN THAT heavenly city the food and drink of all will be the vision of Christ and of the holy Trinity, and the contemplation, with the pure eye of the heart, of his very divinity, and the assiduous reading — so to speak — of the book of Life, that is, of eternal truth, and of the highest wisdom, and of the Word of God, because it is the vision of Christ Jesus: where whatsoever is now hidden from us will be manifest; where the reason will be manifest why this man was elected and that one reprobated; why this one was taken up into the kingdom, and that one reduced into servitude; why one dies in the womb, another in infancy, another in youth, another in old age; why one is poor and another rich; why the son of an adulteress is baptized, and sometimes the son of a lawful spouse dies before baptism; why he who begins to live well sometimes ends ill, and he who begins ill often ends well. All these things, and many of this kind, will be plain and open to all in the book of Life." Thus far the words of Augustine — to which we once alluded, in the epitaph of Cyprian, that most excellent Theologian, in this distich:

If aught of sacred things by chance lay hidden from you,

Now, Cyprian, you read [it] in the book of life.

There are also [those] who judge that by this last book of Life is signified a certain created light, flowing forth perpetually from that uncreated, Vital, and perennial fountain of divine light: by the splendor of which created light our mind — by its own nature blind, and too weak to behold the incomprehensible majesty of God — lays aside the dullness of its darkened eyes, and is raised up to the sublimity of the divine vision. Of which volume, and of the vital fountain of the same light, David sang in the Psalm: [2] FOR with thee is the Fountain of Life, and in thy light we shall see light. And John in the Apocalypse, [3] speaking of the fellowship of the blessed who see God; and Christ, concerning the same light, added: [4] HE who follows me walks not in darkness, but shall have the light of life. According to the opinion of these, it is the same as the book of Life.

A VOLUME (in Hebrew מגלת ספר Meghilath Sepher [the Roll of the Book]), for which the Seventy put κεφαλὶς βιβλίου, that is, "the head-roll of a book," and by Jerome "a rolled-up book," is a kind of oblong sheet, rollable around itself in the manner of a coil, after the manner of the Orientals, who even in this age thus roll up their books. A book of this kind, filled with great mysteries, the prophet Ezekiel describes as shown to him in a vision, in the 2nd chapter of his prophecy, in these words: [5] AND I SAW, and behold, a hand was sent to me, in which was a rolled-up book, and he spread it before me, which was written within and without; and there were written in it lamentations, and a song, and woe; and he said to me, Son of man, eat this volume, and go, speak to the sons of Israel. And I opened my mouth, and he fed me with the volume, &c. And I ate it, and it became in my mouth sweet as honey.

Which words Rabbi David Kimchi thus expounds: [6] THE VOLUME of the book signifies the knowledge of prophesying divinely given to Ezekiel; but that which is in it — the writing of lamentations, and mournful songs, and woe — denotes the lamentable matter of the prophecies which the prophet was to announce to the people, namely the just wrath of God for the crimes of the Jews, and the imminent vengeance of divine justice upon the holy city, and the other future calamities of his whole nation — so copious that, since they could not be grazed [contained] upon the inner face of the sheet, it was necessary that they be extended also over the whole outer part of the page. And the volume was spread open before Ezekiel, that he might know that the understanding of prophecy falls to no one, save to him for whom God has opened the wrapping of his secrets. He was also commanded first to devour the book before he should speak to the people, that he might mark that the prophetic revelations were not to be run over cursorily by him, but to be eagerly received, and to be thoroughly digested [cooked down] in the belly of inner meditation, before they be poured out.

But the prophet's volume was at first sweet, like honey: because the knowledge of the divine judgments, and the meditation of the divine vengeances — which the impious shun and abhor — are to the just the greatest delight. For the just man shall rejoice, says the Psalm, when he shall see the vengeance. [7] But after the prophet had digested the volume in his belly, he perceived it to be bitter; and on account of this, a little after its devouring, he added: AND I went away bitter and sad in the indignation of my spirit. For when he began to preach the things which he had learned with the highest sweetness, straightway he experienced in himself the bitterness of toil, of persecution, of prison, and at last even the punishment of inflicted death. Rabbi Solomon [Rashi] judges that in this volume, on account of the narrowness of the page, the several afflictions of the Jews were not described in particular, but only those three words mentioned by the prophet — namely קינים והגה והי Kinim, Hegha, Hi, that is, Lamentations, Muttering [Sighing], Woe — by which all the losses of the Jews are denoted, comprised in a summary. And the book is said to be written on front and back, because its words contain the signification both of present and of future calamities. Jerome and Gregory, [8] interpreting this place mystically, say that that volume is the book of divine scripture — which indeed is therefore called "rolled up," because it is wrapped in so great a depth of mysteries that it is permitted to no one to look into and understand it, unless the extended hand of God, which is Christ, first spread it open, and, spread open, explain it. And it is written within and without: that is, within by allegory and the spiritual understanding, without by the sense of the letter and history; within, teaching invisible things and promising heavenly [things]; without, prescribing visible and earthly [things], insofar as they are to be sought or to be shunned. There are also written in it, according to the interpretation of the Seventy, θρῆνος, καὶ μέλος, καὶ οὐαί — Lamentation, Song, and Woe. And first Lamentation, because in it, before all things, penitence is proclaimed to sinners; Song, or Verse, or Canticle, because there is promised to the just as a re—[continuing from p147] …reward, song, and exultation of eternal felicity; Woe, because there [in it] the misery of everlasting damnation is foretold to the impious. It is likewise needful to eat a volume of this kind — that is, of truth — to store away in the depth of the heart the pastures that are in it, and to ruminate [upon them] with the assiduous thought of the mind so long, until you are compelled to burst forth into that voice of David: [1] HOW sweet are thy words to my jaws, above honey to my mouth.

A FLYING VOLUME (which by Zechariah is called מגלה עפה Meghila Apha): Aquila and Theodotion rendered [it] διφθέρα, that is, a Skin, or a goatskin membrane — like that skin of the goat Amalthea, on which the poets feign that Jupiter writes human affairs; Symmachus rendered [it] τὴν κεφαλίδα, that is, the Chapter, or the summary, according to that [text]: "In the chapter of the book it is written of me"; the Seventy translated δρέπανον πετόμενον, that is, a Flying Sickle; Jonathan, a Flying Little-book; but Jerome rendered [it] "a Flying Volume." The vision of this volume is described by the prophet Zechariah in this manner: [2] AND I TURNED, and lifted up my eyes, and saw, and behold a flying volume; and he said to me, What seest thou? And I said, I see a flying volume: its length twenty cubits, and its breadth ten cubits. And he said to me, This is the curse that goes forth over the face of the whole earth; for every thief, as it is there written, shall be judged, and everyone who swears [falsely], from this likewise shall be judged. I will bring it forth, says the Lord of hosts, and it shall come to the house of the thief, and to the house of him who swears a lie in my name; and it shall abide in the midst of his house, and shall consume it, both its timbers and its stones. Thus far Zechariah.

That volume was not compacted of many sheets, as ours are, but of only one oblong membrane, rollable around itself — which our notaries call a Roll [Rotulus]. [3] And it is said to have had a length of twenty cubits, and a breadth of ten cubits, which are dimensions equal to the vestibule of the temple; because it seemed to the prophet that the volume itself was going forth out of the temple. For although — Rabbi David Kimki says — at that time that temple of Solomon (whose vestibule's length extended to twenty cubits and breadth to ten) lay utterly wasted and demolished, yet from thence, the proportion of length and breadth which had formerly been in it being preserved, Zechariah saw that volume go forth. And this is what he says: This is the curse that goes forth, &c.

AND this volume was written on both sides, as well on the back as on the front. On the one side was written the execration of the [false] swearer, in these words: כל הגונב מזה כמוה נקה Cal haggoneb mize camoah nikka, that is, Everyone who steals from another, even as he is, shall be cut off. On the other side was contained the curse of the perjurer, of this kind: כל הנשבע מזה כמוה נקה Cal annischba mize camoah nikka, that is, Everyone who swears falsely against another, even as he is, shall be cut off. Now when this volume flew through the whole earth, it came to the houses of those who stole and who swore mendaciously; and there it began to abide in the very inner chambers of the houses; nor would it depart thence before it had consumed the timbers, the stones, and the walls of the houses together with the owners themselves.

John Chrysostom — in homilies 15 and 26 to the people of Antioch, reading (according to the edition of the Seventy) "a Flying Sickle" — interprets this place thus: [4] A FLYING SICKLE signifies the most swift onset of vengeance, pursuing false oaths. The breadth and length of many cubits indicates the vehemence, and the magnitude, of the evils; but that it flies from heaven [signifies] that the sentence is borne from the supreme tribunal. The sickle-shaped form [signifies] the inevitable lot of punishment; for just as a sickle, wherever it strikes, not only seizes [the thing] with itself, but also cuts off the head, so likewise the penalty rushing upon perjurers is most difficult [to escape]. And it dissolves the stones and timbers of the perjurer's house, that its ruin may be a correction to others; for after the dead perjurer must be buried in the earth, the house being dissolved and the ruin made, it will be an admonition through the sight to all who pass by and behold, lest they dare the same things and suffer the same. For God wills the punishments of the most grievous sinners to remain continual, and the accusers of the dead man's crime to be perpetual, that all hereafter may be corrected.

Paul, bishop of Burgos, judges that by the Flying Volume is signified the impious volume of the Talmudic books: which is called "Flying," because it has no solidity of a stable foundation; and is called "a Curse," by reason of its execrable doctrine; but because it seems to go forth from the temple and holy doctrine, it is said to have measures of length and breadth conformable to the temple. And it destroys the houses to which it comes, because this cursed volume will at last bring the utmost destruction of souls and of bodies upon the whole race of the Jews.

XERXES, whom Ezra calls Artaxerxes, king of the Persians and Medes, son of Darius Hystaspes, wrote to Ezra the high priest one letter concerning the bringing back of the people of the Jews into [their] fatherland, and concerning the restoring of the temple for the Jerusalemites; the copy of which is read in the first [book] of Ezra, chapter 7, and in the third [book] of Ezra, chapter 8, and in Josephus in book 11 of the Antiquities, chapter 5. He wrote likewise to Sadaeus, prefect of Syria and Samaria, a letter of commendation for Nehemiah, his cupbearer, [5] setting out for the restoration of the temple of Jerusalem. [continuing from p148] …the Synopsis of Athanasius enumerates [it] among the writings of impiety to be detested.

The Book OF JEALOUSY (ספר קנאת Sepher Kenaoth), that is, the Book, or leaf, or paper of Jealousy, was that which the priest cast into the cup of reproof of a woman suspected of adultery, either for the detecting of her hidden crime, or for the defending of her doubtful innocence. For — as the fourth book of Moses, and Philo, and the other Rabbis of the Jews testify [1] — among the Hebrews the occasion and rite of writing this book was of this kind:

When a husband had come into a vehement and just suspicion of his wife, first he admonished her that she should abstain from the suspected company [of the man]; and if the woman had neglected to do so, the husband was bound to abstain from her until she should be purged. Meanwhile he went up to Jerusalem, to the chief Judges of the Synagogue, and disclosed the causes of his suspicion. They, on a day appointed for the woman, when she had appeared, admonished her that she should prudently weigh the matter with herself; and if she were innocent, that she should purge herself with confidence; but if not, that she should beware of the danger which she was about to bring upon herself, and not so obstinately court victory at the peril of death, but ingenuously confess her fault; [and] that she should remember [that] before her other women — even illustrious ones — had slipped into the same error through womanly frailty, such as the concubine of the Patriarch Jacob with Reuben, and Tamar with Judah. If she, being persuaded, did not deny the sin, she was dismissed to lead thenceforth a solitary life, without a husband, without dowry, and without any honor. But if she persisted in the resolve of purging herself, then the woman was clothed in a mournful and dark garment, and was led by women robed in black into the temple, and was set before the priest — not without the tears of those leading her; and the priest, with outstretched hand, drew off the covering of the woman's head, that she might be judged with head uncovered, without the insignia of modesty, as was the custom in all capital controversies. Then, a little book or paper being taken, he wrote in it the execration taken from the fourth book of Moses, in these words: [2] IF a strange man has not slept with thee, and if thou art not defiled, having deserted thy husband's bed, these most bitter waters, into which I have heaped up curses, shall not harm thee; but if thou hast turned aside from thy husband, and art defiled, and hast lain with another man, thou shalt lie subject to these curses: MAY the Lord make thee a curse, and an example among all in his people; may he make thy thigh to rot, and thy swollen belly to burst. Let the cursed waters enter into thy belly, and, the womb rotting, let thy thigh rot, and thy swollen belly burst.

These things, together with the name of the wretched woman, being written on the little sheet, he read out with a loud voice; and, the woman answering, AMEN, AMEN, the priest, taking an earthen urn, poured into it certain most bitter waters, into which he had mixed dust of the earth gathered from the floor of the temple, and had heaped in many dire and lethal execrations; then, the little book being cast into the urn, he washed it so long, until the water had dissolved the letters. These things done, he handed the water to the woman to drink, saying: DRINK now the cup of reproof, which will lay bare and uncover things uncertain and hidden — [thou] who art presently to receive either the reward of chastity or the utmost penalty of a violated marriage. And she drank the water; and if she had suffered calumny [been falsely accused], the water gave [her] a happy conception and childbirth; but if she was not free from fault, straightway, as she had drunk down the washing of that little book, her face grew pale, her eyes started out, her belly swelled, her thigh fell away, her knees gave way, and with intolerable torments her womb was burst — [that womb] which she had refused to keep pure for her husband. And this was the wretched end of her life.

This mode of purgation — as well in this [matter] as in the other vehement suspicions of crimes — the Church of Christ afterward abolished. [3] Yet there is found in the acts of the provincial Council of Worms a canon concerning the purging of monks from the suspicion of theft, [4] written in these words: IT OFTEN happens that thefts are perpetrated in monasteries, and he who commits them is unknown; therefore we ordain that, when the brothers themselves must purge themselves of such [charges], a Mass be celebrated by the Abbot, or by someone whom the Abbot himself has appointed, in the presence of the brothers; and thus, in the last celebration of the Mass, for their purgation, let them receive the body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, that thereby they may show themselves to be innocent; and to the communicants let the Eucharist be delivered with these words: MAY THE BODY OF OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST BE TO THEE THIS DAY FOR A PROOF. Thus the Council of Worms.

But this canon was abrogated by the decree of Pope Stephen V: who, being consulted by Humbert, bishop of Mainz, whether parents — in whose bed infants were found dead in their sleep — ought, by the trial of hot iron, or of boiling water, or by some other similar experiment, to show that they had not smothered the children sleeping together with them, answered in this manner: [5] The sacred Canons do not grant that a confession be extorted from anyone by the trial of hot iron, or of boiling water, or by any other superstitious invention: for offenses made public by spontaneous confession, or by the approval of witnesses, the fear of God being had before the eyes, are committed to our government to judge; but hidden and unknown [things] are to be left to Him who alone knows the hearts of the sons of men.

On the art of expounding the volumes of the Holy Library

English translation — Bibliotheca Sancta, Book III

Note on the Latin sources. This English version is drawn from two copies of Sixtus's Bibliotheca Sancta. The front matter and pages 6–108 were translated from the 1586 Cologne edition (Maternus Cholinus), which carries few marginal notes; the marginal glosses were then supplied from a second, more heavily annotated copy of the same work. From page 109 onward the translation is made directly from that margin-rich copy. The printed leaf- and page-numbers in both copies are frequently misprinted, so pages are aligned by content and scan sequence rather than by the printed folios.

BOOK THREE

By F. Sixtus of Siena, of the Order of Preachers: On the Art of Expounding the Volumes of the Holy Library.

Preface

Concerning the sacred Scriptures and writers, and concerning the writings and writers that are mentioned in the sacred letters, enough (as I judge) has been said by us in the two preceding books. Now we must speak of those authors who illumined the divine Scriptures by the pious labors of their expositions. But since this cannot be done fittingly enough unless first there be explained the art, the method, and the order which those very expositors employed in expounding the sacred volumes, we have thought it worth the effort to comprehend briefly, in this third volume of the Holy Library, the plan and force of the whole art which the Catholic expositors have followed in explaining the divine letters; for once this has been rightly understood, those things will be grasped more easily and readily which we are to write, in the fourth book of this work, concerning the various explanations of the holy expositors.

The Definition and Division of the Art by which Sacred Scripture is Expounded

First of all, then — that we may begin from the Definition of the Art: we call the art of expounding the sacred letters [1] that [art] which teaches the precepts and rules necessary for the elucidation of divine Scripture. This whole [art], moreover, is divided into three parts, [2] that is, into the Definitive, the Inventive, and the Dispositive. The Definitive [3] enumerates, distinguishes, and defines the senses and expositions of the sacred letters, indicating how many and what are the senses of divine Scripture, and the kinds of its expositions. The Inventive [4] teaches [us] to seek out the senses — already defined — that lie hidden in the abstruse discourses of the sacred volumes, and, once they have been searched out by diligent investigation, to find them. The Dispositive [5] teaches [us] to bring the discovered senses of divine Scripture into the light by a fitting and duly accommodated arrangement of explanation, and to set them forth in the most apt order through the various modes, formulas, and methods of expounding — so that the greatness and majesty of the divine oracles may, so far as can be done, be nobly expressed according to the dignity of the matter, and that the devotees of the sacred volumes may be made more eager to read those beautifully arranged explanations of them. Approaching, therefore, the first part of this art, which is concerned with the definition of the senses and expositions, let us speak first about the senses themselves of sacred Scripture.

On the Twofold Sense of Divine Scripture

There are two senses of divine Scripture, the Historical and the Mystical. The Historical [6] is that which the narration of the deed done, and the series of the words under their common and customary signification — whether proper or metaphorical — represents in the outer bark of the letter. For there is a twofold variety, or mode, of the historical sense, [7] namely the proper and the metaphorical. The Proper is that which words and names present according to the first and bare signification of the word: as when by "wolf" and "fox" we understand the animals which are first signified by these words. But the Metaphorical [8] is that which words transferred and carried over to a new signification signify; or [that] which a figurative expression circumscribes — as when in common speech we designate some greedy person by the name of "wolf," and some crafty person by the word "fox"; or as when in the divine letters Christ is called lamb, lion, rock, vine, worm, and many more of that kind, [9] all of which are ascribed to Christ not properly, but through a certain likeness. The other sense, however — the Mystical and spiritual — is far more hidden and more sublime, which is not open to all, but lies concealed in the inmost marrow of the words; signified not through the words, but through the very things themselves, [10] as when by the bronze serpent, hung upon the wood, Christ lifted up on the cross is designated. The difference of the two senses Paul taught us in his second epistle to the Corinthians, [11] saying [that the Jews…]

(Rich PDF p. 151 — printed folio 134. The chapter On the Twofold Sense finishes (the veil on the Jews' hearts; circumcision of flesh vs. heart), then a new section On the Two Kinds of Exposition of the Sacred Writings — the Historical (illustrated by Christ's exposition of the Mosaic divorce law) and the Mystical, itself divided into Allegorical, Tropological, and Anagogical, each keyed to past, present, and future. Origen and Porphyry, the Essenes and Philo; then Christ's own allegorical and tropological expositions. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

[continuing from p150] …[that the Jews] read daily and hear the reading of the Old Testament according to the letter, but that a veil is placed over their heart, so that they do not understand the spiritual understanding which gives life; [1] and, writing to the Romans, he showed that the law concerning circumcision has a twofold sense: [2] one according to the letter — signifying the circumcision of the flesh only, whose praise is among men; the other according to the spirit — enjoining the circumcision of the heart, greatly praised by God.

On the Two Kinds of Exposition of the Sacred Writings

For the explication of these senses, then, two kinds of exposition have been devised, namely the Historical and the Mystical. Now the Historical exposition is that which elucidates the historical, or literal, sense; [3] which indeed our Lord Jesus Christ very often used in expounding the holy Scriptures. From these we may take, for example, His exposition of the law of Moses concerning the giving of the bill of divorce, which is written in Deuteronomy in these words: [4] If a man take a wife, and have her, and she find no favor in his eyes because of some uncleanness, he shall write a bill of divorce, and give it into her hand, and send her away out of his house. Since the Pharisees understood this law wrongly [5] — thinking that Moses had commanded husbands to dismiss, for any cause whatever, wives who had become hateful to them, and to take another — Christ declared it according to the true meaning of the Mosaic letter in this manner, saying: [6] Moses, for the hardness of your heart, permitted you to put away your wives: but from the beginning it was not so. And I say unto you, that whosoever shall put away his wife, except for fornication, and shall marry another, committeth adultery: and whoso marrieth her that is put away committeth adultery. Our Savior would have wished to say: You Jews are a race of men fiercer and wilder than the beasts, without the fear of God, without love and without mercy; and therefore Moses indeed permitted you [7] — but did not command you — to put away wives held in hatred: not as though it were anything lawful, but as a remedy provided against the avoidance of a greater evil, lest, driven by hatred and by despair of an inseparable marriage, you should turn to the murder of your spouse. For it has always been an evil to put away a wife for any cause whatever, and to take another — indeed [it is] against the very nature of matrimony, established from the beginning of the human race, whose law is: [8] For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife: and they shall be two in one flesh. This, therefore, is the first exposition — the historical, pertaining to the first sense of divine Scripture.

The other kind of Exposition — which is called Mystical, [9] that is, hidden, secluded, and spiritual, and is necessary for the elucidation of the mystical senses that are enclosed in the holy Scripture — comprises three particular species, or parts, of explanation: namely the Allegorical, the Tropological, and the Anagogical; distinguished according to the threefold difference of past, present, and future time. The Allegorical [10] makes manifest the foretokens and presages of the shadows and figures of things past under the old law. The Tropological turns whatever things were done and said in the holy Scriptures to the moral instruction of the present life. The Anagogical raises the mind to the loftier mysteries of future blessedness and of heavenly glory. [11] So then, according to the threefold division of the times, there are [these] species of Mystical explanation.

The first invention of this [mystical exposition] Porphyry — an enemy of the Christian name — supposed to have proceeded from Origen Adamantius; [12] concerning whom, as Eusebius reports, he himself wrote these words in the third volume against the Christians: "The Christians cling to the discourses of the Jewish Scriptures, and affirm that those things which Moses wrote in a rustic and simple style are divinely sanctioned, and set beneath figures and riddles; and they expound them as though filled with immense mysteries. This kind of exposition had its beginning from a man whom I myself, when I was still quite a boy, [13] saw holding the ark of all erudition. This is Origen, whose immense glory is held among their teachers." But Philo the Jew, in the book to which he gave the title On the Contemplative Life, reports that this kind of spiritual interpretation was long before most usual among the Essenes [14] — men foremost among the Hebrews in religion and holiness — who from the rising of the dawn until evening were accustomed to spend whole days in the reading of the divine Scriptures, which they also strove with the utmost zeal to render into spiritual and allegorical senses. But we Christians believe, much more rightly and truly, that Christ Jesus — in whom are all the treasures of the wisdom and knowledge of God — was the first author of this hidden exposition, [15] and first of all showed to us, both through Himself and through His disciples, each and every species of Mystical elucidation.

He taught the Allegorical explanation when, speaking to the Jews about John the Baptist, He said: [16] Elias indeed shall come, and shall restore all things: but I say unto you, that Elias is already come, and they knew him not, but did unto him whatsoever they would — signifying by these words that the life of Elijah in the Old Testament was a type and shadow of the life of John, [17] who at the outset of the New Testament came in the spirit and power of Elijah. Paul likewise, in the epistle to the Galatians, explaining allegorically the history of Abraham's two sons, [18] says: It is written, that Abraham had two sons, the one by a bondwoman, and the other by a free woman: but he who was of the bondwoman was born according to the flesh; he of the free woman, by promise: which things are said by an allegory; for these are the two testaments, etc. [19]

Our Redeemer used the Tropological exposition [20] when He turned the history of the repentance of the Ninevites, and of the coming of the queen of the South to Solomon, to the reproach of the most abandoned morals and the most obstinate unbelief of the Jews, saying: [21] The men of Nineveh shall rise in judgment with this generation, and shall condemn it: because they did penance at the preaching of Jonas; and behold a greater than Jonas here. The queen of the South shall rise in judgment with this generation, and shall condemn it: because she came from the ends of the earth to hear the wisdom of Solomon; and behold a greater than Solomon here. And Paul, in the epistle to the Corinthians, accommodating to morals the history of the Hebrews who perished in the desert, [22] says: [23] Our fathers all [passed through] the sea…

[1] Rom. 2:29. [2] The law concerning circumcision has a twofold sense. [3] What the historical exposition of Scripture is. [4] Deut. 24:1. [5] Christ explained the law of Moses, which was badly understood by the Pharisees. [6] Matt. 19:8–9. [7] Moses permitted the Jews to put away wives, but did not command this. [8] Matt. 19:5. [9] The mystical kind of exposition is distributed into three species. [10] The allegorical exposition. [11] Tropology. Anagogy. [12] Porphyry's lie. [13] Porphyry as a boy saw Origen. (Rich PDF p. 152 — printed folio 135. The tropological example from 1 Cor 10 finishes; then Paul's anagogical exposition (the promised land → the heavenly Jerusalem). A key principle follows: one passage can bear all the senses at once — shown by Eucherius's fourfold exposition of the word "Waters" (historical, tropological, allegorical, anagogical). Then two alternative schemes are cited: Augustine's fourfold division (History, Allegory, Analogy, Aetiology, from On the Usefulness of Believing*) and Jerome's threefold one (to Hedibia). Running head: LIBER TERTIVS.)*

[continuing from p151] …[our fathers all] passed through the sea; but with the greater part of them God was not well pleased. Now these things were done in a figure of us, that we should not lust after evil things, as they also lusted; neither become idolaters, as some of them, as it is written: The people sat down to eat and drink, and rose up to play. Neither let us commit fornication, as some of them committed fornication, and there fell in one day three and twenty thousand. Neither let us tempt Christ, as some of them tempted, and perished by the serpents. Now all these things happened to them in figure; and they were written for our correction, upon whom the ends of the ages are come.

Paul used the Anagogical exposition [1] in the epistle to the Hebrews, when he adapts that land of the Palestinians, promised to the fathers, to the promise of future glory, saying that that land — so greatly desired by the Patriarchs, and sought out through so many wanderings — is not the present, visible, earthly region of the Canaanites, but a future, invisible, and heavenly fatherland, having better foundations, whose builder is God; [2] and [that it is] the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, thronged with many thousands of angels. So many, then, are the species of the sacred expositions.

But it must be known that not only can all things which are found in the sacred letters be plainly explained by one or another of these expositions, but also that it very often happens that one and the same passage and words of divine Scripture admit all these expositions at once. [3] Of this the most apt example is furnished by St. Eucherius in his book of Spiritual Formulas, illustrating by a fourfold exposition the word "Waters," which is most frequent in the holy Scriptures, in these words: There are four kinds of divine Expositions: the Historical, the Tropological, the Allegorical, and the Anagogical.

The Historical exposition is that which impresses upon us the truth of the deeds and the faith of the revelation.

The Tropological, or moral, exposition is that which refers the mystical understandings to the amendment of life.

The Allegorical exposition is that which shows the narration of the deeds to have prefigured the shadow of things to come.

The Anagogical exposition is that which brings forth the more sacred secrets of the heavenly figures; and these very [secrets] are made plainer by the examples set beneath them.

Water, according to history, signifies the elemental water which washes and flows through the earth, as in the beginning of Genesis: [4] Let the waters be gathered together into one place, and let the dry land appear.

Tropologically, Water signifies tribulations. The Psalm: [5] We have passed through water and fire, and thou hast brought us out into refreshment; and in Isaiah: [6] When thou shalt pass through the waters, I will be with thee, and the rivers shall not cover thee. Likewise it signifies wisdom, as Solomon says: [7] The words from the mouth of a man are deep water, and an overflowing torrent the fount of wisdom. Likewise heresies, the same Solomon writing: [8] Stolen waters are sweeter. Likewise the prosperities of the world, in John, who says: [9] Whosoever shall drink of this water shall thirst again.

Allegorically, Water signifies baptism: concerning which it is read in the volume of Ezekiel: [10] I will pour upon you clean water, and you shall be cleansed from all your defilements. Likewise, in the Apocalypse, Peoples: [11] Many waters, many peoples. And in Isaiah: [12] Blessed are you that sow upon all waters. Likewise grace — [that] of the Holy Spirit — in John: [13] If any man thirst, let him come and drink; and out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water.

Anagogically, Water is expounded of eternal beatitude, as in Jeremiah: [14] They have forsaken me, the fountain of living water. Likewise it is sung of the Angels in the psalm: [15] Let the waters that are above the heavens praise the name of the Lord. Thus Eucherius.

But I think it by no means to be passed over that Augustine, in the book On the Usefulness of Believing, to Honoratus, chapter 3, seems to divide these kinds of exposition far otherwise than we and Eucherius have distinguished them, [16] speaking in this manner: Four modes of expounding the law are handed down by certain treaters of the Scriptures: according to History, according to Allegory, according to Analogy, according to Aetiology.

According to history, then, it is delivered when it is taught what was written, or what was done — [or] what was not done but only written as though it had been done. According to Aetiology, when it is shown for what cause a thing was either done or said. According to Analogy, when it is demonstrated that the two testaments, namely the old and the new, are not adverse to one another. According to Allegory, when it is taught that certain things which are written are not to be taken to the letter, but understood figuratively. In all these modes our Lord Jesus Christ and the Apostles made use. For [something] is taken from history, when it was objected that on the Sabbath day His disciples had plucked the ears of grain: [17] Have you not read, He says, what David did, and they that were with him? how he entered into the house of God, and ate the loaves of proposition, which it was not lawful for him to eat, nor for them that were with him, but for the priests alone.

To Aetiology pertains that [passage] which — when Christ had forbidden a wife to be put away, except for the cause of fornication, and it had been cited to Him by those questioning [Him] that Moses had permitted the license of putting away by giving a bill of divorce — He says: [18] This Moses did for the hardness of your heart. For here the cause is rendered why that was rightly permitted by Moses for the time, so that what Christ was enjoining might show that other times had now come.

To Analogy pertains that [passage] which — when Matthew had narrated the slaughter of the infants perpetrated by Herod — he straightway added the agreement of this deed with the sayings of the old testament, saying: [19] Then was fulfilled that which was spoken by Jeremiah the prophet, saying: A voice in Rama was heard, weeping and much wailing, Rachel bewailing her sons: and she would not be comforted, because they are not.

To Allegory pertains that which Paul says to the Galatians: [20] It is written, that Abraham had two sons, the one by a bondwoman, the other by a free woman: which things are said by an allegory. Thus Augustine.

But Jerome seems to distinguish these kinds of exposition somewhat more diversely, [21] thus writing in the twelfth question to Hedibia: There is a threefold description and rule of the Scriptures in our heart: the first, that we understand them according to History; the second, according to Tropology; the third, according to spiritual understanding.

In History, the order of the things which are written is preserved.

In Tropology, we rise up from the letter to greater things; and whatever was carnally done in the former people, we interpret according to a moral sense, and turn to the profit of our soul. [continues p153: In…]

(Rich PDF p. 153 — printed folio 136. Jerome's threefold scheme closes ("Thus far Jerome"); then Sixtus reconciles the Fathers — they agree on the number of senses and differ only in how they group them: Eucherius into four, Jerome into three, Augustine into two (the scheme Sixtus follows). Three comparative division-diagrams follow. Then a new chapter, On the Use and Usefulness of the Historical and Mystical Exposition: only the literal/historical sense has probative force for defending doctrine and refuting heresy. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

[continuing from p152] In the spiritual θεωρία (contemplation), we pass over to loftier things, we let go of earthly things, we discourse of the blessedness of things to come and of heavenly things, so that the meditation of the present life may be a shadow of the blessedness to come. Thus far Jerome.

But that all the diversity which seems to be among these Fathers may be recalled to concord, one must know that they do not disagree at all as to the number of the four Expositions, but differ only in the manner of dividing. [1] For that partition of the expositions which Eucherius distributed into four members, Jerome [reduced] to three, and Augustine (whom we have followed) reduced to two members — in the manner which appears in the figure set below.

Eucherius's Fourfold Division. The exposition of the sacred letters is fourfold, namely:

- Historical — [either] Proper [or] Metaphorical
- Tropological
- Allegorical
- Anagogical

Jerome's Threefold Division. The exposition of the sacred letters is threefold, namely:

- Historical
- Tropological
- Spiritual — which is twofold, namely: Allegorical [and] Anagogical

Augustine's Twofold Division. The exposition of the sacred letters is twofold, namely:

- Historical — [subdivided into] Analogical [and] Aetiological
- Allegorical — which in the book On True Religion, chapter fifty, is assigned as threefold; of which:
- the First accommodates the figures of past things to things present: this retained for itself the name of Allegorical;
- the Second pertains to morals and the affections of the soul: this is called Tropological;
- the Third exalts [the mind] to unchangeable eternity: this is called Anagogical.

Let these things be said concerning the two kinds of sacred exposition; to which a few little points concerning their necessary use and usefulness seem worth adding.

On the Use and Usefulness of the Historical and Mystical Exposition

The historical kind of exposition is, first of all, supremely necessary [2] for the instruction of those matters which are to be believed by us, for the confirmation and defense of the faith, and for refuting those who resist the truth, and for convicting all heresies. For no exposition brought in for the proof of dogmas has force and strength, unless it be one that truly, purely, and genuinely unfolds the meaning of the letter. [3] For since other explanations search out the senses hidden within the marrow of the letter, and thence endeavor to draw them forth from certain likenesses of things, they can easily be deceived by the images of like things — especially since this deduction and elucidation of the spiritual senses is made by the thought, discourse, and inquiry of the human wit, which is often deceived, and in obscure matters is wont frequently to invent those things toward which the mind is most inclined, whether by nature or by exercise. For if I myself should wish to establish [4] that priests have the power of binding and loosing from sins, by the mystical exposition of that saying of Christ to the Apostles, Loose him, and let him go, the adversary will at once reply that this was said of the loosing of the linen cloths in which Lazarus was wrapped, and not of the loosing of sins. But if I show the very same thing from the authority and literal exposition of that saying of Christ to the Apostles, [5] Receive the Holy Spirit: whose sins you shall forgive, they are forgiven them; and whose you shall retain, they are retained, he will straightway be compelled to acquiesce and to assent to the words. Accordingly, St. Augustine rightly writes thus in the epistle to Vincentius the Donatist: But who would not most impudently strive to interpret in his own favor something set in an Allegory, unless he also had most manifest testimonies by whose light the obscure things might be illumined? Jerome too, in the second [book] of his commentaries on Matthew, treating of the leaven hidden by the woman in three measures of meal [6] — after he had reported the exposition of certain persons who applied that parable to the trinity of persons and the unity of essence — subjoins these words: A pious sense, indeed; but a parable and the doubtful understanding of riddles can never avail for the authority of the dogmas. Thus he. Therefore the literal [exposition] alone is strong for supporting truth and destroying falsehood; [7] for since from the [first…]

[1] The Fathers are recalled to concord, as far as concerns the distinction of the expositions of Scripture. [2] For what matters the historical kind of exposition is necessary. [3] What exposition of Scripture has force for proving the dogmas of the faith. [4] John 11:44. [5] John 20:22–23. [6] Matt. 13:33. [7] Only the literal exposition is valid for supporting truth and destroying falsehood.

(Rich PDF p. 154 — printed folio 137. The second usefulness of the historical/literal sense: it is the foundation of every mystical exposition (the Manichaeans' error over "In the sun he set his tabernacle" shows the danger of neglecting it). Then the counterpart: the mystical sense is no less necessary — without it we would be dragged back into Judaizing, and the Law's sacrifices and histories would seem absurd (Abraham's two wives = the two Testaments, per Paul). Finally, hold the mean: condemn both the dead-letter literalists and those who reject the letter to force insipid allegories. Running head: LIBER TERTIVS.)

[continuing from p153] …[for since] it is drawn from the first signification of the words, or from transferred words most closely joined to the first signification, it is more open and more efficacious than the other explanations. And this is the first and most necessary use of the historical exposition.

Its second usefulness and necessity arises from its relation to the other mystical expositions, beneath which it must needs be laid as their base and as the stable foundation of the whole spiritual edifice. [1] For unless the sense of the letter be first clear to us, how will it be possible for us to illustrate by spiritual elucidations those [passages] whose words are most obscure to us? There will be danger, too, if from words not understood we should wish to express some hidden sense, that we fall into various heresies; and that the same befall us which has befallen many heretics, especially the Manichaeans: who, since from ignorance of the Hebrew tongue they did not understand the literal sense of that saying, [2] In the sun he hath set his tabernacle, turned themselves to the supports of an allegorical exposition, [3] saying that Christ after his resurrection ascended without flesh to the Father, having left his body within the compass of the solar globe — so that his flesh should be adored by us in the sun, as in the tabernacle of the Lord's body — whereas nevertheless the genuine and proper sense and exposition of the letter is this: that God set a tabernacle for the Sun in heaven, from which the Sun himself, in the early morning, like a bridegroom coming forth from his chamber, goes forth to show the splendor of his countenance to all mortals. These, then, are the necessity and the benefits of the Historical exposition.

But the Mystical kind of exposition contains no lesser advantages, being far most useful both for the integrity of the faith and for the instruction of morals. For it is, first of all, most necessary for discerning, preserving, and explaining the purity of the gospel doctrine [4] — which must needs be contaminated and defiled by us with Jewish institutions, if we should everywhere wish to explain the Scriptures, especially the old ones, according to the bare letter. And it would then be necessary to return again to that ancient observance of the Jewish ceremonies, and again to be circumcised with the Jews, to sacrifice cattle, to eat the lamb and the unleavened bread, to abstain from unclean foods, and to follow the other shadows of the Hebrews — which, now that the gospel light has shone forth, have vanished away. Next, hardly any kind of defense or answer is left to us against the enemies of the law and the prophets, if they object to us: why did God once give such absurd laws — to cut off the little skin of the foreskin, to kill a lamb, to slaughter a calf, to cut the throat of a goat, to defile everything with beastly blood, to carry a peg upon the belt, and, after the manner of cats, to cover the excrements of one's own body with dug-up earth? We shall also find but few things in the old histories that would spiritually delight the soul and feed the mind, if we neglect the mystical expositions; [5] rather, all those things will seem to us insipid, rustic, senseless, and utterly unworthy of the divine majesty, which God commands concerning the lamb, the ram, the ox, the red heifer, the goat, the fat, the right shoulder, the liver, the breast, the belly, and the other entrails of brute beasts. And God himself will seem to command nothing great, nothing sublime, nothing worthy of God — [nothing] but sacrifices of this kind, which seem cheap, lowly, and to be despised by the wise of this world — unless you refer [them] to the sacrifice of Christ, which was made for us contemptible, abject, and despised even unto the death of the cross; outwardly indeed clothed in a sordid and cheap garment of flesh, but inwardly great, lofty, magnificent, and beautiful beyond the sons of men — [Christ] who suffers himself to be figured by unworthy words and cheap sacrifices. Therefore, in carnal sacrifices of this kind, unless we admit a mystical sense and explanation, the laws of the gentiles — whether of the Athenians or of the Lacedaemonians — will seem more rational.

But neither will the old histories be able at all to profit for the forming of morals, if we consider them according to the bare letter. For what does it profit toward salvation to know the wars and seditions of the ancient Jews, if in them we understand nothing else than slaughter and effusions of blood? What does it matter toward attaining piety to know, according to the letter, that Abraham had two wives and [two] sons, Ishmael and Isaac; that the boy Isaac was weaned from milk; that on the day of the weaning a banquet was made; that [Ishmael] played with Isaac; that Sara is indignant that the son of the handmaid should play with the son of the free woman — unless you refer the carnal history to the mystical understanding, and, together with Paul, expound that Abraham having two wives signifies Christ having two testaments and two peoples: [6] the one carnal, and the other spiritual, weaned from the milk of the carnal Life; and that the play of infancy [signifies] the persecution of the carnal people against the spiritual; and that on this account Sara — that is, the new law — is indignant against Hagar, the old law which perceives only carnally? [7] If you should expound these things mystically in this fashion, the history will help in a wonderful manner to foster and nourish in us the fire of faith and love, and will bring to our taste the delight of a wondrous savor.

Here, however, those who take up the task of expounding the sacred Scriptures must be admonished to hold the mean in these expositions, and to flee the extremes (which are always faulty). For just as certain expositors of our age are by no means to be approved, who — the mystical senses being spurned as chance thoughts devised at pleasure — perpetually sit beside the drowsy letter, and lean upon dead syllables and words alone, cold, without spirit, bloodless and lifeless: so also gravely to be condemned are certain inept expositors of our times, who — having utterly rejected the literal exposition as a matter of the slightest moment, and (as they say) worthy of Grammarians rather than Theologians — drag forth in each passage of Scripture certain forced and insipid allegories, doing violence to the divine Scripture; and, the truth of the history being destroyed, peddle their ridiculous notions as great and hidden sacraments of the Church. These I most lovingly beseech and adjure to consider that the literal exposition is not a thing so common, cheap, and worn out, [8] and [that… to all…]

[1] The literal exposition is the foundation of the other expositions. [2] Ps. 18:5. [3] The folly of the Manichaeans, born of ignorance of the literal sense of Scripture. [4] The mystical kind of exposition is necessary for preserving and explaining the sincerity of the gospel doctrine. [5] Few things in the old histories delight the soul spiritually, if we neglect the mystical expositions. [6] Gal. 4:24, 29. [7] Abraham having two wives signified Christ having two Testaments and two peoples. [8] The literal explication of Scripture is the most difficult of all.

(Rich PDF p. 155 — printed folio 138. The literal sense is in fact the hardest of all: Jerome and Augustine came to it only late — Jerome's confession in his preface to Obadiah (his youthful allegorizing vs. the literal commentary of his old age), and Augustine's in the Retractations (worn out by the labor of expounding Genesis to the letter). The historical sense is thus most noble. A new chapter follows, On Three Particular Expositions (Elemental, Physical, Prophetic), opening with the Elemental — letters as sounds and as numbers (the Resolutory and Composing modes: acronym-expansion and anagram). Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

[continuing from p154] …[and that the literal exposition is not so common, cheap, and worn out, and] open to all — as they themselves boast — [as merely fit for] the pedagogues of boys, but is the most difficult of all expositions, and the most laborious, on account of the unusual and abstruse properties of the holy tongue, and on account of the abundance of most difficult matters — namely of all the arts, sciences, and disciplines — which are comprehended under the historical sense of Scripture. Witnesses of this are the two most brilliant lights of the Latin church, Jerome and Augustine, [1] who did not dare to set their hand to the Historical explanation except when already advanced in age, after they had spent many years in mystical explanations, as in easier studies. Whose words it pleases [us] to bring in here for the confirmation of our opinion, so that those who approach the exposition of the Scriptures may recognize how greatly the Historical explanation is to be esteemed. Concerning it, Jerome, in the preface of his commentaries on Obadiah, speaks thus:

When I was a little child, I spoke as a little child, I understood as a little child, I thought as a little child; but when I became a man, I put away the things that were of a child. [2] If the apostle advances, and — daily forgetting the things that are past — reaches forth to the things that are before, [3] according to the precept of the Lord and Savior (holding the plough-handle, he looks not back behind him), [4] how much more ought I — who have not yet come to the age of a perfect man and to the measure of Christ — to deserve pardon for this: that in my youth, provoked by ardor and zeal for the Scriptures, I interpreted allegorically the prophet Obadiah, whose history I did not know? My mind burned with mystical knowledge; and because I had read that all things are possible to them that believe, I was ignorant that the charisms are diverse. I knew the letters of the age [secular learning], and on that account I thought I could read the sealed book. I hoped that what I had written lay hidden in my little chests, and had vowed the first rashness of my little wit to the fire — when suddenly there is brought from Italy a copy [of it], by a certain youth as many years old as [the years] since I had once written it, praising my little work. I confess, I marveled that, however badly anyone has written, he finds a reader like himself. He was proclaiming [it]; I was blushing. He was carrying, as it were, the mystical understandings up to heaven; I, with lowered head, was kept from confessing my shame. What then? Do we condemn that in which we played as boys? By no means. But I freely profess that that was [the work] of a boyish wit, and this, which I now write, [the work] of ripe old age. Thus Jerome, when in extreme old age he wrote a commentary on the prophet Obadiah according to the letter.

But Augustine testifies that, having first written easily on Genesis according to allegory, he attempted much later a literal exposition upon the same book, but, deterred and worn out by the magnitude of the labor, was compelled to desist. [5] His words are these, in the first volume of the Retractations: When I had composed two books on Genesis against the Manichaeans — since I had handled the words of Scripture according to the allegorical exposition, not daring to expound to the letter such great secrets of natural things (that is, in what manner the things there said might be taken according to historical propriety) — I wished to try, in this most laborious and most difficult work also, what I could do; but in expounding the Scriptures my apprentice-effort sank beneath so great a burden of the load; and before one book was finished, I rested from the labor which I could not sustain. Thus far the words of Augustine. From which it is clear that the historical explanation is not to be neglected by the expositors of our age as if ignoble, trivial, and unlearned, [6] since it itself surpasses almost all the mystical expositions by the excellence of noble and most learned matters.

And let these things concerning the four general and principal explanations of divine Scripture be said sufficiently; it remains for us to proceed to certain other particular explications of the same Scripture.

On Three Particular and Little-Used Expositions of Divine Scripture

After those four kinds of sacred exposition — the most excellent, and most usual among all expositors — already described by us, there are found also three particular explanations of divine Scripture, [7] namely the Elemental, the Physical, and the Prophetic: of which, although the use among the divine interpreters is rare, and they seem in some way to be contained under the aforesaid common kinds, nevertheless, lest we leave untouched anything pertaining to the present purpose, we shall explain them as not unworthy to be known, beginning first from the Elemental exposition itself.

On the Elemental Exposition

The Elemental explanation — from which the elemental expositors are so named [8] — is that which is concerned with the signification of the simple elements, or letters. But since letters signify chiefly two things, that is, the individual parts of syllables, and the marks that indicate numbers (especially among the Greeks and Hebrews, who represent every kind of number by letters), [9] this explanation is necessarily divided into two modes of explaining.

On the First Mode of the Elemental Exposition

The First Mode — that is, the one which, from the resolution of the elements of each word, and again from a new and different connection of those same elements, deduces manifold senses, both historical and mystical, from the sacred Scriptures — this mode is cut into two parts, that is, the Resolutory and the Composing. Now the former part, in which single letters signify single words, and single [words] are expounded through single [letters], is on that account called Resolutory, [10] because it consists wholly in the resolution of the elements: for it tears apart and separates the letters of any given word, one from another, and from each single letter draws out certain words beginning with that same letter — which lay bare the mysteries hidden in the whole marrow of that word. The latter part, which treats of composition, [11] transposes those same elements of the same word — before scattered and disjoined — again in a new order, and, placing one in the room of another with position changed, connects them, and composes from them new syllables, words, [and] parts of speech,

(Rich PDF p. 156 — printed folio 139. The Resolutory elemental exposition (letters standing for words). The Hebrews claim it as part of their Cabala, but Sixtus finds it also among the Greeks — Plato's Cratylus, and the tale of Aesop reading a marble column's seven letters three different ways to find (and then withhold) a treasure. Then Hebrew examples: Jerome's notarikon of נמרצת ("grievous," 1 Kings 2:8) into Shimei's five reproaches of David; the acronym ADAM = the four directions (with a Sibylline verse); and Daniel's MENE, TEKEL, PHARES — single words standing for whole sentences. Running head: LIBER TERTIVS.)

[continuing from p155] …[composes from them new syllables, words, and] parts [of speech], and formulas of discourse, by whose aid the understandings of the diverse senses, and the most secret mysteries, are laid open. The Hebrews claim for themselves the intention of this explanation, asserting it to be a part of the Cabala [1] — that is, of their more secret and Anagogical, or Allegorical, wisdom — which their Fathers received, handed down from hand to hand from their elders a little after the times of Moses. Which indeed is not sufficiently ascertained to me, since I find that the same skill of expounding existed also among the most ancient Greeks — not only in Plato, in the Cratylus, where he treats of a not dissimilar discipline concerning the etymology of names, but also in Aesop the Phrygian, [2] who is believed to have flourished long before the times of the Trojan war, in the same age as Orpheus and Linus. For he, as is read in his Life, when together with his master Xanthus he was surveying the ruins of certain old buildings, chanced upon a certain marble column on which seven Greek letters were engraved, indicating a treasure buried in that place, not far from the column. And when Xanthus was anxiously inquiring into their meaning, Aesop — having found words which began with those same characters — illustrated that writing by applying three [different] expositions. [3] The letters were of this sort: A, B, Δ, O, E, Θ, X; which Aesop, disclosing to his master the place of the treasure that the letters designated, first expounded thus:

A — ἀπόβαθι (ascend); B — βήματα (steps); Δ — τέσσαρα (four); O — ὀρύξας (digging); E — εὑρήσεις (thou wilt find); Θ — θησαυρόν (treasure); X — χρυσίον (golden): that is, "Ascending four steps [and] digging, thou wilt find a golden treasure."

And so, when Xanthus had dug up the treasure and would assign no part of the gold to Aesop, Aesop modestly admonished him to obey the precept engraved on the column — [namely] what those letters contained — in this way:

A — ἀνελόμενοι (taking [it] up); B — βαδίσαντες (go); Δ — διέλεσθε (divide); O — ὅν (which); E — εὕρετε (ye have found); Θ — θησαυρόν (treasure); X — χρυσίον (golden): that is, "Taking [it] up, go, divide the golden treasure which ye have found."

But when Xanthus disdained to do this, and wished to possess the gold alone, Aesop, indignant, threatened that, unless he received a part, he would carry out yet another command of the same writing, the letters prescribing thus:

A — ἀπόδος (render); B — βασιλεῖ (to the king); Δ — Διονυσίῳ (to Dionysius); O — ὅν (which); E — εὗρες (thou hast found); Θ — θησαυρόν (treasure); X — χρυσίον (golden): that is, "Render to King Dionysius the golden treasure which thou hast found."

But however the matter may stand — whether the Greeks or the Hebrews first devised this manner of expounding — there are, as we have already said, two parts of it. Of the former, or Resolutory part, in which single letters denote single words, not a few examples exist among the ancient Fathers. Among these, Jerome, in the Questions on the third book of Kings, examining those words of the dying David to Solomon [4] — Thou hast also with thee Shimei, the son of Gera, the son of Jemini, of Bahurim, who cursed me with a most grievous curse — explains the force of that word of execrable cursing, showing the reproaches which Shimei heaped upon David [to be drawn] from the letters which are in that word, GRIEVOUS — which in Hebrew is written נמרצת (nimretzeth), and consists of these five letters: נ nun, מ mem, ר resh, צ tsade, ת tav. [5]

In נ nun is signified נאף (naaph), that is, Adulterer and ravisher of another's wife — because he had defiled himself with adultery of Uriah's wife.

In מ mem is signified Moabite — by which word Shimei reproached him with the ignobility of his own stock, that he was descended from the ignoble and unbelieving seed of the Moabites.

In ר resh is denoted רצח (rotseach), that is, Homicide and slayer — who took off innocent Uriah by evil guile, and slaughtered the whole royal line of Saul.

In צ tsade is signified צרוע (tsarua), that is, Leper — because he would be cast out from all men from his kingdom, after the likeness of a leprous man, whom the law commanded to be driven from the cities and from the company of men.

In ת tav is signified תועבה (to'evah), that is, Abominated — not only by men, but by God, who had utterly cast him off as an impious man.

But Augustine, in the ninth tractate on John — and before him Cyprian, in the treatise on Sinai and Sion, and after both Bede, in his commentaries on John — declaring the etymology of the name Adam, [6] think the first man was so called because that earth from which he was formed was taken by God from the four cardinal points of the world, which are comprehended in the four letters of that same name. For A [signifies] ἀνατολήν (Anatol■), that is, the East; D, δύσιν (Dysis), that is, the West; the other A, ἄρκτον (Arktos), that is, the North; and M, μεσημβρίαν (Mes■mbria), that is, the South. This interpretation of the name the Sibyl had expressed many ages before, in the second book of the Oracles, in these verses — whose sense is this:

> Truly it is God who fashioned four-lettered Adam, who was first formed, and who fills up by his name the Rising [East] and the Setting [West], the South and the vigorous North.

To this part of the Resolutory exposition can also be referred the interpretation of those words of which single ones signify single whole sentences — such as those three words which (as is had in the fifth chapter of Daniel) that prodigious hand wrote on the wall before the king of Babylon, [7] namely מנא MENE, תקל TEKEL, ופרסין PHARESIN, that is, NUMBERED, WEIGHED, DIVIDED. Daniel, expounding these by three whole sentences, interpreted thus: NUMBERED signifies, "Numbered is thy kingdom by God, and completed"; WEIGHED signifies, "Weighed in the balance, and found wanting"; DIVIDED signifies, "Divided is thy kingdom, and given to the Medes and the Persian."

There follows the latter part of this exposition, pertaining to composition, which is made by the commutation and transposition of letters. [8]

(Rich PDF p. 157 — printed folio 140. The Composing elemental mode (letters commuted and transposed). Example one: the ATBASH cipher — Jeremiah veils BABEL as SESAC (Sheshach, Jer 25:26), with the mechanics of the reversed alphabet. Example two: Pico della Mirandola's Heptaplus, permuting the first word of Genesis, בראשית *(Bereshith), into a dozen Hebrew words that compose the sentence "The Father, in and through the Son, created…", unfolded as man-the-microcosm mirroring the three worlds. Then Sixtus turns to Jerome's interpretation of the Hebrew alphabet (Aleph = doctrine, Beth = house…). Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)*

[continuing from p156] …[the latter part, pertaining to composition, which is made by the commutation and transposition] of letters. That this was in use among the most ancient Hebrews, [1] an argument is Jeremiah's prophecy against the king of Babylon, written in the 25th chapter of his prophecies. In which place the prophet, lest he should openly provoke the king himself against himself, artfully transformed the name BABEL, by commuting its elements, into SESAC, saying: [2] And Sesac shall drink the cup of the wrath of God after them — hinting that, by the word Sesac, according to the rule of this explanation, the name Babel must be understood. Now the rule of explaining this name is, as Jerome there reports, that just as we read the Greek alphabet from A to Ω in order, and again, to exercise the memory of boys, we are wont to reverse the order of reading and to mix the last with the first — joining A with Ω, and B with Ψ — so the Hebrews proceed from א (aleph) through ב (beth) and ג (gimel), in the straight order, up to the last ת (tav), whose penultimate is ש (shin); and then, joining together at once א and ת, ב and ש, until they reach the middle of the alphabet, where the letter ל (lamed) meets כ (kaph). Whence it comes about that, just as running through the alphabet in the straight order we read BABEL, so with the order permuted we read SESAC. (For the vowel-letters between the ל, ב, and ב of the name BABEL, and between the ך, ש, and ש of the name SESAC, are, according to the idiom of the Hebrew tongue, not written.)

John Pico [della Mirandola], in his Heptaplus, brings a most brilliant example of this explanation, expounding that first word of Genesis, IN THE BEGINNING. In which place he writes these words:

> That word is written among the Hebrews in this way: בראשית (Bereshith). From this word, therefore: if we join the third letter to the first, the word אב (ab) is made; if, the first being doubled, we add the second, bebar is made; if we read all but the first, ראשית (reshith) is made; if we connect the fourth to the first and last, שבת (shabbath) is made; if we set the three first in the order in which they lie, ברא (bara) is made; if the first be omitted [and] the three following [taken], ראש (rosh) is made; if, the first and second being omitted, [we take] the two following, אש (esh) is made; if, the three first being omitted, we join the fourth to the last, שת (Seth) is made; again, if [we join] the second to the first, רב (rab); if after the third [we set] the fifth, then the fourth, איש (ish) is made; if we join the first two to the two last, ברית (berith) is made; if [we put] the last for the first, the last word is made, which is טוב (tob), the ת (tav) being turned into the element ט (teth) — a change most frequent among the Hebrews.
> Let us see, therefore, first what these signify in Latin, then what mysteries about all nature may be revealed by them to those not unversed in philosophy. Ab signifies "father"; bebar, "in the Son and through the Son" (for the preposition be- signified both); Reshith, "beginning"; Shabbath, "rest" and "end"; Bara, "he created"; Rosh, "head"; Esh, "fire"; Seth, "foundation"; Rab, "of the great"; Ish, "of man"; Ber [berith], "by a covenant"; Tob, "good." And if we weave the whole into a sentence in consequent order, it will be of this sort: "The Father, in the Son and through the Son — the beginning and the end, or the rest — created the head, the fire, and the foundation of the great man, by a good covenant." This whole sentence leaps forth from the resolution and composition of that first word. How lofty, how full of all learning its sense is, cannot be plain to all. But as some of the things signified to us by these words are at once open to all, so certain [others] are obscure. For it is known to all Christians what it is that the Father created in the Son and through the Son, and likewise what it is that the Son is the beginning and the end of all things — for he is alpha and omega, as John writes, and he himself called himself the beginning, and we have shown the end of all things to be that they be restored to their beginning. The rest is somewhat more obscure: namely, what those [words] mean — the Head, the fire, and the foundation of the great man; what that covenant is, and by what reasoning it is called good. For it cannot be seen at once and readily by all that there is here explained the whole reason, kinship, and also the felicity of the four worlds, of which we have treated and about which we finally disputed. First, then, it must be noted that the world is called by Moses a great man. [3] For if man is a little world, surely the world is a great man. Taking occasion hence, he most aptly figures the three worlds — the intellectual, the celestial, and the corruptible — by the three parts of man, [4] at the same time indicating by this figure not only that all the worlds are contained in man, but also briefly declaring which part of man answers to which world. Let us therefore consider in man three parts: the highest, the head; then that which reaches from the neck to the navel; the third, that which extends from the navel to the feet — for these too, in man's figure, are divided and separated by a certain variety. But it is wonderful how beautifully, how exactly, by most precise reasoning, they correspond in proportion to the three parts of the world. In the head is the brain, the fount of knowledge; in the breast is the heart, the fount of motion, life, and heat; in the last part are the genital members, the beginning of generation. Likewise also in the world: the highest part, which is the angelic or intellectual world, is the fount of knowledge, because that nature was made for understanding; the middle part, which is heaven, [is] the beginning of life, motion, and heat, in which the Sun, like the heart in the breast, holds dominion; below the Moon (as is known to all) is the beginning of generation and corruption. You see how aptly all these parts of the world and of man mutually agree. Now Moses designated the first [part] by its proper name, namely the head; the second he called fire — both because by this name heaven is reckoned by many, and because in us this portion is the beginning of heat; the third he called foundation, because by it, as is known to all, the whole body of man is founded and sustained. He added, moreover, that he created these by a good covenant, because among them a covenant of peace and friendship has been sanctioned — out of the kinship of natures and by mutual consent — through the law of God's wisdom. Which covenant is therefore good, because it is so directed and ordered toward God, who is the good itself, that, just as the whole world is one among itself, so at last it may be one with its author. Let us too imitate the most holy covenant of the world, that by mutual charity we also may be one with each other, and all together, through the true love of God, may happily become one with Him. Thus Pico.

But if these [examples] seem few to you, and you desire to see an example of both parts joined together at once, you have St. Jerome, in the epistle to Paula of Rome, and in the preface of his commentaries on the Lamentations: [5] in which places, delivering certain things as, so to speak, the first rudiments of this art, he first of all interprets separately the individual elements of the Hebrew Alphabet, then shows what Mysteries are contained in the several combinations of them. His words — that I may indulge you, friendly reader — I will not be loath to subjoin here. They are these: But now what you asked is fulfilled: that the interpretation annexed may signify the sense of each element. Aleph is interpreted "doctrine"; Beth, "house"; Gimel, "fullness"; Daleth, "of tablets"; He, "this"; Vau, "and"; Zain, "these"; Heth, "life"; Teth, "good"; Iod, "beginning"; Caph…

[1] This composition was in use among the ancient Hebrews. [2] Jer. 25:26. [3] The world is a great man. [4] In man there are three principal parts. [5] Jerome shows what mysteries are contained in the several combinations of the Hebrew elements.

(Rich PDF p. 158 — printed folio 141. Jerome's interpretation of the Hebrew alphabet finishes: the letter-meanings, then the twenty-two letters grouped into seven "connexions," each read as a spiritual sentence, climaxing in Christ ("Thus Jerome"). Then the five mystical Greek letters (Isidore): Y (the Pythagorean letter of the two life-paths, with a poem from Lactantius), Θ (death), T (the cross, Ezek 9:4), and Α/Ω (Rev 1:8) — with X (Justin Martyr, Plato) and Cicero's A/C. Sixtus's balanced verdict: value it in moderation (the alphabetic Psalms, Lemuel, Lamentations), but it also bred Gnostic madness. Running head: LIBER TERTIVS.)

[continuing from p157] …[Aleph, "doctrine"; Beth, "house"; Gimel, "fullness"; Daleth, "of tablets"; He, "this"; Vau, "and"; Zain, "these"; Heth, "life"; Teth, "good"; Iod, "beginning";] Caph, "hand"; Lamed, "discipline," or "of the heart"; Mem, "from them"; Nun, "everlasting"; Samech, "help"; Ayin, "fount," or "eye"; Phe, "mouth" (understand it said from "mouth" [os, oris], not from "bone" [os, ossis], lest you be deceived by the ambiguity of the letters); Tsade, "justice"; Coph, "calling"; Resh, "of the head"; Shin, "of teeth"; Thau, "signs." After the interpretation of the elements, the order of their meaning must be told; for out of these letters there are seven connexions [groups].

Of which the first is Aleph, Beth, Gimel, Daleth — "doctrine, house, fullness, of tablets": namely, that the doctrine of the Church, which is the house of God, may be found in the fullness of the divine books. [1]

The second connexion is He, Vau, Zain, Heth — "this, and, these, life": for what other life can there be without the knowledge of the Scriptures? — through which also Christ himself is recognized, who is the life of believers. [2]

The third connexion has Teth, Iod — "good beginning": because, although we now know all things that are written, yet we know in part, and we prophesy in part, and now we see through a glass in a riddle; but when we shall have merited to be with Christ, and shall be like the angels, then the doctrine of books shall cease, [3] and then we shall see, face to face, the good beginning as it is.

The fourth connexion is Caph, Lamed — "hand, discipline (or, of the heart)": hands are understood in [outward] work, heart and discipline in the understanding — because we can do nothing unless we first know what is to be done.

The fifth connexion is Mem, Nun, Samech — "from them, everlasting help": this needs no explanation, but is clearer than all light — [namely] that from the Scriptures eternal helps are ministered.

The sixth connexion has Ayin, Phe, Tsade — "fount (or eye) of the mouth of justice"; according to that which we expounded in the fourth number.

The seventh connexion (which is also the last, because in this very seven-fold number too there is a mystical understanding) is Coph, Resh, Shin, Thau — "calling of the head, signs of the teeth": through the teeth the articulate voice is uttered, and by these signs one comes to the head of all, who is Christ, through whom one comes to the everlasting kingdom. Thus Jerome.

There are also among the Greeks, as Isidore relates, five mystical letters, [4] namely Y, Θ, T, A, Ω. Of which the first, Y, signifies human life: [5] this Pythagoras of Samos first shaped after the example of human life; its lower stem shows the first age — uncertain, indeed, and which has not yet given itself either to vices or to virtues. But the fork that remains begins from adolescence: whose right part is steep, yet tending toward the blessed life; the left, easier, but leading down to ruin and destruction. Concerning which letter a certain most ancient poet, as Lactantius testifies in book VI, chapter 3, wrote thus:

> The letter of Pythagoras, cleft by its two-horned division,
>
> seems to present the likeness of human life.
>
> For the way of virtue, steep, seeks the right-hand path, > and offers a difficult approach, at first, to those who look on,
>
>
> but gives rest to the weary at the topmost peak.
>
> The broad road displays a soft journey; but the final goal
>
> hurls down the captured, and rolls them over steep rocks.
>
> For whoever, out of love of virtue, has conquered
>
> hard misfortunes, he shall win for himself praise and honor;
>
> but he who will follow idle sloth and luxury,
>
> while, with incautious mind, he flees the labors set against him,
> base and needy at once, shall pass a wretched age.

The second [letter] is Θ theta, which signifies death: [6] for the judges used to append this same letter to the names of those whom they punished with execution. And it is called θ theta, ἀπὸ τοῦ θανάτου, that is, "from death"; [7] whence also it has through its middle a dart — that is, the sign of death — of which a certain poet says thus: "O letter Theta, unhappy far beyond the others."

The third, T, shows the figure of the Lord's cross: [8] whence in Hebrew it is interpreted "Sign." Of which it is said in Ezekiel: Mark Thau upon the foreheads of the men that mourn and grieve. [9] But the remaining two, α and ω, Christ claims for himself — the highest and the last — for he is the beginning and the end, saying: I am α and ω. [10] For, these two letters running together into one another, [the series] rolls down from α all the way to ω, and again ω is folded back to α — that the Lord might show in himself both the running-down of the beginning to the end, and the running-back of the end to the beginning. To these letters Justin the Philosopher and Martyr adds also X, whose form he affirms — in the second Apology to Antoninus Pius — to contain the mystery of the most sacred cross of Christ, [11] calling Plato as witness of the matter; who, in the Timaeus, discoursing of the Son of God, says that God placed his Son in the world in the likeness of the letter X. I pass over, for brevity's sake, that Marcus Tullius [Cicero] calls A the salutary letter, because it was the mark of acquittal, [12] but C the unlucky one, because it was the sign of condemnation. [13]

There are those who explode this whole kind of exposition as a ludicrous and fortuitous thing; and again others who admire it superstitiously and extol it to heaven. Not approving the extremes of these opinions, I judge, first, that an invention of this kind is not altogether to be despised — both because this view has great authors, as I have already shown, and because there are many things in the sacred letters which cannot be mystically explained without it: such as certain Sacred poems, which are therefore called Alphabetary, because they are arranged according to the order of the alphabetic elements [14] — like David's seven Psalms, the maternal Instruction of King Lemuel [Prov. 31], and the Threni [Lamentations] of Jeremiah — which indeed Jerome judges to have been digested into this order of letters not in vain, nor without immense mysteries and sacraments of the Church. Besides these, there are certain other things concerning some particular letters, both Hebrew and Greek — such as, in Ezekiel, the Hebrew letter ת Thau, marked on the foreheads of those to be preserved, and, concerning A alpha and Ω omega, the Greek characters in the Apocalypse of John.

But, as I do not condemn those who moderately and aptly accommodate these things in their places from time to time, so neither do I praise those who pursue the same too anxiously, and with useless and utterly empty labor — since it does not escape me that from this fount emanated the prodigious madness of the Valentinians and Gnostics, [15] who, as both Irenaeus and Epiphanius show in the first book against the heresies, examining all divine Scripture according to this dissection of the elements, divulged unheard-of monsters of new heresies. And let these things be said sufficiently concerning the first mode of this explanation.

On the Second Mode of the Elemental Exposition

The second mode of the elemental explanation — which we may call the Arithmetical [1] — labors in investigating the significations of the numbers which the letters, placed in words and syllables, represent. Which mode, as it is almost unknown among us, so among the Greeks and among the Hebrews was used chiefly for this reason: that their individual letters signify some number. [2] For among the Hebrews א Aleph signifies one, ב beth two, ג ghimel three, ד daleth four, and so on in succession, the individual elements of the Hebrew alphabet indicate some number. Among the Greeks too, α represents one, β two, γ three, δ four, and the rest that follow. But among the Latins it is not so: they have only seven letters as indices of numbers, [3] that is, I, V, X, L, C, D, M — of which I signifies unity, V the number five, X ten, L fifty, C a hundred, D five hundred, M a thousand. And therefore the Latins neglect this mode of explanation as unfit for Latin letters — [a mode] which certain widespread expositions of both peoples show to have once been usual among the Jews and Greeks.

Of their number, among the Greeks, was that explication of Appion the Grammarian of Alexandria, who was called by Tiberius Augustus "the Cymbal of the World." [4] He, when he expounded that first word of the Homeric Iliad, Μῆνιν [M■nin, "wrath"], used to say that Homer had artfully begun his book with the syllable μη, namely so that by these two letters he might comprehend the whole number forty-eight — [the number] of the volumes by which the whole body of the Iliad and the Odyssey published by him is completed. For the Greeks designate the number forty-eight by μ [40] and η [8].

There are also among the Hebrews innumerable explanations of this kind, proceeding from the kabbalistic discipline, by which many hidden mysteries in the sacred words are opened. As, for example, in that name of God which among them is ineffable, and is written with these four letters, יהוה IEHOVA, they say that three numbers are contained: that is, Ten in the letter Iod, Six in the letter Vau, and a double Five in the two ה He. By which numbers also, they say, is signified the infinite and admirable abundance of the divine powers — because Ten by its own nature designates the fullness of all knowledge and wisdom, and Six the power that is the procreatrix of all things and of all good — just as Philo the Jew shows learnedly enough in his explanations of the Hexaemeron and of the Decalogue, whose words I omit for brevity's sake.

Peter Brutus, bishop of Catania, also brings a signal example of this exposition, in his volume against the Jews. In the fourth chapter of it, expounding that prophecy of Isaiah concerning the Messiah, His empire shall be multiplied, [5] he asks why the letter ם Mem — placed in the middle of the word למרבה (Lemarbe, that is, "shall be multiplied") — is closed [in its final form], contrary to its nature, since nowhere in all divine Scripture is it found closed in the middle of a word, but always open. [6] And he answers, following the opinion of Rabbi Hammai in the book Sanhedrin, that Isaiah wished by this closed letter ם Mem to signify — by a certain hidden device of computation — the number of the years from his own time up to the time of the Messiah. Which computation the same Rabbi Hammai, in the place just cited, set forth thus, saying: If anyone wishes to know the time of the Messiah, let him take the number of the letter Thau, which is 400; then let him take the individual numbers of the individual letters from א aleph up to ם closed mem, whose sum is 185; and let him join it with the number 400: you will have 585 years — which, according to the computation of the Hebrews, complete the space of the whole time, from the days of Isaiah up to the coming of the Messiah, our Savior. Which words become clearer when the significations of each Hebrew letter are considered, which are these: Aleph signifies 1, Beth 2, Ghimel 3, Daleth 4, He 5, Vau 6, Zain 7, Cheth 8, Teth 9, Iod 10, Caph 20, Lamed 30, Mem open 40, Mem closed 40, and so on; but Thau signifies 400.

To this also pertains what Augustine, in the tenth tractate on John, expounding that [saying] from the gospel of John, Forty and six years was this temple in building, said: that the number of the forty-six years of the temple's building signifies the building of the bodily temple which Christ built for himself out of the flesh of Adam — whose name, ΑΔΑΜ, among the Greeks is composed of letters comprehending the number forty-six, [7] since Α signifies 1, Δ 4, Α 1, Μ 40, which numbers joined together make forty-six; [8] for in so many days was the body of Christ completed in the womb of Mary.

But it seems to me that this form of explanation is not altogether to be despised, on account of certain places of divine Scripture which cannot be conveniently explained without a certain observation of the numeral elements. Among these, most notable is the place from the 13th chapter of the Apocalypse, whose arithmetical letters the Holy Spirit bids us diligently consider and compute, in these words: [9] Here is wisdom. He that hath understanding, let him count the number of the beast; for it is the number of a man, and his number is six hundred sixty-six. By which words the Holy Spirit warns that the name by which that wicked Antichrist will call himself is composed of numeral letters signifying the number 666. Concerning which arithmetical letters, and the name resulting from them, various things have been said by the Fathers — more for the exercise of wit than for the stability of assertion — of which it pleases [me] to subjoin some here.

The 666 name-tables: four Patristic guesses at the Antichrist's name whose Greek letters sum to 666 — Teitan (Irenaeus & Hippolytus), Lateinos (Arethas), Lampetis (Tyconius), Antemos (Primasius). Sixtus closes the elemental exposition, then opens a new chapter, On the Physical (Natural) Exposition — which transfers Scripture's mystical discourse to the workings of nature. Its worked example: the Tabernacle (Exod 26–27), read as a model of the cosmos (from Philo, Josephus, Clement, Jerome) — its three parts = the three worlds; the Court = the sublunar world; the Holy Place = the celestial world (the seven-lamped candelabrum = the seven planets). Running head: LIBER TERTIVS.)*

[continuing from p159] The name of Antichrist, according to Irenaeus and Hippolytus, is ΤΕΙΤΑΝ [Teitan], that is, "Giant"; [1] and the numeral marks from which this name is deduced are these:

Τ 300, Ε 5, Ι 10, Τ 300, Α 1, Ν 50 — Sum: 666.

According to Arethas, his name is ΛΑΤΕΙΝΟΣ [Lateinos], that is, "the Latin"; and the numeral letters are these:

Λ 30, Α 1, Τ 300, Ε 5, Ι 10, Ν 50, Ο 70, Σ 200 — Sum: 666.

According to Tyconius, his name is ΛΑΜΠΕΤΙΣ [Lampetis], that is, "illustrious"; and the numeral letters are these:

Λ 30, Α 1, Μ 40, Π 80, Ε 5, Τ 300, Ι 10, Σ 200 — Sum: 666.

According to Primasius, it is ΑΝΤΕΜΟΣ [Antemos]; and the elements of the numbers are these:

Α 1, Ν 50, Τ 300, Ε 5, Μ 40, Ο 70, Σ 200 — Sum: 666.

And these things concerning the elemental explanation we have recounted perhaps more at length than was needful, that we might more fully explain a matter unusual and known to few.

On the Physical Exposition

The Physical, that is, Natural exposition [2] is that which transfers the mystical discourses of divine Scripture to the universe, or to the powers and works of all nature — that is, to the matter, form, and parts of this sensible world — inquiring, in the divine oracles, into the motion, order, and adornment of the celestial spheres, the qualities of the elements, the properties of metals, the virtues of plants, and the habits of living creatures. This way of expounding certain notable expositors of Exodus and Leviticus especially entered upon among the Hebrews, who explained the natures of almost all things in the interpretation of these volumes, showing how Moses — according to the correspondence of the threefold world and the universal nature of things — ordered the ark, the tabernacle, the vessels, the vestments, the rites, the sacrifices, and the other mysteries as an image of these things, for placating God and the heavenly powers and for the expiation of man. An example of this explanation, gathered from Philo, Josephus, Clement of Alexandria, and Jerome, upon the tabernacle of Moses, is this:

An Example of the Physical Exposition, in the Tabernacle described by Moses (Exodus, chapters 26 and 27)

If anyone contemplates the structure of the Mosaic tabernacle, and the things which are in it, and considers each not idly but prudently, he will find that Moses, that divine man, represented in all these things, in a certain manner, the nature of the whole universe. [3] For it was fitting that he who had determined to build for God, the author of the whole world, a tabernacle made by hand, should take a likeness of those things out of which the world was founded by God. First of all, therefore, for this cause, he divided the admirable structure of his tabernacle into three parts [4] — namely, into the vestibule, the Hall, and the inner shrine (or, into the Court, the Hall, and the innermost sanctuary) — which might represent to us the totality of the divine workmanship, distinguished into three parts, or into three worlds: [5] that is, into this sublunar world which we inhabit; into the one next to it, the celestial world; and into the highest of all, the ultramundane world — which the Theologians call angelic, the Philosophers intellectual, and which "by no one," as Plato says, "has been sufficiently extolled according to its dignity."

The first part of the tabernacle, therefore, called the Court and Vestibule, bore the image of this sublunar world; [6] to whose likeness it was placed under the open sky, defended by no roof or shade, but ever exposed to rains, to the Sun, to heat and cold. And there were engaged in it, promiscuously, not only men clean and unclean, sacred and profane, but also animals of every kind; and there was in it — on account of the sacrifices and continual immolations — a perpetual vicissitude of life and death.

The second part, or the Hall, which was called the Holy [Place], occupying the middle place between the vestibule and the inner shrine, and shining with the whole splendor of gold, figured the celestial world, [7] set between the supercelestial and the subcelestial world. For there was, in its southern region, a golden candelabrum distinguished with seven burning lamps, [8] which seven signify the motions of the wandering luminaries; for the Sun and the Moon, with the other planets, deflecting far from the northern regions, are more observed in the southern parts of the world. And among these lamps, the one which holds the middle summit of the candelabrum — having three lamps on either side — bears the likeness of the solar star. [continues p161: re-]fert…

[1] Various opinions of the Fathers on the name of the Antichrist. [2] What the physical exposition of Scripture is. [3] Moses, in the construction of the Tabernacle, represented in a certain way the nature of the whole universe. [4] Why Moses divided the structure of the tabernacle into three parts. [5] There are three worlds: the sublunar, the celestial, and the ultramundane. [6] The Court of the Tabernacle bore the image of the sublunar world. [7] The second part of the Tabernacle figured the celestial world. [8] The seven lamps in the golden candelabrum signified the seven planets.

(Rich PDF p. 161 — printed folio 144. The cosmic Tabernacle finishes: the Sun tempers the music of the spheres; the Holy of Holies = the supercelestial/angelic world; the High Priest bearing the Name IEHOVA on his forehead = Christ/God; the hidden Ark = divine providence, its tablets/rod/manna = the laws of wisdom, the scepter, and liberality; the Cherubim = the Angels. Then a new chapter, On the Prophetic Exposition — its definition, and its twofold mode (unfulfilled prophecy pointed to its fulfillment; already-fulfilled prophecy to be fulfilled again), with examples (2 Sam 7:14 → Christ; Rachel's weeping at three levels) and its masters — Melito, Methodius, Proclus (before Theodosius, on Gog and Magog), Joachim of Fiore, and Savonarola. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

[continuing from p160] …[the middle lamp] bears the likeness of the solar star. For the Sun — possessing the fourth orb equally from the highest and the lowest heaven, and shining in the midst among the other six wandering stars — tempers that musical and truly divine instrument of the celestial spheres.

But the third part of the tabernacle — most sacred and most secret of all, which was called the Penetrale, the Adytum, and the Holy of Holies — expressed the figure of the supercelestial and angelic world, [1] which is the habitation of the Angels and of God, the best [of beings]. For just as that secret adytum of the Mosaic tabernacle was invisible and inaccessible to mortals, and no one could enter into it except the High Priest, who bore on his forehead that ineffable name, the Tetragrammaton IEHOVA: so into that supercelestial and divine world it is lawful for no one to enter, nor to look into and exactly comprehend with the mind the things which in it are invisible and incomprehensible — save for Him alone whom the highest prelate of sacred things foreshadowed, bearing on his forehead the unspeakable name IEHOVA, which is expounded, "Who is, and who shall be, and who makes to be." [2] And this is the supreme governor of all things, God — He alone bearing the ineffable name IEHOVA, that is, "Ever-existing, and bestowing on the rest the power of being" — and He alone embracing the incomprehensible things of the supercelestial world with that same wisdom by which He comprehends Himself.

The Ark, too, which was hidden in the innermost recesses of the tabernacle, signified the divine providence and governance toward the world. [3] For as the ark had been appointed for keeping the tablets of the divine law, and the rod of Aaron, and the manna, so in the storehouses of divine providence are contained all the laws of wisdom by which the whole totality of creatures is governed; the rod, and the scepter of ruling power, by which it is ruled; and the manna of most bountiful liberality, by which it is vivified and fed. And the Cherubim, encompassing the ark with the bendings of their wings, denote those celestial minds and blessed spirits who surround and attend the divine majesty with the obedience of most ready swiftness, as with a winged and swift ministry. [4]

On the Prophetic Exposition

The Prophetic exposition is that which — devised by no human wit, but revealed only by the inbreathing of the divine Spirit — turns the holy Scriptures to the prediction of future things with a certain and immovable truth, [5] referring the oracles, prophecies, visions, prophesyings, and typical actions of the Prophets which are contained in the sacred letters to future changes of the times and revolutions of the ages, to the vicissitudes of kingdoms, to the adversities of nations, peoples, and cities — wars, disasters, ruins, victories, restorations, felicities, and other things like these — which the divine providence (whether the merits of mortals so demanding it, or by its hidden but nevertheless just judgment) has decreed shall come to pass hereafter.

Now there is a twofold mode of this exposition: [6] of which the one refers to certain not-yet-fulfilled, or not-yet-understood, prophecies of the ancient Prophets (the divine light illuminating them), showing — and, as it were, most certainly pointing out with the finger — the places, persons, and times in which oracles long ago foretold, but not yet understood, are being fulfilled. The other mode announces that the ancient predictions of the seers — already fulfilled and recognized for many ages — are to be fulfilled again in future times. For there are in the divine letters many Prophecies which have various and manifold senses, both historical and typical, [7] yet one more eminent than the rest, and primary, and more properly their own — namely, that to which the mind of the one prophesying was borne at first glance, and to which the Prophet especially directed the keenness of his mind. Since, therefore, some of these prophecies have been fulfilled according to their primary sense, certain divine expositors have handed down that the same are to be fulfilled again according to other, secondary senses — whether historical or typical — bringing as an example that oracle from the second book of Kings which God promised He would fulfill in Solomon: I will be to him a father, and he shall be to me a son — [8] which Paul, writing to the Hebrews, affirms was consummated anew in Christ. And likewise that prophecy of Jeremiah: A voice was heard in Rama: much weeping and wailing; Rachel bewailing her sons, and she would not be comforted, because they are not [9] — which, when the Prophet had uttered it concerning the sons of Israel about to be led away into the Babylonian captivity, Matthew — according to the truth of another understanding — transferred to the slaughter of the little ones; [10] and likewise others, again, according to yet another sense, said the fulfillment of the same prophecy took place in the final destruction of the holy city, when, by the road on which Rachel is buried near Bethlehem, infinite thousands of captive Jews were sent off to Rome.

In both parts of this explanation there excelled Melito of Sardis, Methodius the Martyr, Proclus Archbishop of Constantinople, Joachim Abbot of Fiore, and others; of whom, in the first part, especially eminent was Proclus, who — as Socrates testifies in the seventh [book] of his history — when the Scythians, under their leader Rugas, had taken up arms against the Roman empire, delivered before Theodosius Augustus and his army a Prophetic oration, in which, expounding that prophecy from the book of Ezekiel, Son of man, prophesy against Gog and Magog, [11] he so bent the Prophet's words to the occasion of the imminent war that he foretold all the punishments described by Ezekiel to be hanging over the Barbarians. To which prediction God, a little afterward, gave a happy issue: fire being sent down from heaven, and the chief of the Barbarians consumed by the burning. The other part of this exposition, not far from our own times, Jerome Savonarola professed — a man of most ardent spirit [12] — in his public exposition of the Prophets, especially Amos, Zechariah, and Ezekiel, whose already-fulfilled prophecies he foretold would be fulfilled again in his own times. How much he availed in this part, let others judge; he himself [being] another's servant, and, according to [the word] of Paul… [continues p162]

[continuing from p161] …[he himself another's servant, and, according to] the opinion of Paul, standing to his own master — I would not rashly dare to judge [him]. Thus far let it be said concerning the kinds of the sacred expositions, both universal and particular, pertaining to the first part of this art; now we must pass over to the second part of the same art.

On the Second Part of the Expository Art, or, On Invention

Concerning the first part of this sacred interpretive art, which we have named the Definitive — that is, concerning the senses of divine Scripture, and concerning the kinds of the sacred expositions, and concerning their number, definition, and usefulness — I have discoursed thus far, as much as the plan of the present undertaking seemed to require. It would now be consequent that I should pursue Invention, [1] which is the second part of this Art, expounding all the rules and the several precepts of investigating and finding out the manifold and obscure varieties of the senses hidden in the divine letters. But since an exact treatment of Invention — scarcely to be unfolded [even] in a large and separate volume — cannot be comprehended in the small portion of a little book, and since many most excellent authors have left writings about it, accessible to all, it has seemed [good] to me to pass over the complete exposition of this part (as more than sufficiently explained by others) and to proceed to the third part of this art, which is called the Dispositive — by no author, up to this day, ever either described or observed. Yet, lest the curious reader complain that the Inventive part of the expository faculty has been utterly neglected by me, I will run through, in the briefest words, the sum of the chapters by which invention itself is comprehended, noting at the same time the names of the Authors who have treated of its several chapters.

Invention — which introduces us to the investigation of the hidden and abstruse senses of divine Scripture — is accomplished in a twofold kind: namely, the Historical, which hunts out the historical understandings, and the Mystical, which searches out the mystical meanings. Now the Historical kind of Invention embraces many species or parts, of which the more notable — and, among the rest, the more necessary — are: the Tropical, Topical, Chronical, Physical, Mathematical, and Ethical.

The Tropical [2] is that which introduces the reader to the understanding of tropes, phrases, figures, idioms, properties, and locutions — especially Hebrew and Greek — and of all figurative expressions, in which the divine letters abound above the writings of all nations; [3] in which part Jerome, Augustine, Bede, and Sanctes Pagninus wrote many things, to be reviewed in the following volume. [4]

The Topical, or Topographical, [5] is that which furnishes particular descriptions and maps of the provinces, regions, seas, mountains, rivers, forests, cities, towns, and other places which are read of in the sacred letters; which, among the Greeks, Eusebius of Caesarea did abundantly, and, among the Latins, Jerome, Bede, Matthaeus Aurogallus, Adamnan, Callistus, Orontius, and others to be enumerated in the next book. [6]

The Chronical, or Chronographical, [7] is that which — for removing certain obscurities in the sacred letters that arise from the various computation of days, months, and years — explains all the series, successions, and enumerations of times, ages, years, Olympiads, weeks, and generations, with which the whole divine scripture is everywhere strewn. This part had, as its writers, notable beyond the rest: among the Greeks, Philo and Eusebius; among the Latins, Bede, Hermann the Lame, and John Driedo — of whom we shall speak in the fourth book. [8]

The Physical [9] teaches the history, properties, habits, and chief powers of all natural things — that is, of the heavens, the elements, animals, and plants — which are described everywhere in the sacred letters. In this part there labored, among the Latins, Bede (in the book On the Nature of Things), Anselm (in the book On the Image of the World), Honorius of Autun (in a book of the same title), and Vincent bishop of Beauvais (in the Natural Mirror). [10]

The Mathematical [11] is that which opens the way to understanding certain Geometrical, Astronomical, Arithmetical, and Musical considerations — some of which are in the divine letters — treating of measures, of figures, of numbers, of the plan of buildings, of the motions of the heavens, of stars, of musical instruments, of the various harmony of sounds and voices. Of these Bede, Honorius of Autun, and Isidore wrote some things. [12]

The Ethical [13] is that which exhibits certain brief little introductions concerning the moral virtues which are delivered in the sacred letters — such as those which Bonaventure the Cardinal, Humbert Master General of the Preachers, William bishop of Lyons, and Chrysostomus Javellus composed. [14] These, then, are the chief species of invention, comprehended under the historical kind of finding-out.

The second kind of Invention, which is called Mystical, [15] raises the readers to understanding the spiritual and loftier senses of divine Scripture — that is, the Allegorical, Anagogical, and Tropological understandings — with rules, formulas, and certain precepts applied to this end, by which (as by keys) the abstruse mysteries of spiritual understanding are unlocked, and the mystical significations of all words and terms are explained. In this part there flourished, among the Greeks, Cyril; among the Latins, Tyconius the African, Eucherius, Rabanus [Maurus], Hugh of St. Victor, Sanctes Pagninus, and very many others whom we shall enumerate in the following volume. [16] Now let it suffice to have noted these few things concerning the Inventive part of this art.

The Third Part — the Dispositive (Methodical) exposition opens: arranging the found senses into an ordered exposition through diverse "Methods." A numbered list of 24 Methods follows, with Psalm 116 (the shortest psalm) chosen as the running example to be worked through all of them. [continuing from p162] The third and last part of this sacred art — which we call the Dispositive and the Methodical [1] — is that which teaches how to arrange the already-found senses of divine Scripture, and the already-described kinds of exposition, into an ordered series of narration, and to accommodate them through diverse modes of speaking and various ways of teaching, which we call Methods. Now the Methods, or ways, suited for handling and adapting the kinds of the sacred expositions, are almost innumerable; of which, those that are chief among the Catholic expositors of divine Scripture, and most used among the rest, are comprehended in the enumeration set below.

An Enumeration of the Methods which the holy expositors use in arranging the kinds of the sacred expositions; they are these:

1	Translatio (Translation)	13	Tabellaria (Tabular)
2	Stigmatica (Stigmatic)	14	Enarratio (Narration)
3	Syllabica (Syllabic)	15	Collatio (Collation)
4	Partitio (Partition)	16	Meditatio (Meditation)
5	Epitome (Epitome)	17	Poëma (Poem)
6	Egloge (Ecloge / selection)	18	Epistola (Epistle)
7	Notariaca (Notariac)	19	Inquisitio (Inquiry)
8	Paraphrasis (Paraphrase)	20	Coacervatio (Heaping-up)
9	Lexice (Lexical)	21	Thematica (Thematic)
10	Annotatio (Annotation)	22	Collectanea (Collectanea)
11	Commentatio (Commentary)	23	Scholastica (Scholastic)
12	Sciographica (Sciographic)	24	Pandesiaca (Pandesiac)

These, therefore, and so many, are the Methods serving the sacred expositors, of which, in the present treatise, we are about to explain the descriptions, parts, offices, and examples, each separately. And we shall take, in place of a general theme and a most apt example for expressing the peculiar conditions and properties of each Method, Psalm 116 [2] — the shortest of all — showing how we may deduce its exposition through all the species of Methods, and turn it through the several varieties of the species, with the clearest rules and examples, taking the beginning of our treatment from the very translation of divine Scripture.

On Sacred Translation — The First Method

Translation, or Interpretation [3] — which, both according to the order of nature and according to the order of doctrine and of time, claims for itself the first place among the other explanatory methods of divine Scripture — is the Method which turns the holy scriptures from one language into another, rendering not only sense for sense, but word for word, with the utmost care and fidelity. For although, in the interpretation of secular writings, the highest praise of the interpreter is that he express not word for word (for that often renders the translation absurd), [4] but sense from sense, aptly and elegantly: yet in the sacred scriptures — on account of the order of the words, and the innumerable sacraments of mysteries which lie hidden in almost every single word — a duty and a necessity lies upon the faithful interpreter, that he render word for word most faithfully. In this zeal of translating there excelled, among the Latins, St. Jerome, Augustine [Giustiniani] bishop of Nebbio, and Sanctes Pagninus; [5] but among the Greeks, the seventy-two interpreters — approved by the authority of the Apostles and Evangelists, who everywhere used their translation — and after them Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion, and some others, from whose editions various volumes of many translations were collected, both by Origen and by other Greeks and Latins. And of these, some were called Tetrapla, others Hexapla, others Octapla, from the number of columns.

For first they called Tetrapla [6] those Greek codices in which the single pages were distinguished by four little columns, so that in the first column was the edition of the seventy-two interpreters, in the second the translation of Aquila, in the third that of Symmachus, in the fourth that of Theodotion.

They named Hexapla [7] those Greek volumes in whose single pages six columns were arranged: of these, the first had the Hebrew text of holy Scripture, written in Hebrew letters; the second, the Hebrew text set out opposite in Greek letters, for the sake of those who did not know how to read Hebrew; the third contained the version of Aquila; the fourth, the translation of Symmachus; the fifth, the edition of the seventy-two; the sixth, the edition of Theodotion.

Octapla, [8] however, they called those copies whose eight columns were so arranged that in the first six columns the six aforesaid translations were had; but in the seventh column, the fifth Greek edition, found by Origen at Jericho; and in the eighth, the sixth Greek edition, found by the same Origen on the Actian shore.

But, that these things may become clearer, we shall take (as we have already said), for the sake of an example, the hundred and sixteenth Psalm, [9] whose various translations — arranged in a decapla, that is, in a series of ten columns — we here set before the eyes: placing in the first column the Hebrew text of the Psalm; in the second, the Chaldaic; in the third, the Greek of the seventy interpreters; in the fourth, a Latin corresponding to the Hebrew; in the fifth, a Latin corresponding to the Greek; in the sixth, a Latin corresponding to the Chaldaic; and in the four following [columns], again, four different Latin editions corresponding to the Hebrew.

I. Hebrew — (the psalm in the Hebrew text)

II. Chaldaic — (the psalm in the Aramaic/Targum)

III. Greek (of the Seventy) — Αἰνεῖτε τὸν κύριον πάντα τὰ ἔθνη, ἐπαινέσατε αὐτὸν πάντες οἱ λαοί· ὅτι ἐκραταιώθη τὸ ἔλεος αὐτοῦ ἐφ' ἡμᾶς, καὶ ἡ ἀλήθεια τοῦ κυρίου εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα μένει.

IV. Latin, answering to the Hebrew (Jerome's): Alleluia. Praise the Lord, all nations; praise him, all peoples. For his mercy is confirmed over us, and the truth of the Lord [endureth] for ever.

V. Latin, answering to the Greek: Alleluia. Praise the Lord, [ye] nations; celebrate him, all peoples. For his mercy is made strong over us, and the truth of the Lord abideth unto an age.

VI. Latin, answering to the Chaldaic: Alleluia. Praise God, all peoples; praise him, all nations. For his goodness is made strong over us, and the truth of the Lord [is] for ever.

VII. Latin, answering to the Hebrew: Alleluia. Praise Jehovah, all nations; him celebrate, all nations. For the clemency of Jehovah toward us excelleth, and his faithfulness is eternal.

VIII. Latin, answering to the Hebrew: Alleluia. Praise the Lord, all nations; proclaim him, all peoples. For his kindness toward us prevaileth, and the truth of the Lord remaineth for ever.

IX. Latin, answering to the Hebrew: Alleluia. Praise God, all nations; honor him, all ye nations. For his loving-kindness toward us is increased, and the truth of the Lord abideth unto an age.

X. Latin, answering to the Hebrew: Alleluia. Praise the Lord, all nations; all peoples also, praise him. For his grace toward us groweth more and more, and his faithfulness endureth for ever.

On the Stigmatic Mode of Expounding — The Second Method

After the first Method of translating the holy letters, there follows at once, in the second place, the Stigmatic (ΣΤΙΓΜΑΤΙΚΗ), or Punctuary, method of expounding, [1] which the Hebrews call פירוש הנקודות (Perush hannekudoth), that is, the "Interpretation of the points" [vowel-points]. Now this is a peculiar exposition of the Hebrews upon the sacred letters, which — from the various positions of the vowel-points — shows the sounds, the utterances, and the pronunciations, and the significations of the individual words, and the sense of the whole sacred reading. The invention of this interpretation had this occasion:

The old language of the Hebrews, which is called the Holy [tongue], and which the writers of the divine volumes used — and especially Ezra himself (who, after the Babylonian captivity, most faithfully restored the sacred books consumed in the burning of Jerusalem) [2] — has twenty-two letters; among which there are no vowel letters — that is, [letters] sounding of themselves, and filling out the voice without the aid of another letter, such as among us are a, e, i, o, u — but all are soundless, or consonants, which by themselves alone cannot burst forth into voice. For although א Aleph, and ע Ayin, and ה He, and י Iod, and ו Vau — Hebrew letters — seem at first sight to have a vowel sound, yet they are, as it were, mute, and scarcely present anything by themselves to the ears. [3]

Since, therefore, the ancient Hebrew writers were altogether destitute of vowels, [4] they were compelled to use the writing of consonant letters alone; and when they wished to read it, and to express with mouth and tongue the words composed of soundless and utterly mute letters, they supplied — by the sound of the living voice — what was lacking to the Writing, adding to the consonant letters certain vowel sounds, borrowed from the common speech of their own nation and from the custom of ordinary pronunciation. For example: if this name Lamech had to be written, they marked it with three consonant letters only, namely למך (Lmk); then, when the same had to be pronounced with the living voice, from a certain natural [property] of their own pronunciation… [continues p165]

[1] What the stigmatic mode of expounding the Scriptures is. [2] Ezra, after the Babylonian captivity, restored the sacred books that had been consumed in the fire. [3] The Hebrews, among the 22 letters they have, reckon none as vowels. [4] The ancient Hebrew writers were destitute of vowels.

(Rich PDF p. 165 — printed folio 148. The Stigmatic method continues: the origin of the Hebrew vowel-points. After the dispersion the Jews forgot Hebrew and misread/mistranslated Scripture (the crux זכר — "memory" vs. "male," which some blame for Saul's ruin), so the Rabbis devised the ten points (plus the Scheua) to fix the reading — yet decreed the synagogue Torah scrolls stay unpointed. Then the disputed age of the pointing: Elias Levita's "Tiberias, 406 years after the fall" (which Sixtus refutes) vs. the more likely late origin among the Jews of Cairo (Rabbis Hama and Assi); but the charge that the Jews maliciously corrupted the whole text Sixtus rejects — because Jerome's Vulgate agrees with the pointed (Masoretic) reading in the key doctrinal passages. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

[continuing from p164] …[from a certain natural] skill and habit of their own pronunciation, they supplied to the eye, or sounded together, that L itself, with the sound of the vowel-letter A added, and the M, likewise, with the sound of the vowel E applied; [1] and thus, filling out the whole word with sound, they pronounced למך Lamech. And according to this custom all the Jews were wont to read whatever Hebrew writings [they read].

But after the kingdom of Jerusalem was utterly overthrown, and the Jews were led away by the Romans into their final and everlasting captivity, and scattered over the whole globe of the lands, they began little by little to forget their native speech, to unlearn the holy tongue, to lose the understanding of the sacred reading, and — because of the lack of vowel letters — to utter, read, understand, and expound the words of divine Scripture by themselves (as we have already said) senselessly, with various and ambiguous sounds; and even to translate them into other languages with diverse and mutually discrepant words and senses, both from ignorance and from malice. When the Rabbis, the masters of the Jews, had noticed this — fearing lest the true and genuine reading of divine Scripture, destitute of vowel letters, should utterly perish — they devised, in place of vowels, certain points and little marks [2] which, set to the individual consonants, would reveal the sound of each letter and open up the proper signification of each word.

That this may be [made clear] by an apt example set before [us], let us take more clearly the word זכר (zkr), written with three consonants, in that divine oracle which God uttered in the book of Exodus against the Amalekites, saying: I will blot out זכר — that is, "the memory of Amalek from under heaven." [3] Which word (as certain Jews affirm, excusing the disobedience of King Saul more piously than truly) gave occasion to the ruin of Saul himself. For when Samuel had commanded him to fulfill the aforesaid oracle upon the Amalekites, soon to be conquered by him, he — deceived by the ambiguity of the word זכר — believed the command would be satisfied if he only took away the males of the Amalekites (since זכר signifies both "male" and "memory"); and, on that account, all the males being slain except the king, he reserved for himself all the booty, the gold, the silver, and the herds of the Amalekite nation. Lest, therefore, occasion of slipping should thereafter arise from equivocations of this kind, it seemed [good] to the masters of the Jews to "point" all the sacred words. For example, lest it should henceforth be brought into doubt how the aforesaid word זכר should be read, they placed under the ז (zayin) these two points ■ ·· ■, which are called Tsere, expressing the sound of the long vowel E; but under the כ (kaph) they set these three points ■ ·.· ■, called Segol, which render the sound of the short vowel E. By which annotations of points they showed that the twofold and perfect pronunciation of this word is זכר Zecher (which signifies "memory"), and not זכר Zachar (which denotes "male").

Now, to express the sounds of all the vowels — both short and long — they invented ten positions of points and little strokes, whose names, forms, and sounds are these:

- Short: a, e, i, o, u (patah, segol, hiriq, qamets-hatuf, qibbuts)
- Long: a, e, i, o, u (qamets, tsere, hiriq-with-yod, holem, shureq)

There is also, besides these ten points, another point, called Scheua (shewa), expressed by two little points, one standing perpendicularly above the other, thus ■ ■ ■. Yet this is not reckoned among the vowels, but is called by the Grammarians, from its office, the "servant of servants," [4] because it serves the other vowel-points.

Although the doctors of the Hebrews interpreted [i.e. pointed] the whole of divine Scripture by these [points], and published it, so interpreted, to be read by all in common: nevertheless, that they might keep the venerable antiquity and majesty of the ancient writing untouched, they sanctioned by inviolable decree — after the image of the ancient scriptures which Moses, Ezra, and the other writers of the divine books had written — that those lights of the Mosaic law, which are kept in the synagogues with the utmost reverence, should be written without any vowel-points, [5] lest some detriment should seem to be brought to the authority and majesty of the divine law by adventitious and novel additions.

Rabbi Elias the German [Elias Levita], in the preface of his book Masoreth ha-Masoreth, judges that the invention of points of this kind was made in the four hundred and sixth year after the last overthrow of the holy city, by the Jews of the city of Tiberias, who were always held the most cultivated of all the Hebrews in the holy tongue. [6] But since neither Epiphanius nor Jerome made any mention of such points, and clearly enough indicate that they had only the consonants in their codices, it seems to me more likely — what James, bishop of Christopolis, writes in the preface to the Psalms — namely, that this kind of exposition was devised long after the times of Constantine, by the Jews of Babylon of Egypt (which is now called Cairo), [7] by the work and skill of Rabbi Hama and Rabbi Assi, authors of the Talmudic doctrine, who first showed these marks of points. I would not, however, easily affirm what the same bishop asserts in the same place: namely, that the Rabbis of the Jews, out of hatred of the Christian religion, by unanimous consent contaminated, depraved, and perverted from the true sense all the old scripture by this addition of points, so that by this perverse artifice they might, so far as possible, obscure and extinguish the truth drawn by the Christians from the Hebrew fount; and that, for this cause (he adds), no faith is to be given to the Hebrew copies, as corrupted and falsified by an interpretation of points of this kind. [8] From assenting altogether to this opinion I am prevented by the translation of St. Jerome, which — in the chief passages of divine Scripture, by which the foundations of the Christian faith and the truth of our dogmas are especially proved, and about which in particular there is controversy between the Jews and us — almost always agrees with this punctuary [pointed] exposition of the Hebrews, although in matters of the slightest moment, and which… [continues p166]

[1] Jerome noted this same thing about the "pointing" of the Hebrew consonants, in his epistle to Evagrius. [2] Certain points, in place of vowels, were devised by the Rabbis after the overthrow of the city of Jerusalem. [3] Exod. 17:14. — The Jews try to excuse the disobedience of Saul. [4] The Scheua is called by the Grammarians the "servant of servants." [5] The volumes of the Mosaic law which are kept in the Synagogue have no points in place of vowels. [6] Rabbi Elias, who thinks the Hebrew points were invented in the year 436 (so the margin; the body says 406) after the last overthrow of the city, is refuted. [7] The Jews of Babylon of Egypt (now called Cairo) invented the points in place of vowels. [8] The opinion of James of Christopolis, concerning the corrupted sacred books, is not approved.

*(Rich PDF p. 166 — printed folio 149. The Punctuary method closes: Jerome's Vulgate agrees with the Masoretic pointing except in trivia, and Augustine (*City of God 15) denies the Jews corrupted their own books. Then the Prosodic illustration — the Greek analog to Hebrew pointing (accents, breathings, punctuation) — anciently absent (Epiphanius, Cisneros), added to fix reading and resolve ambiguities, illustrated by Luke 2:14 (the Gloria: "peace to men of good will," resolved by Origen's point). Then the Stigmatic paradigm on Psalm 116 (four columns: unpointed Hebrew / pointed Hebrew / transliteration / Latin), and the opening of Method Three: the Syllabic (Indicatory) — the making of indices and concordances. Running head: LIBER TERTIVS.)

[continuing from p165] …[although in matters of the slightest moment, and such as] can be interpreted in several senses without any prejudice to the truth, [Jerome's translation] often disagrees [with the pointing]. To this is added also that persuasion of Augustine, in the fifteenth [book] of the City of God: that no one of sound mind could ever believe that the Jews — however evil and perverse — in codices so many, and so widely and far dispersed, came together into one and conspired, out of hatred of the Christians, unto the corruption of their own volumes; [1] so that, namely, while they envied to others the truth of Scripture, they should deprive themselves of the truth. And [let] these things [be said] concerning the Punctuary Exposition of the Hebrews.

With this [the punctuary method] the Prosodic illustration of divine Scripture among the Greeks seems to have some shadow of likeness [2] — that is, the addition of tones, breathings, accents, points, and hypostigmata [subscript marks]: which are now seen everywhere in the Greek codices. That these were anciently written with the bare letters only, without any marks of accents, [3] there are witnesses: Epiphanius, bishop of Salamis, in his book on the parts of divine Scripture, and Francisco Ximenes [Cisneros], Archbishop of Toledo, in his edition of the New Testament. But it seemed [good] afterward to the Greek Fathers to add these [marks], [4] not only for the correct and distinct reading of holy Scripture, but also for distinguishing certain ambiguities of no small moment, which without these little marks, apices, and points could not be resolved. For example: when it came into controversy in what sense that sentence should be understood which is had in the song of the Angels, in Luke the Evangelist — καὶ ἐπὶ γῆς εἰρήνη ἀνθρώποις εὐδοκία, [5] that is, And on earth peace to men of good will — namely, whether it should be understood [that] peace was brought to men endowed with good will, on account of their good will (which sense the aforesaid Greek words seem to make, written without any punctuation, and with a point affixed under the last letter of the final word); or whether it ought rather to be understood [that] not only peace, but also good will, together with that peace itself, was exhibited to men (which sense the same words render, if they be read thus: καὶ ἐπὶ γῆς εἰρήνη, that is, And on earth peace; then, a mark of punctuation being interposed, there is added ἀνθρώποις εὐδοκία, that is, good will to men — the point being removed, namely, which lay under the last letter). Origen took away the whole controversy, a small point being placed under the last letter of the word εὐδοκία, which would indicate that word to be not of the first case, but of the third [i.e., an oblique, genitive form], and to conclude the sentence thus: And on earth peace to men [endowed] with good will. And there are also many other ambiguities of this kind, which are removed in the sacred Greek codices by little marks of this sort — which anyone even moderately skilled in Greek letters will easily recognize by himself.

A Paradigm of the Stigmatic Interpretation upon Psalm 116, comprising four little columns:

- I — contains the Hebrew text, destitute of vowel-points;
- II — has the same text, interpreted [supplied] with vowel-points;
- III — contains the Hebrew words, written in Latin letters according to the interpretation of the vowel-points;
- IV — has the Latin translation of the same Hebrew text.

III. (Hebrew transliterated)	IV. (the Latin, in English)

On the Syllabic Mode of Expounding — The Third Method

The Syllabic (ΣΥΛΛΑΒΙΚΗ), or Indicatory, Method — which composes the indices of books (called by the Greeks syllaboi) — is a most ancient invention, [6] as Marcus Tullius [Cicero], writing to Atticus, testifies. For since those studious men of old always desired to have a rich store of all things and of all words ready at hand, and with the greatest convenience, they devised for themselves indices arranged in alphabetical order, by which, with the least expense of labor and time, they might be led as if by the hand to whatever each one sought. Imitating their invention, the later lovers of letters — especially the Jurisconsults and the Theologians — reduced almost all the books of their profession into lists, syllabi, indices, tables, and most copious repertories; among which the first place is held by that most opulent Biblical Index, which they call the Greater Concordances of the sacred Bible, collected by Hugh the Cardinal [of St-Cher] and Conrad of Halberstadt the Monk, with five hundred monks of various monasteries assisting… [7] [continues p167]

[1] St. Augustine denies that the Jews corrupted the sacred books. [2] What the prosodic illustration of the Scriptures is. [3] The sacred books among the Greeks were anciently written without accent-marks. [4] Accents were rightly added in the Greek copies of the Scriptures. [5] Luke 2:14. [6] The syllabic method is most ancient. [7] The Concordances of the Bibles were collected by Hugh the Cardinal and Conrad of Halberstadt — with the help, nevertheless, of 500 monks.

(Rich PDF p. 167 — printed folio 150. The Syllabic method worked out on Psalm 116: the great biblical Concordance (its authors gathered every word of the Bible alphabetically) and its immense usefulness; Sixtus recalls his own little rule-book on it. Then the three steps for building an exposition from it: (1) harvest every "Laudare" (praise) citation; (2) select the apter ones onto a slip, restoring from the Bible the periods the Concordance truncated; (3) sort the "forest" of texts into logical headings — the loci of "Divine Praise" (definition, causes, effects, parts, etc.). He then displays the raw first stage: an undistinguished medley of Scripture's praise-texts, verbatim from the Concordance (continuing onto the next page). Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

[continuing from p166] …[with five hundred] monks [of various monasteries] — who gathered all the nouns, verbs, participles, adverbs, prepositions, and all the parts of speech (both declinable and indeclinable) comprehended in the whole body of the Bibles, and arranged them in alphabetical order, noting the books, the chapters, and the individual lines of the chapters, in which any word similar and concordant to the word sought might be had. And so great is both the convenience and the usefulness of this great Index, [1] that when the studious reader has first learned to handle it prudently and with judgment, and has begun to grow accustomed to familiarity with it, he immediately perceives that he has found in it a certain inexhaustible treasure — that is, a universal and most complete exposition of the whole of divine Scripture — from the use of which he may take no less fruit and delight than if he had unrolled innumerable commentaries of the expositors.

I remember that once, at the request of friends, I gave to this index a brief little commentary, entitled On the Use and Usefulness of the Concordances of the sacred Bible, comprising certain brief and clear rules, [2] by which the lovers of sacred letters, being instructed, might easily be able — from this one volume of Concordances alone, even without any commentaries of the expositors — to understand and explain the senses and the various and manifold understandings of almost innumerable passages obscure in the divine letters; and not only to explain [them], but (what is far more laborious) to procure for themselves, upon any sentence of divine Scripture, the amplest exposition, and, if there were need, even to find the matter for a whole and copious sermon. An example of this device I will set before you upon the beginning of Psalm 116, showing by what method one may, from this Index of concordances, gather a most abundant exposition upon the two first words of this Psalm; for the explaining of which, three things must first be performed by you.

First, the volume of the Concordances being opened, you will seek, under the syllable LAV, the word Laudare [to praise], and all the words likewise akin to that word — such as Laus, Laudatio, Laudans, Laudabilis, Laudandus, and the like; and you will immediately find, under these words, all the sayings, testimonies, authorities, and sentences of both testaments pertaining to the praise of God, cited by number — though with the periods truncated, and noted very strictly.

Secondly, out of so numerous a multitude of sentences you will gather only those, and copy onto a slip, which you shall see to be more distinguished, and which you shall recognize as apter and more accommodated to your purpose; and you will easily discern them among the others, and separate them, with little labor, from the less apt — if you have first been versed in the reading of the sacred letters, and are not utterly destitute of judgment. But it will be necessary, in copying out the aforesaid authorities, always to have the codex of the Bible before your eyes, so that, it being inspected, you may faithfully supply and restore to their pristine integrity those periods which you had found truncated in the Concordances.

Thirdly, after you have written out integrally the sentences suited to your purpose, run through them all again, from first to last, with a little thought, and weigh with yourself for a while the sense of each; and then — according to that common method of partition which the Dialecticians, the rhetoricians, and all the best writers are wont [to use], and which it was necessary you should first have learned in the schools — distinguish the now-collected forest of sentences, and reduce [them] into certain orders and classes; and in these orders, separately, and under diverse titles, [arrange] the individual authorities, as they shall have seemed to you more related among themselves in sense and scope; so that, from their very disposition, the whole series of the argument "On Divine Praise" may be unfolded — that is, that there may be gathered by you the definition, the causes, the effects, the parts, the offices, the modes, the places, the times, the necessity, the usefulness, the impediments, and the like, of divine praise, which the Dialecticians and Rhetoricians bid [us] inquire into in any proposed matter.

But, that you may understand these things more plainly, I will first set before your eyes the undistinguished medley of sentences of divine Scripture pertaining to divine praise, taken word for word from the book of Concordances with its own numbers; then I will distribute the same authorities into particular titles by that method, so that in them you may read an exact and copious explanation of the words with which Psalm 116 begins.

An Undistinguished Medley of the Sentences of Sacred Scripture pertaining to the Praise of God, transcribed word for word from the Index of Concordances

TO PRAISE (Laudare).

- Ps. 23:23 — In the midst of the church I will praise thee.
- 21:27 — They shall praise the Lord that seek him.
- 34:18 — Among a grave people I will praise thee.
- 34:28 — All the day thy praise.
- 62:6 — With lips of exultation my mouth shall praise.
- 68:31 — I will praise the name of God with a canticle.
- 83:5 — For ever and ever they shall praise thee.
- 99:4 — Praise his name, for it is sweet.

• Eccli. 43:33 — He is greater than all praise.

• Isa. 63:7 — The praise of the Lord for all things.

• Jon. 2:10 — With the voice of praise I will sacrifice.

• Eph. 1:6 — Unto the praise of his glory.

• Heb. 13:15 — Let us offer the host of praise.

• Rev. 19:1 — Praise and glory to our God.

The Methodical Partition of the aforesaid Medley

(distributed into various classes of sentences, and beautifully accommodated to the exposition of the two first words of Psalm 116.)

The theme to be expounded: PRAISE THE LORD.

Definition

To praise God is to declare the amplitude of the divine perfections, so far as it can be done by us.

• Ps. 144:5–7 — Generation and generation shall praise thy works, and shall declare thy power; they shall speak the magnificence of the glory of thy holiness, and shall tell thy wondrous works; and they shall speak of the might of thy terrible acts, and shall declare thy greatness; they shall utter the memory of thy sweetness, etc.

• Eccli. 43:32,35 — Who shall declare, and who shall magnify God as he is from the beginning? For he is greater than all praise. Glorifying the Lord as much as ever you can, still his wonderful magnificence will surpass [it].

Encomium

Praise is the most excellent sacrifice of all, in which God is most greatly delighted.

• Ps. 49:14,23 — Offer to God the sacrifice of praise; and the sacrifice of praise shall glorify me.

• Ps. 68:31–32 — I will praise the name of God with a canticle, and I will magnify him with praise; and it shall please the Lord above the young calf that bringeth forth horns and hoofs.

• Ps. 115:8 — To thee I will sacrifice the host of praise, and I will call upon the name of the Lord.

• Jon. 2:10 — But I, with the voice of praise, will sacrifice to thee for my salvation.

• Heb. 13:15 — By him therefore let us offer the host of praise, always pleasing to God — that is, the fruit of lips confessing to his name.

[That God made all things unto the praise of his glory:]

• Deut. 26:19 — God created all nations unto his praise, and name, and glory.

• Eph. 1:4–5 — He chose us before the foundation of the world, and predestined us unto the adoption of sons through Jesus Christ, unto the praise of the glory of his grace.

Necessity

All creatures — insensible, sensible, and intelligible alike — are bound by divine precept to the praise of God, according to their own measure.

• Ps. 148 — Praise the Lord, all his angels; praise him, Sun and Moon, all stars and light; praise him, ye heavens of heavens, all waters, hail, snow, ice, beasts, cattle, birds, kings of the earth, peoples, etc. — down to the end of the Psalm: Let every spirit praise the Lord.

Causes

God is to be praised by us for innumerable causes; but chiefly for his surpassing goodness, [and] the innumerable benefits daily bestowed on us out of the bounty of the divine Goodness and mercy.

• Ps. 134:3 — Praise the Lord, for the Lord is good; sing to his name, for it is sweet.

• Isa. 63:7 — Let us give praise to the Lord for all the things he hath rendered to us, and for the multitude of good things which he hath bestowed according to his indulgence, and according to the multitude of his mercies.

• Ps. 99:4–5 — Praise his name, for the Lord is sweet; his mercy [endureth] for ever.

Mode

God is to be praised first in the mind, then with the voice — with Psalms, canticles, and musical instruments — and above all with good works.

• Ps. 145:1–2 — Praise the Lord, O my soul; I will praise the Lord in my life.

• Eccli. 51:8 — My soul shall praise the Lord even unto death.

• Ps. 62:6 — With lips of exultation my mouth shall praise.

• Ps. 146:1 — Praise the Lord, for a Psalm is good; to our God let praise be pleasant and comely.

• Ps. 150:3–5 — Praise him with the sound of the trumpet; praise him on the psaltery and harp; praise him with timbrel and choir; praise him on strings and organ; praise him on well-sounding cymbals. [continues p169: Time…]

[1] Here the Psalm actually reads "my justices" (iustitias), the Concordance having listed it under "Laudation."

(Rich PDF p. 169 — printed folio 152. The Methodical Partition of "Praise the Lord" finishes — the headings Time, Place, Utility, Impediments, and Conflicting Passages (apparent contradictions to be reconciled). Sixtus then closes the Syllabic method with a note to the reader on how looking up the synonyms of "praise" would enrich the exposition still further. Then Method Four: On Partition — its two offices (dividing each book into numbered chapters, and gathering the parts under titles) — with the observation that the chapter-numbering now in our Bibles is recent. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

[continuing the Methodical Partition from p168]

Time

God is to be praised not only at the appointed hours of day and night, in heart and mouth, but is to be celebrated through the whole time of life, in affection and in work.

• Ps. 118:164 — Seven times a day I have given praise to thee.

• Acts 16:25 — At midnight Paul and Silas, adoring, praised God.

• Ps. 33:2 — I will bless the Lord at all times; his praise [shall be] always in my mouth.

• Ps. 34:28 — My tongue shall meditate thy justice, thy praise all the day.

• Ps. 144:2 — Every day I will bless thee, and I will praise thy name for ever and ever.

• Ps. 145:2 — I will praise the Lord in my life; I will sing to my God as long as I shall be.

Place

God is to be praised in every place, but especially in the church and the temple.

- Ps. 112:3 — From the rising of the sun unto the going down, the name of the Lord is worthy of praise.
- Ps. 21:23 — I will declare thy name to my brethren; in the midst of the church I will praise thee.
- Ps. 34:18 — I will confess to thee in the great church; among a grave people I will praise thee.
- Ps. 134:1–2 — Praise the Lord, ye servants who stand in the house of the Lord, in the courts of the house of our God.
- Luke 24:52–53 — The disciples, returning to Jerusalem with great joy, were always in the temple, praising and blessing the Lord.

[That in the other life there are two eternal places — in one of which God is perpetually praised, in the other never:]

- Ps. 83:5 — Blessed are they that dwell in thy house, O Lord; for ever and ever they shall praise thee.
- Rev. 19:1 — I heard as it were the voice of many trumpets in heaven, saying: Praise and glory and power to our God.
- Ps. 113:17 — The dead shall not praise thee, O Lord, nor any that go down into hell.
- Isa. 38:18 — For hell shall not confess to thee, neither shall death praise thee.

Utility

The rewards of those who praise God are: the help of divine grace, salvation from enemies visible and invisible, and a life eternally blessed.

- Ps. 118:175 — My soul shall praise thee, and thy judgments shall help me.
- Ps. 17:4 — Praising, I will call upon the Lord, and I shall be saved from my enemies.
- Ps. 21:27 — They shall praise the Lord that seek him; they shall live for ever and ever.

Impediments

Sins impede us from the divine praises.

- Eccli. 15:9 — Praise is not seemly in the mouth of a sinner.
- Ps. 49:16 — God said to the sinner: Why dost thou take my covenant in thy mouth?

Conflicting Passages [to be reconciled]

That in the divine scriptures there are passages seemingly conflicting concerning the divine praise, which must be reconciled.

- Ps. 116:1 — Praise the Lord, all nations; praise him, all peoples.
- Ps. 150:6 — Let every spirit praise the Lord.

On the contrary:

- Ps. 49:16 — God said to the sinner: Why dost thou take my covenant in thy mouth?
- Eccli. 15:9 — Praise is not seemly in the mouth of a sinner.

Likewise this:

- Ps. 150:2 — Praise the Lord according to the multitude of his greatness.

On the contrary:

• Eccli. 43:33,35 [the page prints 44:35,33] — Who shall magnify God as he is from the beginning? for he is greater than all praise.

You see here, ingenious reader, how great a store of sentences the volume of the Concordances has supplied to you — in the particular little index of one word only — and how copious a furniture of words and of things it has furnished for explaining the first word of this psalm. And if, taking up the codex of the Concordances again, you shall search out in it the words synonymous with the verb "to praise" [1] — such as celebro (I celebrate), magnifico (I magnify), glorifico (I glorify), benedico (I bless), exalto (I exalt), confiteor (I confess), canto (I sing), psallo (I sing psalms), prædico (I proclaim) — and shall gather, with like zeal, the fragments of the sacred sentences placed under those synonymous words, you will again enrich your exposition with a new and far richer abundance of speech. And finally, if you shall apply the same diligence to the individual words of the same psalm, so great an affluence of all things will present itself to you that you can scarcely find the ends of the exposition you have undertaken. And let these things be said sufficiently concerning the Syllabic Method.

On Partition — The Fourth Method

Of Partition — which itself also brings much light to the divine scriptures — there are two chief offices: [2] namely, to divide, and to gather together the divided [parts]. Division [3] divides the whole body of each volume — not rashly, but according to the analogy of the divisible matters, with the greatest reason — into members, and into parts (which they call heads, or chapters), dividing [them] by number and distinguishing [them] by the addition of numbers. And this device of dividing was invented for the convenience of teachers and learners, so that what could not be grasped as a whole at once, and in a single glance, might be more conveniently and more openly learned when divided into parts. Collection, [4] on the other hand, gathers the particular sums of the divided parts under the strictest titles or inscriptions, by which — as by eyes — it illustrates and adorns the fronts of the individual chapters. But as regards division, it must be known that this arithmetical distinction of chapters which we now have in the Bibles is recent; [5] for before five hundred [years…] [continues p170]

[1] Words synonymous with "to praise." [2] The two offices of partition. [3] Division is convenient for teachers and learners. [4] What collection provides. [5] The arithmetical distinction of chapters in the Bibles is recent.

(Rich PDF p. 170 — printed folio 153. Method Four (On Partition) continues: the history of chapter and verse numbering. Before ~500 years ago Scripture was cited by narrative content, not number (the LXX added only the psalm-numbers, per Hilary; ancients like Augustine and Gregory cited by story-span). The ancient Jewish verse-division (Jerome's preserved colometry; Elias Levita: the Law, once one continuous text, was divided into Pesukim 436 years after Jerusalem's fall — corroborating the p165 margin). Verses were measured by word-count (Augustine's* Speculum*: 6 / 12 / 18 words); verse-totals gauged a book's length (Origen on the Song = 20,000; Aristotle = 5,330). The Jews' verses are unequal (Ezra & the great synagogue; Gen 1:1 vs 1:2). Finally the old sectioning of the Gospels for the Harmony (Ammonius / Eusebius / Tatian: Matthew 355, Mark 235, Luke 343, John 232). Running head: LIBER TERTIVS.)*

[continuing from p169] …[for before five hundred] years no passage of divine Scripture is found cited by number, either among the Hebrews or among the Greeks, except the psalms — of which, as appears from the Acts of the Apostles, they were wont, from the very beginning of the nascent church, to make mention with numbers added (for these numbers, as Hilary testifies in the preface of the psalms, the Seventy interpreters affixed to the psalms). [1] And those chapter-divisions and numbers which are now seen in the Greek copies, as well as in the Hebrew and Latin, were taken from our Latin codices. For those most ancient expositors used to divide the divine scriptures, and to cite them, not by the enumeration of chapters and the recitation of numbers, but by the allegation of particular histories — as Augustine said that he had written from the beginning of Genesis up to the expulsion of the first parents from Paradise, and Gregory too [said] that he had expounded from the beginning of the book of Kings up to the anointing of King David — instead of what we would now say, "on the first three chapters of Genesis," and "on the first fifteen earlier chapters of 1 Kings." They divided likewise, and set forth publicly, the scriptures by places, or periods, or verses or versicles, or the sentences of the sacred volumes expressed verbatim — which they also sometimes called Chapters or Capitula — saying, for example: "On that passage of Paul where it is written, I speak the truth in Christ [2] up to that place where it is said, of whom is Christ, who is over all, God blessed forever"; [3] or "on that which is written in Job, The oxen were plowing, and the asses feeding." [4]

I find that a similar mode of division existed also among the ancient Jews: [5] that their codices were divided by sentences, commata, members, and verses, and distinguished by certain intervals — of which Jerome is witness, in the preface of Paralipomenon [Chronicles] and of Isaiah, asserting that, for the utility of readers, he had preserved in his own translation the same cuttings of the commata and the distances of the intervals which he had found in the Hebrew codices. Although Elias Levita, in the preface of the book Masoreth ha-Masoreth, affirms — following the opinion of the Rabbis [6] — that the whole Law was once as it were one single Pasuk, or one sentence, in which all things cohered without any distinction of verses, and that it was divided into Pesukim (that is, into verses and sentences) by the Jews of Tiberias four hundred and thirty-six years after the last destruction of the holy city. The author of the book of Hebrew Questions on the books of Kings (whom St. Thomas thinks was a Jew reborn in Christ) [7] shows that the Jews cut the books into a certain number of sentences, or verses — since he says that the book of Proverbs among them contains nine hundred and fifteen verses; [8] yet I myself have nowhere read, in the commentaries of the Hebrews, any of these sentences marked with an arithmetical mark, or expressed by a numeral word.

But it must be known that the partition of verses among the Jews is different from [that] among us and the Greeks. For the ancient Greeks and Latins distinguished the verses by an equal number of words, writing in each verse almost always six words [9] — partly monosyllables, partly polysyllables: which Augustine indicates clearly enough in the book whose title is The Mirror of Divine Scripture, in which — often noting the number of verses (sometimes collected by himself from the divine books, sometimes indeed omitted) — he sets, as an example of one verse, that saying of the ninety-ninth Psalm: His people, and the sheep of his pasture. [10] As an example of two verses, that sentence of Psalm 118: How many are the days of thy servant? when wilt thou execute judgment on them that persecute me? [11] Again, as an example of three verses, he brings that from Psalm 149 [so the margin; the body prints 148]: Let them praise his name in choir; on timbrel and psaltery let them sing to him; for the Lord is well pleased with his people. [12] In these examples, if you count the words, you will find in the first six words, in the second twelve, in the third eighteen. According to this partition of verses, therefore, I judge that the measure of the ancients is to be understood, who were wont to signify the size of volumes by the number of verses, as by a more certain mark — because books are frequently unequal, on account of the diverse abundance of their matter. In which way Jerome, expressing the size of certain books, says that Origen wrote on the Song of Songs nearly twenty thousand verses; [13] that Gregory Nazianzen comprised all his works in thirty thousand verses; that Hilary, in his commentaries on the psalms, borrowed from Origen nearly forty thousand verses; and that he himself, while expounding the epistle to the Ephesians, dictated a thousand verses into it daily. So too Diogenes Laertius affirms that the sum of certain Aristotelian volumes is contained under five thousand three hundred and thirty verses.

But the Jews, in distinguishing the verses, neither attend to the number of words, nor follow the cola or commata of the discourse, but [follow] a certain ancient custom, supported only by the authority of the elders and the tradition of the Rabbis; nor do they bring any other reason for their partition, except that Ezra and the men of the great synagogue, inspired by the divine spirit, distinguished the divine scriptures in this fashion. Whence among them the Pesukim — that is, the verses — are almost all unequal, [14] as appears at the outset of Genesis, where the first Pasuk, or verse, is In the beginning God created heaven and earth, [15] but the second is much longer: And the earth was void and empty, and darkness was upon the face of the deep, and the spirit of the Lord was borne over the waters; [16] after which follows the third verse, And God said, etc., far shorter. This mode of dividing, then, the ancients had — among whom, although Ammonius of Alexandria (or Eusebius of Caesarea, or Tatian) divided the four gospels by number into chapters [17] — that is, the Gospel of Matthew into 355 chapters, Mark into 235, Luke into 343, John into 232 — yet I do not think that they had regard to this, that they might establish for us a fixed partition of the scriptures, but only to this, that they might indicate the places of the Evangelical Symphony [Harmony], in which the Evangelists said things consonant among themselves. After these, then, I have found among the ancients no numeral division of the scriptures, except in one [author]… [continues p171]

[continuing from p170] …[no numeral division of the scriptures, except in] one Hilary, who cut the gospel of Matthew, expounded by himself, into thirty-three canons. [1] For as to what we noted in the first book of this work — that the Gospel of Luke, in the commentaries of Ambrose, is divided into sixty-four titles, and in the commentaries of Bede into ninety-three chapters [2] — we believe this was done not by the authors themselves, but interpolated by the copyists or readers, who love frequent breathing-pauses in writing or reading.

But among the Greek expositors, who flourished five hundred years ago, certain ones began to divide the sacred writings into parts numerically distinguished and marked with the characters of numbers — which they sometimes called titles, and sometimes capitula [chapters]. For thus Euthymius — or, as it seems to some, Oecumenius — divided the Gospel of Matthew into sixty-eight titles, or chapters, [3] of which he inscribed the first "On the Magi," the second "On the children slain," the third "On the preaching of John," the fourth "On the doctrine of Christ," etc. But some, separating the capitula from the titles, cut the volumes into titles, and again subdivided the titles into chapters — as is gathered from Suidas and Arethas: of whom the former testifies that the Gospel of Matthew was distributed into sixty-eight titles [so the margin; the body prints 28] and into 355 chapters, [4] and the gospel of Mark into forty-eight titles and fifty-six chapters; while the latter relates that Andrew [of Caesarea] cut the Apocalypse of John into twenty-four parts, and each of these into three chapters, so that the chapters of the whole book were seventy-two.

But among the Latins who [lived] from the thousandth year of our salvation up to these our times, I find a twofold enumeration of chapters: [5] the one, as [being] older, so also more numerous — according to which the Gospel of Matthew, even in old printed codices, contains ninety-four chapters, the Gospel of Luke one hundred and seven chapters, and the Epistle to the Romans fifty chapters; the other, later, which we now have in the common Bibles, more contracted and comprised in fewer chapters — by whose numeral citation there used, in their commentaries, Hugh presbyter Cardinal of St. Sabina [Hugh of St-Cher], Alexander of Hales, Albert the Great, Thomas Aquinas, Bonaventure, and the rest, up to this day, the scholastic Theologians, whose chief care was to bring forth the divine testimonies from the holy scriptures by number. These Rabbi David Kimchi, and the other more recent Jews, follow in the division, calculation, and citation of the chapters of the old testament. Thus far concerning Division.

But concerning Collection — which is accomplished according to the [second] office of partition — it must be observed that this part is not a matter of common industry, [6] but of a keener skill. For just as, before we approach the division, we must diligently inspect that which is set forth to be divided, and rightly know the analogy of the parts to be divided, lest the division turn out wrongly: so, in collecting, there is need of a certain keen judgment, which may gather the separate little summaries of the individual divided parts, or chapters, aptly, briefly, and completely, and compress them as briefly as possible under certain witty and very strict titles and inscriptions, to be prefixed to the beginnings of the chapters. How difficult this is to do, that manifold diversity of the chapter-titles, or arguments, which are prefixed to the chapters of divine scripture, argues — varying in almost every one of the common codices, but especially in the chapters of the more obscure books, such as many are in the Prophets and in the epistles of Paul. In the fourth chapter of the epistle to the Romans I found ten arguments, or inscriptions: [7] of which some grazed the sum of one or two sentences of the whole chapter, the rest being omitted; others strayed far from the whole scope of the chapter; and some even fought diametrically against the whole meaning of the chapter. Which now, for brevity's sake, I pass over, subjoining in their place various formulas of inscriptions, or arguments, upon Psalm 116 — so that from these you may somehow perceive the varied artifice of collecting.

Argument of Psalm 116, from Paul to the Romans, chapter 15: 1. The Gentiles [praise] God for [his] mercy, the Jews for [his] truth.

Another of Paul's, from the same place: 2. The Gentiles honor God from mercy alone, the Jews from the promises.

Of Arnobius: 3. The Gentiles, the Jews being excluded, are invited to the praises of God.

Of Eusebius of Caesarea: 4. A prophecy of the calling of the Gentiles.

Of Chrysostom: 5. A prediction of the evangelical preaching, about to occupy the whole world.

Of Cassiodorus: 6. The beginning, end, and compendium of all psalms and hymns.

Of Euthymius: 7. A laudatory psalm, calling together the whole race of mortals to the praises of Christ, and to the giving of thanks to him for such great benefits conferred upon us.

Of Remigius: 8. The whole human race is invited to celebrate God on account of the mercy shown to us in the coming of Christ.

Of Honorius: 9. The Gentiles first, then the Jews, are invited to the divine praises.

Of Smaragdus: 10. The praise of God from mercy and truth — because by these two virtues all the works of the divine perfections are comprehended.

Of David Kimchi the Jew: 11. A laudatory hymn, לימות המשיח (limoth Hammashiach) — that is, looking forward to the days of the Messiah.

On the Epitome — The Fifth Method

The Epitome (ΕΠΙΤΟΜΗ) — that is, the Breviary, or compendium — is the briefest summary of the divine volumes, [8] comprehending in the fewest words, and (so far as can be done) in succinct and clear speech, grazing [the whole]… [continues p172]

[1] Hilary divided the gospel of Matthew into 33 Canons. [2] The gospel of Luke, in Ambrose's commentaries, was divided by the copyists into 64 titles, and in Bede's commentary into 93 chapters. [3] Euthymius divided the gospel of Matthew into 68 titles. [4] The gospel of Matthew was once divided into 68 titles and 355 chapters; Mark into 48 titles and 56 chapters; the Apocalypse into 72 chapters. [5] Among the Latins there was a twofold enumeration of the chapters of Scripture. [6] Collection is not a matter of common industry. (Rich PDF p. 172 — printed folio 155. Method Five (Epitome) finishes: since Psalm 116 is too short, the worked example is Sabellicus's compendium of Genesis 1 (Cassiodorus and Richard of St. Victor named as authors). Then Method Six: On the Ecloge (Excerpt) — plucking scattered Scripture-excerpts — and its three forms: Specula (Mirrors — Augustine's Speculum*); Loci Communes (Commonplaces grouped under headings of faith/hope/charity — Melito's* Six Books of Excerpts to Onesimus, Cyprian's three books to Quirinus, Bede & Defensor's Scintillæ*); and Harmonies (weaving parallel passages into one work — twofold: literal weaving, or Eusebius's numeral canon-tables; the Gospel harmonies of Tatian, Theophilus, Ammonius, variously titled* Monopanton, Monotessaron, Pandect, Evangelical Harmony*; Zacharias of Chrysopolis). Running head: LIBER TERTIVS.)*

[continuing from p171] …grazing those things which are narrated more fully, and through many repetitions, in the divine scripture (to which Tautology is most familiar), [1] the integrity and sense of the sacred narration being always preserved. Since an example of this Method cannot be exhibited in Psalm 116, on account of its narrow brevity, I will set before you, in its stead, the first chapter of Genesis, which Marcus Antonius Sabellicus thus contracted into a Compendium.

An Example of a Compendium upon the whole first chapter of Genesis

That eternal Majesty, the maker of all things — having wrought the whole world from the beginning in six days — first separated light from darkness, when the raw matter was now present, and that formless, which God had prepared from the beginning; and this was the first light of all, the day, which shone upon the world. Night was straightway joined to it. Heaven thence, on the second day, was established on high; and this was called the firmament. Then, on the third day, the earth was made stable, and moisture was poured around the earth. The Sun, on the fourth day's light, the Moon, and the stars flashed forth into the world; of these, a few — like those greater lights — wander in fixed spaces, while the rest of the multitude, which is moreover immense, and diffused in variety, describes almost innumerable effigies of things and of animals. Soon, on the fifth day, the birds and all swimming things were given to the two elements. Finally, on the sixth day, the creeping things, and the very race of quadrupeds, were assigned to the earth; and with these, the most noble animal, man — who alone, having obtained a heavenly mind, was made to the image of God. They have left us, as report has it, not-to-be-despised monuments of this labor upon the whole of divine scripture: Aurelius Cassiodorus, and Richard [of St.] Victor.

On the Ecloge, or Excerpt — The Sixth Method

The Ecloge (ΕΚΛΟΓΗ), or Excerpt (for thus Melito and Cyprian called this mode of expounding), [2] is a Method plucking here and there, scattered from all the divine volumes, diverse authorities of the scriptures — sentences, periods, testimonies, examples, and various sayings and deeds — either for the instruction of the faith and the proof of Christian dogmas, or for the discipline of morals and the exercise of piety. Of which Method diverse formulas have been devised by ecclesiastical men, among which three are held more usual: [3] namely, Specula [Mirrors], Loci Communes [Commonplaces], and Harmonies.

Specula [Mirrors] [4] are those volumes so called in which, according to the order of the books of both Testaments, there is heaped up indiscriminately, and without any order, a huge and undigested medley of the sentences of divine scripture, pertaining either to the erudition of faith or of morals — as Augustine did in the book which he himself entitled the Speculum [Mirror].

Loci Communes [Commonplaces] [5] are those so called in which the sentences, dispersed here and there through diverse parts of holy Scripture, are reduced into certain peculiar orders, or classes, distinguished among themselves by various titles, arguments, and chapters — such as the "places" on faith, on hope, on charity, and the like; under which are separately placed all those sentences which pertain either to faith, or to hope, or to charity, and which show and expound their nature, force, properties, and offices, each in its own words. In this part there labored Melito, bishop of Sardis, and Cyprian: [6] of whom the former gathered from the divine letters a work entitled Ἐκλόγων Βιβλία ἓξ — that is, Six Books of Excerpts, to Onesimus — in which, under various titles, he arranged in fitting order all the ethical sentences which are delivered in the sacred letters for living well and blessedly. Cyprian, moreover, wrote three books of like argument to his son Quirinus — the two former necessary for the support of faith, the third for the edification of good works. Many others also labored in this very kind; of whom some, among the Commonplaces of sacred sentences collected by themselves, inserted many sentences of the orthodox fathers, conformable to those "places," which might be, as it were, expositions of the preceding places — as Bede the presbyter did, and Defensor, an old author, in those books which they entitled Scintillæ Scripturæ Sanctæ [Sparks of Holy Scripture]. But others gathered the deeds and sayings of only one theme from the divine letters, and reduced [them] into one body, and illustrated [them] with brief little expositions inserted of their own — as was done by the author of the three books which are inscribed under the name of Augustine, On the Marvels of Sacred Scripture.

A Harmony [7] is called a work constructed from the similar sayings and sentences of diverse un-joined and un-ordered volumes, woven together mutually for the exposition of one matter, and reduced into one continuous, ordered, whole, and perfect volume. Nor are there lacking those who assign a twofold kind of Harmony: [8] the One, in which the parts and periods of the literal context, having a like sense, are accommodated [together]; the Other, which, without any writing of letters, is composed from numeral marks alone. In this latter kind Eusebius of Caesarea gave us an example, in the book of the Evangelical Canons, to Carpianus. But of the former kind, illustrious monuments were left [9] by Tatian of Alexandria, Theophilus bishop of Antioch, Ammonius of Alexandria, and many others, who compacted the histories of the four Evangelists into the body of one history — which some entitled Monopanton (that is, "one out of all"), others Monotessaron (that is, "one out of four"), others Pandect (that is, "containing all"), others Evangelical Harmony. And among these there were also some who elucidated Harmonies of this kind — whether published by themselves or by others — by adding their own explanations: as Zacharias, bishop of Chrysopolis, who [wrote] upon the Harmony of Am[monius]… [continues p173]

[continuing from p172] …[Zacharias, bishop of Chrysopolis, who] upon the Harmony of Ammonius wove together a Catena [Chain] of explanations from the fathers; and Antonius Bruychius, who followed up the evangelical Monotessaron collected by himself with his own exposition. We too hope, if God favor our undertakings, to send forth into the light shortly a Monotessaron of Wisdom, [1] which we now have in hand — that is, "one out of four," namely from the books of Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Wisdom, and Ecclesiasticus — in which work we have reduced the individual sentences of each kind and theme, dispersed here and there through those same volumes, under fixed and distinct orders and titles, separately, and have begun to illustrate [them] with brief commentaries applied. Let these things suffice concerning the Ecloge, of whose Method we subjoin only three examples: the first, of Commonplaces, from the aforementioned books of Cyprian to Quirinus; the second, of literal Harmony, from the evangelical Harmony of Ammonius; the third, of numeral Harmony, from Eusebius.

An Example of Commonplaces, from St. Cyprian, book 3, to Quirinus (which Augustine also used against Pelagius)

THAT IN NOTHING SHOULD WE GLORY, since nothing is ours:

In the Gospel according to John: No man can receive anything, unless it be given him from heaven. [2] Likewise in the first epistle of Paul to the Corinthians: For what hast thou that thou hast not received? And if thou hast received, why dost thou glory, as if thou hadst not received? [3] Likewise in the first book of Kings [1 Samuel]: Glory not, neither speak lofty things; let not magniloquence come out of your mouth: for the Lord is the God of knowledge. [4] Likewise there: The bow of the mighty is made weak, and the weak are girded with strength. [5] Concerning this same [matter] in the Maccabees: It is just to be subject to God, and that a mortal should not think things equal to God. [6] Likewise there: Fear not the words of a sinful man, for his glory shall be dung and worms; today he is lifted up, and tomorrow he shall not be found, because he is turned into his earth, and his thought is perished. [7]

THAT THE FREEDOM OF BELIEVING, OR OF NOT BELIEVING, is placed in the [free] will:

In Deuteronomy: Behold, I have set before thy face life and death, good and evil: choose life, that thou mayest live. [8] Likewise in Isaiah: And if you be willing, and will hearken to me, you shall eat the good things of the land; but if you will not, and will not hearken to me, the sword shall devour you: for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken these things. [9] Likewise in the gospel according to Luke: The kingdom of God is within you. [10]

An Example of Literal Harmony, from the evangelical Harmony of Ammonius

(on the history of Christ casting the sellers and buyers out of the temple, woven from the sayings of the four Evangelists — namely from Matthew ch. 21, Mark ch. 11, Luke ch. 19, and John ch. 2)

JOHN: The pasch of the Jews was near, and Jesus went up to Jerusalem. MATTHEW: And when he had entered Jerusalem, the whole city was moved, saying: Who is this? And the people said: This is Jesus the Prophet, from Nazareth of Galilee. JOHN: And Jesus entered into the temple of God; and when he had made a scourge of cords, he cast out all the sellers and buyers in the temple; the sheep also, and the oxen, and he poured out [the coin] of the money-changers, and overturned the brass and the seats of the sellers and the doves, and said to them: Take these things hence, and make not the house of my Father a house of business. [11] [a] MATT., MARK, LUKE: For it is written, My house shall be called a house of prayer — [12] [b] MARK: for all nations. [13] [c] MATT., MARK, LUKE: But you have made it a den of thieves. [14] [d] MARK: And he suffered not that any man should carry a vessel through the temple. [15] [e] JOHN: And his disciples remembered that it is written: The zeal of thy house hath eaten me up. [16] [f] MATT.: And there came to him the blind and the lame in the temple, and he healed them. [17] [g] LUKE: And he was teaching daily in the temple. [18]

Such, then, is the example of literal Harmony, taken from Ammonius.

Eusebius of Caesarea, stirred by the zeal of Ammonius, himself also devised a new method of Numeral Harmony, composed from the marks of numbers alone, without any writing of the evangelical text. [19] First he considered that Ammonius had cut each of the four Evangelists into many chapters [20] — namely Matthew into three hundred and fifty-five chapters, Mark into one hundred and thirty-five [so here; p170 gave 235], Luke into three hundred and forty-four, John into two hundred and thirty-two. Then he set these chapter-numbers one against another, according as they variously agreed or differed among themselves, and arranged them into ten classes of numeral figures — tables, or titles, which he called canons — in an elegant and clear order, in this manner:

- The First Order contained in itself four series of numbers, indicating the places, or chapters, of the gospels in which similar things were said by all four Evangelists: namely Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John.
- The Second contained the numbers of the chapters in which three agree: Matthew, Mark, and Luke.
- The Third had the numbers in which three were concordant: Matthew, Luke, and John.
- The Fourth comprised the numbers of the chapters in which three concur: Matthew, Mark, and John.
- The Fifth: in which two, Matthew and Luke.
- The Sixth: in which two, Matthew and Mark.
- The Seventh: in which two, Matthew and John.
- The Eighth: in which two, Mark and Luke.
- The Ninth: in which two, Luke and John.
- The Tenth: in which the individual [Evangelists] wrote of certain things proper [to themselves].

You have an example of this artifice in the figure set below. [continues p174: the table]

Matthew	Mark	Luke	John
VIII	II	VII	X
XI	IIII	X	VI
XIIII	V	XIII	XV
XXIII	XXVII	XVII	XLVI
LXX	XX	XXXVII	XXXVIII
XCVIII	XCVI	CCV	XL

CCXI	CXXI	CCXXXVIII	XXI
CCXX	CXXII	CCXXXIX	LXXVII
LXXXVII	CXXXIX	CCL	CXLVI
CCXLIIII	CXXXIX	CCL	CXLI

You will most easily attain the understanding of this canon, and of others like it, if you know that all the numbers which are placed from left to right in the same line indicate places of the gospels consonant and concordant among themselves. As you can observe in the first line — in which the eighth chapter of Matthew, the second of Mark, the seventh of Luke, [and] the tenth of John show that the four evangelists' sentences written below are very much alike:

- Matthew VIII: This is he of whom it was spoken by Isaiah the prophet, saying: The voice of one crying in the desert, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make straight his paths. [1]
- Mark II: As it is written in Isaiah the prophet: The voice of one crying in the desert, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make straight his paths. [2]
- Luke VII: It is written in the book of the sayings of Isaiah the prophet: The voice of one crying in the desert, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make straight his paths. [3]
- John X: I [am] the voice of one crying in the desert: Make straight the way of the Lord, as said Isaiah the prophet. [4]

In the other lines of this figure, and in the others which are had in the canons of Eusebius — as the same order is preserved, so the same manner of understanding is to be had.

On the Notariac Exposition — The Seventh Method

The Notaria, or Notariac, exposition is a Method which demonstrates the meaning of words, of sentences, and of latent senses, by means of certain marks — whether of characters, or of lines, or of points — either set beside, or inserted into, the divine Scriptures. [5] Of these there was a most frequent use among the most ancient (especially the Greek) expositors, and chiefly in the old testament. Of these we have gathered a few, for example's sake, from Epiphanius, Jerome, Stratonicus, Suidas, and Isidore, of which the sum is this:

Every exposition made by marks consists of a twofold variety of marks: [6] of these, some are called Literate, others Illiterate; whose figures and names are these.

LITERATE MARKS: 1. A — apile 2. Γ — gehennon 3. Δ — diabolos 4. E — ecclisis 5. Z — zitima 6. M — mellon

ILLITERATE MARKS: 1. ✚ (cross) — stauron 2. ■ (anchor) — ancyra 3. (anchor-form) — ancyranos 4. ⁕ (asterisk) — asteriscus 5. — (horizontal stroke) — obelus 6. ■· — metobelus

(both lists continue on p175)

[1] Matt. 3:3. [2] Mark 1:2. [3] Luke 3:4. [4] John 1:23. [5] What the notariac exposition is. [6] There are two kinds of marks.

On the Literate Marks

You now have the forms and names of the literate marks; now receive the individual significations and expositions of each.

A — Apile (that is, Threat) signifies that the prophecies of the prophets, to which this mark is prefixed, are not prophecies of an immovable and inevitable decree, but of a changeable outcome, [1] pronounced not for the sake of decreeing but of threatening — such as the prediction of Isaiah the prophet, saying to Hezekiah: [A] Set thy house in order, for thou shalt die, and not live; [2] and likewise the prophecy of Jonah crying to the Ninevites: [A] Yet forty days, and Nineveh shall be overthrown. [3]

Γ — Gehennon marks places which, in the old testament, speak obscurely of the perpetual punishments of Gehenna — such as that in Isaiah: [Γ] Tophet is prepared from yesterday, prepared by the king, deep and wide; the nourishments thereof are fire and much wood: the breath of the Lord, as a torrent of brimstone, kindling it. [4]

Δ — Diabolos, prefixed to sentences, indicates that they are to be understood of the devil — such as that which Moses wrote in Genesis: [Δ] And the serpent said to the woman: You shall not die the death; [5] and that in Job: [Δ] Behold Behemoth, whom I made with thee: he shall eat hay like an ox… he setteth up his tail like a cedar… he is the beginning of the ways of God. [6]

E — Ecclisis (that is, Calling-out) shows a period speaking of the calling of the Gentiles, or of the Church of Christ to be gathered from the Gentiles — as that in Isaiah the prophet: [E] Arise, be enlightened, O Jerusalem, for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee; and the Gentiles shall walk in thy light, and kings in the brightness of thy rising, etc. [7]

Z — Zitima (that is, Question) denotes an abstruse and hidden sentence, wrapped in the greatest obscurity, and involved in most difficult questions — such as that pericope of Paul in the epistle to the Romans: [Z] When [the children] were not yet born, nor had done any good or evil (that the purpose of God according to election might stand), not of works, but of him that calleth, it was said to her: The elder shall serve the younger; as it is written: Jacob I have loved, but Esau I have hated. What shall we say then? Is there injustice with God? God forbid. [8]

M — Mellon (that is, Future) is prefixed to a sentence which, although it may seem to speak of the present, yet contains a foreknowledge of future times — as in Isaiah: [M] Behold, I create new heavens and a new earth. [9]

X — Xenion (that is, a gift wont to be given to newcomers and guests) points out sentences which are to be interpreted of earthly and temporal gifts and promises, made especially to the Jewish people — as in Isaiah: [X] If you be willing, and will hearken to me, you shall eat the good things of the land. [10]

V — Uranion (that is, Heavenly) brings forth a place in which the felicity of eternal life is described — as in the eighty-third Psalm: [V] How lovely are thy tabernacles, O Lord of hosts! my soul longeth and fainteth for the courts of the Lord… Blessed are they that dwell in thy house, O Lord; for ever and ever they shall praise thee. [11]

Π — Pneuma (that is, Spirit) signifies that the pericope is to be understood not carnally but spiritually — as in the Song of Songs: [Π] Arise, make haste, my love, my beautiful one, and come, my dove in the clefts of the rock, in the hollow of the wall: show me thy face, let thy voice sound in my ears; for thy voice is sweet, and thy face comely. [12]

T — Tropos (that is, a mode of speech) warns that the subsequent saying is not to be understood according to the first and bare signification which the words present, but according to the customary speech of some nation. This mark the ancients used to indicate places of divine scripture expressed by Hebrew phrases, tropes, and idioms — as in Psalm 15: The lines are fallen unto me in goodly places [13] — which is as much as if you should say… [continues p176]

[1] Some prophecies are of a changeable outcome. [2] Isa. 38:1. [3] Jonah 3:4. [4] Isa. 30:33. [5] Gen. 3:4. [6] Job 40:10,11,14 (the Behemoth passage; Vulgate numbering, = 40:15,19). [7] Isa. 60:1,3. [8] Rom. 9:11–14; Gen. 25; Mal. 1:2. [9] Isa. 65:17. [10] Isa. 1:19. [11] Ps. 83:1–3 (Vulgate; = Ps. 84). [12] Song of Songs 2:13–14. [13] Ps. 15:6 (Vulgate; = Ps. 16:6).

[continuing from p175] …[which is as much as if you should say,] "The best and most illustrious lot has fallen to me." And in the third volume of Kings: [T] Naboth blessed God and the king, and therefore he was stoned — that is, because he cursed God and the king, he was killed with stones. [1]

Y — Ypsilon indicates that the sentence immediately following is to be expounded of the rejection and deposition of the Jewish people — as in this sentence of Isaiah: [Y] I will show you what I will do to my vineyard: I will take away the hedge thereof, and it shall be laid waste; I will break down the wall thereof, and it shall be trodden down; and I will make it desolate: it shall not be pruned, and it shall not be digged, but briers and thorns shall come up upon it; and I will command the clouds to rain no rain upon it. [2]

Y — Ypsilon ypogrammenon (that is, "underwritten with a line") signifies that the sentence to which it is prefixed speaks of the rejection of the old Law according to the flesh. For example, when God says through Isaiah: [Y] Offer sacrifice no more in vain; incense is an abomination to me; the new moon and the sabbath and other festivals I will not abide. My soul hateth your calends and your solemnities: they are become troublesome to me, I am weary of bearing them. [3]

X — Character (that is, a stylus, a figure, or — as Gellius interprets it — a kind of speech peculiar to each author): with this mark, as Diogenes Laertius writes, the Platonists were wont to note, in the books of Plato, the phrases and locutions proper and more choice to Plato; [4] which also, of old, in the writings of Gregory Nazianzen, Stratonicus testifies (in his Collectanea) that certain zealous annotators of the "Gregorian character" were wont to do.

XX — Character duplicatus (the doubled Character): with this sign, as Diogenes reports, in the Platonic works, was employed to designate the opinions and dogmas proper to Plato, [5] in which he entirely dissented from the other philosophers. This mark, in the volumes of Origen, Gregory Nazianzen and Basil placed, to indicate his peculiar dogmas that were discrepant from the common definition of the fathers.

ס — Segar (that is, "Closure"), inserted in the sacred codices of the Hebrews, signifies that the following narration coheres with the prior [a "closed" section].

פ — Petach (that is, "Gate," or "opening"), in the same divine volumes of the Jews, shows that the following narration has a different subject from the prior [an "open" section].

On the Illiterate Marks

✚ — Stauron (in Greek; in Latin, Crux, the Cross) is prefixed to the clauses of the old testament which contain a prophecy of Christ — such as that in the twenty-first Psalm: [✚] They have dug my hands and my feet, they have numbered all my bones; [6] and in the sixty-eighth Psalm: [✚] They gave me gall for my food, and in my thirst they gave me vinegar to drink. [7]

■ — Ancyra (that is, an Anchor prefixed to a sentence) shows that in it mention is made of the new testament and of the Gospel — as in Jeremiah, chapter 31, where it is read: [■] Behold the days come, saith the Lord, and I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah: not according to the covenant which I made with your fathers, when I led them out of the land of Egypt. And this shall be the covenant which I will make with the house of Israel: I will give my law in their bowels, and I will write it in their heart. [8]

■ — Anciranos (that is, "the upper Anchor") was placed both to the sacred reading and to the commentaries of the expositors, where some matter was especially to be observed and noted beyond the rest. Now, in the place of this mark, the Jurists have substituted a hand, which with extended index finger points out the place. ☞

⁕ — Asteriscus (that is, an Asterism, or Star) shows words and sentences of divine scripture which the earlier interpreters omitted, but which the later Interpreters restored from the Hebrew truth. As, for example, in Jerome's translation, at Hosea: the Asterisk shining before that sentence — Out of Egypt I called my son [9] — marks that it was passed over by the Seventy interpreters, and was at last restored to its place by Jerome.

In the works of Plato this mark was placed for the approval of dogmas.

— — Obelus (that is, a "Spit," a lance, or a spear; or a "lying-down" [horizontal], or transverse pyramidal little rod) is prefixed to words or sentences of the divine codices superfluously repeated, or in those places where the reading seems adventitious, of uncertain, obscure, or ambiguous authority — so that by such a mark, as by an arrow, suspect and superfluous things may be transfixed. Thus Jerome says that, in the book of Daniel, he transfixed the histories of Susanna and of Bel [10] (because they were not had in the Hebrew volumes) by prefixing the throat-cutting Spit, as narrations taken — beyond the Hebrew truth — from Theodotion's edition. Epiphanius relates that Origen, first of all, applied to the codices of divine scripture the Asterisks (to illustrate what had been lacking before) and the Obeli (to cut the throat of superfluous things). [11]

■· — Metobelus (that is, "after the spit") is placed immediately after words or sentences that have been "throat-cut" [obelized], so that the obelized [words] may be distinguished by their wording from the rest that follow in the text. As, when in Psalm 21, according to the Septuagint edition, it is read: God, my God, look upon me, why hast thou forsaken me? — it appears that those two words, look upon me, placed between the obelus and the metobelus, are superfluous. [12]

Ceraunion (that is, a "thunderbolt") is placed whenever many verses are disapproved, lest they be obelized one by one. With which sign Julius Africanus rejected the histories of Susanna and Bel, added at the end of the book of Daniel. In the Platonic books, the Ceraunion was taken up for the moral instruction of philosophy.

Obelus agnostigmenon (that is, "you have a point above" — the dotted obelus) is placed in those [passages] about which it is doubted whether they ought to be removed or added. For example, in the third chapter of Luke, the generation of Cainan — which the Evangelist interposed between the generation of Arphaxad and of Sale [Shelah], counting fifteen generations from Adam to Heber [Eber] — seems to be marked with an obelus dotted above: because in the tenth and eleventh chapters of Genesis, and in the beginning of the first [book] of Paralipomenon [Chronicles], from Adam to Heber, only fourteen generations are counted, and no mention at all is made of the generation of Cainan. [13] [continues p177]

[1] 1 Kings 21:13 (cited as 3 Kings). [2] Isa. 5:5–6. [3] Isa. 1:13–14. [4] Locutions proper to Plato were marked by his imitators with the sign X. [5] Plato's dogmas were marked by a fixed sign. [6] Ps. 21:17–18 (Vulgate; = Ps. 22:16–17). [7] Ps. 68:22 (Vulgate; = Ps. 69:21). [8] Jer. 31:31–33. [9] Hos. 11:1; Matt. 2:15. [10] Dan. 13. [11] Origen, first of all, applied asterisks and obeli to the divine Scriptures. [12] Ps. 21:2 (Vulgate; = Ps. 22:1). [13] Luke 3:36.

(Rich PDF p. 177 — printed folio 160. The critical-signs method concludes: Limniscus & Sublimniscus (variant renderings — different vs. identical wording), Antigraphus (translators' divergences — Gen 37:2), Antisigma (transposed order — the beatitudes, Matt 5), Cryphia (unsolved questions — Rom 11:33), Diple (Scripture-citations → the modern » mark), Diple peristigme (added/removed passages), and Scilus nechudoth ("three points" — the Kabalists' letter-reading, e.g. רבים "many" = Rome / Babylon / Greece / Media, on Ps 3:2); Origen borrowed these signs from Plato. Then the seven sigla for the Greek versions of the OT (Septuagint, Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion, and the Fifth / Sixth / Seventh editions). Finally Method Eight: On Paraphrase opens. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

[continuing from p176] Limniscus (that is, a little rod lying between twin points — one above, one below) is placed on those [passages] which the various interpreters of sacred scripture translated with the same sense but with different words [1] — as when, in the old psalter, in the seventy-first Psalm, according to the Septuagint edition, was placed And their name is honorable before him; immediately, a Limniscus (÷) being added, was subjoined In his eyes, according to another translation. Origen therefore interposed the Limniscus between these two translations, so that you might recognize that one sentence had been rendered by two interpreters in two different ways. This mark is taken from the surgeons, [2] among whom a limniscus is a lint, or worn little linen cloth, made into a thin and long form, which is inserted into the two sections of an incised wound.

Sublimniscus (that is, a Simple line having a point beneath it) signifies that the sentence to which it is placed was translated by two or three interpreters with the same sense, and in the same words.

Antigraphus (that is, a Semicircle facing right, and holding a point within itself) signifies that in the translations there is a sense either different among the translators themselves, or dissenting from the Hebrew truth itself — as that place of Genesis which in Hebrew is read, And Joseph accused his brothers to their father of a most wicked crime, [3] which Aquila rendered with a sense not only different from our edition, but plainly diverse from the Hebrew scripture itself: His brothers had accused Joseph to their father of a most wicked crime.

Antisigma (a reversed C) is placed at those lines and verses of divine scripture whose order is to be transposed — as it is also found placed in the ancient authors. For example, when in the Greek edition of the Gospel according to Matthew (which Chrysostom used and expounded) "the beatitude of those who mourn" is placed before "the beatitude of the meek," the "beatitude of those who mourn" is to be marked with the sign (·), so that the reader may know that the true order of the two beatitudes has been transposed. [4] Jerome, in the place of this sign, in his translation of the book of Esther, employed the first eight letters of the Greek alphabet — written in red, from alpha to theta — so that from their position he might restore the order of the Hebrew history, which had been tossed up and down by the Seventy interpreters.

Cryphia (that is, "Concealment" — the lower part of a circle, containing a point within itself) is placed in those places where a doubtful and obscure question could not be opened or solved. Which mark some of the most ancient fathers prefixed to the words of Paul in the eleventh chapter to the Romans, O the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God! [5] — wishing by this sign to indicate that that question, about the election of the Gentiles and the reprobation of the Jews (attempted by the Apostle in the ninth, tenth, and eleventh chapters), was not solved by him. The same mark the old expositors used in their commentaries, where they left an arduous difficulty undecided.

Diple (■): writers placed this in the books of ecclesiastical men, to separate or point out the testimonies of the holy scriptures, lest they be confounded with the words and reading of the commentaries. Now, in the place of this mark, this mark » has succeeded.

Diple peristigme (that is, "with twin points"): the ancients placed this on those [verses] which Zenodotus of Ephesus had wrongly added to, or removed from, the Homeric poems. The ecclesiastics used it on those [passages] which the interpreters had added to, or taken from, the Hebrew truth.

Scilus nechudoth [shalosh nekudoth, "three points"] — these three points, placed over any letter — are in use among the Kabalists, the Jewish expositors, whenever, through the individual letters of some word, they wish individual words to be understood. For example, when in the third Psalm it is said, Many rise up against me, [6] the Kabalists, expounding this of the Jewish people, ask: who are the רבים (rabim), that is, the "Many," who rise up against the people of Israel? And they answer: These are those four peoples which David signifies by the four letters of the word רבים Rabim — that is, ר (resh), the Romans; ב (beth), the Babylonians; י (Iod), the Ionians, or Greeks; מ (mem), the Medes, or Persians. For these four words the letters, marked above with points, show. There are also very many other marks of this artifice; but these are more than enough for an example of the present discipline. Diogenes Laertius, in the third book On the Lives of the Philosophers, testifies that many of the aforesaid marks were placed in the books of Plato [7] — which I judge Origen took thence, and transferred to the illustration of the divine volumes.

Besides these already-described marks, there are also certain characters by which those seven famous translations of the old testament are noted, namely:

• Ο signifies the edition of the seventy-two interpreters [Septuagint]; for which character the Latin expositors frequently put LXX, the number "two" being omitted, for brevity's sake. [8]

• ΑΚ connotes the translation of Aquila.

• Σ designates the version of Symmachus.

• Θ shows the interpretation of Theodotion.

• ε (small epsilon) demonstrates the fifth Greek edition, found by Origen in the city of Jericho, in Palestine.

• ☐ (called Episigmon, for so this mark is named) shows the sixth Greek edition, found by Origen on the Actian shore, near Nicopolis, in jars.

• Λ designates the seventh edition, published by Lucian the martyr.

On Paraphrase — The Eighth Method

Paraphrase (ΠΑΡΑΦΡΑΣΙΣ), Ecphrasis, or Metaphrasis — which (the distinction of certain rhetoricians being omitted) I wish to signify the same thing [9] — is that [method] which turns the very narration of divine scripture into another narration corresponding to it in proportion; in which indeed, as Themistius asserts in the preface of Aristotle's Posterior [Analytics], [it is permitted]… [10] [continues p178]

[1] Ps. 71:14 (Vulgate; = Ps. 72:14). [2] What the Limniscus is. [3] Gen. 37:2. [4] Matt. 5:4–5. [5] Rom. 11:33. [6] Ps. 3:2. [7] Origen took many marks from the books of Plato, in order to illustrate the divine Scriptures. [8] The Latins, for brevity's sake, put LXX for LXXII. [9] What paraphrase is. [10] What is permitted to the paraphrast, according to the opinion of Themistius.

(Rich PDF p. 178 — printed folio 161. Method Eight (Paraphrase), worked out on Psalm 116. The paraphrast's licenses: to compress, expand, supply, clarify, and reorder — always keeping the sense. Two species: a stricter one (a free translation — the Targums of Onkelos, Jonathan, Joseph) and a fuller one in two varieties — following the sense (Gregory of Neocaesarea, Titelmann) or clinging to every word (the Interwoven Paraphrase of Snoy of Gouda). Four worked examples on Psalm 116 follow: a Translational paraphrase, a Broader one (Titelmann), and two Interwoven ones (Snoy's, and Sixtus's own — the biblical words shown in bold, woven through the expansion). Running head: LIBER TERTIVS.)

[continuing from p177] …[in which indeed, as Themistius asserts in the preface of Aristotle's Posterior Analytics,] it is permitted to the Paraphrast — the integrity of the same sense being always preserved — to compress things prolix and poured out at length; freely to dilate and amplify things terse and concise; to supply things omitted; to fill up things gaping; to illustrate things involved and obscure with open and conspicuous words; and to adorn [them] with a becoming elegance of speech; and to connect those things which seem far separated among themselves and disposed in no order, and to arrange [them] in an ordered series.

Now there are two species of Paraphrase: [1] the one more compressed and stricter, which is nothing else than a certain freer translation — whether you call it a Paraphrastic translation, or a Translational Paraphrase, you will call it rightly. In this species there excelled, among the Hebrews, Onkelos, Jonathan, and Joseph, who published the Targum — that is, a Paraphrase upon the whole old testament in the Chaldaic tongue.

The other, which is somewhat fuller and broader, is distinguished by a twofold variety: of which the former, which follows the sense of the words rather than the words themselves, elucidates the meaning of the sacred reading under a certain copious brevity — in which matter, among the Greeks, Gregory bishop of Neocaesarea availed much, and among the Latins, Francis Titelmann. But the latter [variety], which contains more artifice, is so tenacious of the words that it does not suffer even a single word of the sacred context to be transposed, or changed, or omitted. This latter variety is called by us — and not ineptly — the Interwoven Paraphrase, [2] because it interweaves and connects the words of the sacred reading together with the very words of elucidation with such artifice that, unless both be distinguished by characters (whether by size or by form), these could not easily be discerned from those. An example of this skill — no less laborious than profitable — Rainer Snoy of Gouda furnished, in the Paraphrase of all the psalms published by him; which, together with the formulas of the other Paraphrases, I have thought worth inserting here.

An Example of Translational Paraphrase, on Psalm 116

Praise the Lord, all nations; extol him with praises, all peoples wheresoever you are. For most copiously has he used toward us his twofold mercy, and his constancy in the promises themselves is to endure perpetually.

An Example of the Broader Paraphrase, following the sense rather than the words (from Francis Titelmann, on the same Psalm) [Praise the Lord, all nations:] O all you nations of the Gentiles, who once were far from God, serving idols and demons and ignorant of the true God — now give praise and glory to God the Lord, in whom, taught by the apostolic preaching, you have believed.

[Praise him, all peoples:] Nor let the people of the Jews alone henceforth praise God; but, without distinction, all the nations of the peoples, wheresoever established on earth, equally praise together the Lord God.

[For his mercy is confirmed over us:] For now, in this time of grace, it has been fulfilled for all us believers, and by [His] work the mercy once promised to the fathers has been exhibited — that is, the redemption of the human race through Christ. And the mercy of the Lord (from which we were once far, when we were by nature children of wrath) is now corroborated and established over us who believe, so that it can never be taken away from us who believe in Him.

[And the truth of the Lord remains forever:] And the truth of His promises will not fail us for ever; but what He promised, He will keep for the believers with infallible truth. Which twofold consideration ought indeed to be matter of the greatest joy to all believers.

An Example of the Interwoven Paraphrase, from Rainer Snoy of Gouda, in which the words of the sacred context are distinguished from the words of elucidation by differently-formed letters

(the sacred text in bold, the elucidation in plain type)

Praise the Lord — God — all nations of the whole world; praise him — and magnify [the] benefits freely bestowed — all peoples of the Jews to be converted to the faith. For it is confirmed — by the effect of Christ's incarnation — over us the faithful — his mercy, and our reparation mercifully promised; for what he promised through the prophets, he fulfilled by the coming of Christ — and the truth of the Lord — which is Christ — remains with us unto eternity, even to the consummation of the age.

Another Example of the Interwoven Paraphrase, from our own commentaries on various psalms, in which the [sacred] context is distinguished from the exposition by capital letters

Praise the one and true God, creator of heaven and earth, and Lord of the whole world, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ — all you nations diffused through the whole world of lands, who live piously and holily according to the laws of nature; but especially, and before all nations, praise, celebrate, and with innumerable praises, hymns, Psalms, and canticles extol him — not with voice and tongue alone, but with the affections of the mind and works conformable to the voice; proclaim him, all you twelve tribes of Israel, and peoples of the renowned Jews, whom the Lord chose for himself as a peculiar possession out of all the nations of the earth by a certain singular privilege. And the Lord is to be praised by you — both Gentiles and Jews — chiefly for this cause: for, bestowed and most fully completed, is confirmed (and in these latest times bountifully and splendidly poured out) over us — not only Jews, but also Gentiles — his mercy, the kindness and grace of human reparation exhibited to us in Christ Jesus, his only-begotten Son; and again and again is God to be celebrated by us with perpetual praise, because the truth of the promises which God once made through the prophets, in the holy scriptures, concerning the sending of His Son — and the fidelity of God the Father and of our Lord, and the firmness of His words, and the constancy of His promises — has not fallen away or utterly vanished, but has remained fixed, and still unmoved remains, and is so stable unto eternity, and shall abide for ever and ever, that no force can ever break, weaken, or change it. [continues p179]

[1] There are two species of paraphrase. [2] Why the "interwoven" paraphrase is so called.

[continuing from p178]

On the Lexical Method — The Ninth Method

The Lexical (that is, Vocabulary, or Dictionary) exposition, which declares the grammatical signification of words, has two varieties [1] — namely the Universal and the Particular — distinguished among themselves not otherwise than as whole and parts. Of these, the former first tears apart all the words and terms (Greek, Hebrew, Chaldaic, and Latin) comprehended in the whole compass of divine scripture; then, once torn apart and distinguished, it reduces them into lexicons and dictionaries according to alphabetical order. In which kind of labor Philo the Jew and Origen among the Greeks, and Jerome and Sanctes [Pagninus] among the Latins, happily toiled. But the latter variety, of which we now especially speak, can in a manner be called a little part of the former. This [variety] certain expositors, most studious of order and perspicuity, are wont to use: who, in expounding the particular chapters, sections, and periods of the volumes, in the first place set forth the grammatical elucidation of the words, then, in the second place, subjoin the exposition of the senses, separated from the former. Which, among the Latins, Claudius Guilliaud excellently performed in his commentaries on the epistles of Paul, and Hector Pintus in his explanations of Isaiah. An example of this latter part will be this:

An Example of Lexical Exposition, on Psalm 116

HALLELUJAH (הללויה): this word, among the Hebrews, is composed of two words — namely, the verb הללו hallelu, and the noun יה ia [Yah] — of which the former signifies "Praise," the latter "God." For Ia [Yah] is one of the names of God, which — as R. David Kimchi asserts — is called Ia because he is the creator of the world, and the cause of being to the world itself; for Ia comes from the verb היה haiah, which signifies "Was."

NATIONS (Gentes): in Hebrew are called גוים goim; by which name the Jews are wont commonly to call all the nations which are not of the race of the Jews.

IS CONFIRMED (Confirmata est): in Hebrew is said גבר gavar; which word the Chaldaic interpreter and the Greek translated more significantly — for the former rendered אגבר Agebar, but the latter ἐκραταιώθη — of which both signify "is strengthened, is made valid and strong."

TRUTH (Veritas): in Hebrew, אמת emeth; in this place it signifies not only the adequation of the thing to the intellect, but chiefly denotes the fidelity, constancy, and firmness of [God's] sayings and promises.

HIS MERCY (Misericordia eius): in Hebrew, חסדו chasdo; the Chaldaic translated it טוביה tuvia, that is, "Goodness," or "kindness."

REMAINS (Manet): in Greek, μένει; this word is not had in the Hebrew, but only in the Greek and Latin edition; yet it is understood.

On Annotation — The Tenth Method

Annotations — which the Greeks call Σημειώσεις [semeioseis], σχόλια [scholia], and Γλώσσας [glossas]; we may call them Annotamenta, Vacationes, Excerpta, or Lingulae [little tongues] [2] — are those by which, whenever there is no leisure for composing complete commentaries, we illustrate the holy letters here and there, scattered, with brief little interpretations — as with little stars, little tongues, and certain points — annotating only those things which seem either more obscure or more notable. In this labor, most famous among the Greeks was Apollinarius; among the Latins, Hugh of St. Victor, and Anselm of Laon, the author of the Gloss which is called the Interlinear. [3]

Now among the glossators there are two varieties of Glosses, [4] which differ among themselves by no other reason than the site and position of the writing. Of these, the one, which is placed around the margins of the sacred context, they call extrinsic, or marginal; the other, intrinsic, or interlinear — because it is fitted within the enclosure of the lines, written in smaller letters. Of both, these are examples: in which the little alphabetic marks, interposed among the words, show the places of the annotations corresponding to the places of the sacred context.

Marginal Annotations

- ■ Although this psalm is now, in the codices of the Hebrews, ἀνεπίγραφος [anepigraphos] — that is, destitute of a title — yet in the Greek copies, and in the Latin edition of Jerome, the title Alleluia is prefixed; from which title it is gathered that the psalm is ἐπαινετικὸν [epainetikon, laudatory], and contains praises and thanksgivings. [5]
- ■ With the heart, with the mouth, with work.
- ■ He puts the Gentiles before the Jews, because few of the Jews believed, [but] many of the Gentiles. [6]
- ■ By "peoples" he understands the Jews; or, under other words, he repeats the same sentence — redoubling the word of praise, and intending [it] more and more.
- ■ [It is] the grace of human redemption.
- ■ The truth, I say, of the Gospel given through Christ; for the law contained not the truth, but the shadow of the truth: for grace, says John, and truth came through Christ. [continues p180]

On Commentary — The Eleventh Method

Commentary — which in Greek is called ἀπομνημάτικη [apomnematike] [1] — is a brief exposition of divine scripture, somewhat more copious than Annotation or the scholastic Method; in which we gather together whatever things occur to us day by day, both from the daily reading of authors and from our own invention, and come into the mind; and we write down both our own opinions and those of other expositors, without much care and order, almost extemporaneously — preparing, as it were, material either for ourselves or for others toward constructing far greater and far ampler volumes of explanations. Ammonius Hermeas said that Hyponemata (that is, Commentaries) are "preparations for συντάγματα [syntagmata]" [2] — that is, coordinated writings, which over much time and with much skill are reduced into order. Now it has passed into custom that under the common name of "commentaries" almost all the kinds of explanation are understood. D. Jerome professed this order of commenting above the rest, in his exposition of the sixteen Prophets, and especially in the four books of Commentaries on Matthew — which he completed within the space of fifteen days with the swiftest haste. This Method needs no adducing of an example. Over against it certain men set another Method of expounding, which by a proper and peculiar appellation they call explanation [3] — entirely contrary to the brevity of Commentary; for "explanation," according to their own definition, is a most broad and most copious explication, long and much meditated.

On the Sciographic (Shadow-Drawing) Exposition — The Twelfth Method

The Sciographic — that is, the Shadow-drawing and Pictorial exposition [4] — is that which, by various delineations of figures and images, sets before the eyes more clearly and more openly those things which could not be very openly expressed in words; devised by the sacred expositors not so much for the sake of ornament and beauty as by reason of necessity. For, as in the Mathematical disciplines there are held almost innumerable things which, without the drawing-out of lines and figures, can neither be taught nor learned, so there are very many things in the sacred letters [5] which cannot be conceived by thought unless the images of the things themselves, expressed by shadows or by pictures, are beheld by the gaze of the eyes: such as are the form and figure of the Ark built by Noah; the structure of the Mosaic tabernacle; the disposition of Solomon's temple; the composition of the temple and city described by Ezekiel, and the fitting-together of its wheels; the Geographic description of the Holy Land, or of all Palestine; the ornament of the priestly vestments — which, without the aid of pictures and the addition of certain brief annotations beneath the pictures themselves, can scarcely and with difficulty be understood. But on the contrary, when pictures are employed, we attain much more by a single intuition than by long and numerous reading of commentaries; for what is gathered by the eyes is apprehended far more distinctly by the mind, and retained more tenaciously in the memory, than what is perceived by the ears alone. [6] Whence God himself, when he had put forth the prophecy which the prophet Ezekiel had uttered concerning the future siege of the Holy City, wishing it to be more openly explained and more deeply engraved in the minds of the Jews, commands the Prophet that, upon a brick-tile or abacus, he should delineate by Geometric art the σκιογραφίαν [skiographian], or shadowy picture, of the several parts of the prophecy — the form of the besieged city being sketched, together with valleys, ramparts, battering-rams, engines, and hostile camps, and the other things necessary for the siege and assault of cities — so that from the aspect of that picture the Jewish people might more surely and exactly recognize, as it were part by part, the harms foretold to it. [7]

They have given us, in this kind of exposition, most praiseworthy Works: Eusebius, chiefly the bishop of Caesarea, who first depicted the topography of the whole Holy Land, a brief declaration of the same picture being added; [8] Jerome, who expressed the habit and shape of the entire Pontifical vestment with an elegant delineation; [9] Richard Victorinus [Richard of St. Victor], who designed the architecture of Ezekiel's temple in tables by Geometric methods; [10] Cassiodorus Senator, whose picture of the old tabernacle is most celebrated; Bede the Presbyter, who wrought out the schemata of the Mosaic Tabernacle and of the temple of Solomon's work with the greatest art and fidelity; [11] Al■ [→ p181]

[5] In the Scriptures there are many things which cannot be conceived by thought, unless their images, expressed by shadows or pictures, are beheld by the gaze of the eyes. [6] More distinctly is it apprehended by the mind, and more tenaciously retained in memory, what is beheld by the eyes than what is perceived by the ears alone. [7] Ezekiel 4. [8] Eusebius of Caesarea first depicted the topography of the Holy Land. [9] Jerome depicted the habit of the pontifical vestment. [10] Richard Victorinus designed the structure of Ezekiel's temple in tables. [11] Bede handed down the schemata of the Mosaic tabernacle and of Solomon's temple.

Then opens Method Thirteen: On the Tabular (Columnar) Exposition — a two-column table (Scripture word / exposition), demonstrated by beginning the Exposition of Psalm 116. Running head: LIBER TERTIVS.)*

[continuing from p181 — the declaration of the vestment, by letters]

P. בכתנת Kethoneth — that is, the linen Tunic, or the inner Linen shift; in Greek ποδήρης [pod■r■s], that is, ankle-length. This clings to the body, and is so tight, with narrow sleeves, that there is scarcely any wrinkle in it, especially from the upper part; and it descends down to the legs and ankles.

R. מעיל Meil — a hyacinth-colored ankle-length tunic of the same color, with narrow sleeves; in the upper part, where it is drawn on around the neck, open as far as the middle of the breast; at its extreme and lowest hem — that is, at the feet — having a border distinguished, by wondrous art, with purple, scarlet, and golden flowers as well as gems; from which hang seventy-two golden bells and as many golden pomegranates, so arranged that between each pair of bells there is one pomegranate, and between two pomegranates one bell — so that, when the Pontiff enters into the Holy of Holies, he may go forth wholly vocal, sonorous, and most to be revered by the people.

C. אפד Ephod — which the Septuagint interpreter [renders] ἐπωμίδα [ep■mida], Aquila ἐπίγραμμα [epigramma]; we may call it the Superhumerale (shoulder-piece), because it is laid over both shoulders. It is an elegant little sleeveless cloak, woven of hyacinth, scarlet, purple, and gold, after the manner of a monastic scapular without a cowl; it has two shoulder-pieces — that is, it consists of two equal parts, of which one covers the back, the other the breast down to the navel; in which, around the middle of the breast, a certain empty hollow (lacuna) is left for the reception of the Rational.

E. שהם Shoham — which the Septuagint translated "emeralds" (Smaragdos), Josephus "sardonyxes." They are two gems enclosed in gold, of such magnitude that on each of them the names of six Patriarchs are contained, engraved; which, in place of clasps, join the shoulder-pieces on both sides around the neck.

T. אבנט Abnet, in Chaldaic המיינא Hemyana — is a girdle, or a broad belt (Zone) four fingers wide, empty within, so woven that it might seem the slough of a serpent putting off its old age, or the intestine of some oblong animal; consisting of a byssine (linen) thread, interwoven with flowers and gems of scarlet, purple, hyacinth, and gold; which, once and again around the breast, binds the ephod and the tunics, and flows down to the ankles. Wherefore Vatablus and Castalio err, [1] who in their scholiastic annotations painted this Zone in the likeness of a short and broad strap descending from the breast down to the navel, according to the measure of the Ephod; for the aforesaid description of Philo refutes them.

D. חשן Choshen, in Greek λόγιον [logion] — we may name it the Rationale (breastplate). It is a cloth of a palm's breadth square, variegated with gold and the same colors as the Ephod, so that it fills up exactly the square hollow left before the breast; to which are inwoven and bound with gold twelve gems of diverse kinds, incomparable in magnitude, beauty, and price, distinguished into four rows, so that in each little row three stones are placed, and on each stone one of the names of the tribes is engraved.

M. טבעות זהב Tabbaoth Zahav — are four golden rings, one at each of the four corners of the Rational, having opposite to themselves — on the edge of the hinder shoulder-piece, under the armpits — four other rings, by which the Ephod is fastened with intervening hyacinthine ribbons.

G. שרשרת זהב Sharsheroth Zahav — are golden chains, which, fastened by golden rings to the two upper corners of the Ephod that look toward the neck, were coupled in the upper part with the settings of the sardonyxes, lest the magnitude and weight of the stones should break the hyacinthine ribbons.

Q. מצנפת Mitznepheth — which the Greeks [call] τιάραν [tiaran]; some call it a Cap (Galerum), others an Infula, having the figure of a linen half-sphere little cap, and having no peak at the top, common to all the priests. Upon it is set another, somewhat higher, hyacinthine little cap, which the author of the book of Ecclesiasticus, and Solomon in the book of Wisdom, call a Mitre and a Diadem. [2] A golden crown surrounds this with a triple row; in the hinder part of which little golden cups, very like the flowers of henbane, are seen; but in the front part, which overhangs the forehead, the holy Name of God — which by the Jews is reckoned ineffable — is incised with four Hebrew letters, namely י Iod, ה He, ו Vau, ה He.

On the Tabular (Columnar) Exposition — The Thirteenth Method

The Tabular — that is, the Columnar Method [3] — is a most orderly fitting-together of a compendious, lucid, and most rich exposition, by tables and columns; which sets before the eyes most clearly and most distinctly the sense of the Sacred reading, and, as it were in a mirror, demonstrates the elucidation of the individual words in a most beautiful order and a most fitting series of numbers, and greatly conduces to the ease of apprehension and the stability of memory. For this is implanted in us by nature: that the more distinctly and orderly things are set before the eyes, the more easily, lucidly, and distinctly the intellective faculty apprehends them, and the more tenaciously and longer the memory preserves them. Now the artifice of this kind of fitting-together is arranged [4] chiefly in two tablets, or columns, so digested on the same page that the first tablet, or column, contains the individual words of the Sacred reading — expressed in larger letters, collocated one under another from the head to the heel of the same column in most fitting order, and marked with their numbers; but the second column comprehends the words of the exposition, described in smaller characters, corresponding over against (è regione) the individual words of the Holy reading, so that in each line of Scripture one of the words of the Sacred context, and the exposition of that same word, are discerned at one and the same view — as appears in the subjoined example.

2. THE LORD (cont.) — God, and especially the Father, the creator of all things visible and invisible: celebrate [him]. 3. ALL — as many of you as inhabit the whole globe of the earth, from East to West and from North to South. 4. NATIONS — you who, without circumcision, live piously and holily under the law of nature. 5. PRAISE — extol [him] with psalms, with hymns, and with all the applause of words and of affections. 6. HIM — whose glory all creatures perpetually declare. 7. ALL — twelve tribes of Israel: you, I say, above the other nations, praise him together. 8. PEOPLES — renowned [peoples] of the Hebrews, whom God by a singular privilege chose for himself, out of all the nations of the earth, as a peculiar possession. 9. FOR — for this cause chiefly is God to be praised most highly by us, both Jews and Gentiles: because — 10. IS CONFIRMED — that is, granted, and most fully completed, and in the last times poured out in abundance. 11. OVER US — not only the Jews, but also the Gentiles; not only the just, but also sinners. 12. HIS MERCY — the kindness and grace of human restoration, shown to us in the incarnation of Christ. 13. AND THE TRUTH — of the promises which he had made through the prophets concerning the sending of his Son: that [truth], I say. 14. OF THE LORD — the fidelity of God the Father, etc.

On Narration — The Fourteenth Method

Narration [1] is an exposition of divine scripture delivered publicly to the people; which is distinguished into the Homily and the Declamation. The Homily [2] — which some call a Tractate, others a familiar colloquy — is a familiar and homely elucidation of divine scripture to the common people, whose aim [3] is to explain the senses of the scriptures, not only that it may introduce the hearers to a thorough knowledge of the mysteries of sacred doctrine, but that it may exhort them to the observance and the execution of the things they have heard. For you understand in vain, unless you carry out in deed what you have grasped. [4] Now the homilists — that is, those who use such familiar colloquies with the people — are wont almost always to distribute their Homilies into three parts, [5] namely the Preparatory, the Didactic, and the Adhortatory. In the First, with brief but varied and pleasant introductions they pave the way for the hearers, while they briefly set before them the sum of the reading to be expounded, and show both its excellence, its delight, and its usefulness. In the second part they lucidly explain the words of the divine reading, whether according to the history, or according to the spiritual understanding, or according to both, as the matter requires. Then in the Third — which is always concluded in certain brief little prayers or doxologies — they descend to morals and to the ordering of life, exhort to virtue; and, as far as the law of familiar colloquy allows, piously admonish, moderately reprove, lightly rebuke, sweetly stir up the affections, call minds away from base and sordid cares, kindle them to the pursuit of the honorable, and inflame them to living well and blessedly.

The Declamation, or Sermon, [6] observes the same, and in nearly the same order, as the Homily — except that it uses a somewhat grander style, and, the course of the exposition being often interrupted, more frequently digresses to morals; more keenly rises up against the crimes of men; and, with greater vehemence of spirit and of words, and with a more stirring voice, reproves the wickedness of the multitude — more freely uncovering the peculiar vices of each order, state, and sex, more severely rebuking, more harshly chiding, and more gravely detesting them, yet always with the modesty of evangelical and true piety preserved. Supreme in both parts of this Method was John Chrysostom, [7] to whom the Greek Church never had a superior, nor the Latin an equal, nor perhaps will have hereafter.

An Example of a Homily on Psalm 116, gathered from St. John Chrysostom

First Part: Preparatory

Sweet indeed is a meadow, and a garden; yet far more sweetly than either breathes the divine reading of the Psalms. There, one may find flowers, but such as wither in time; here, on the other hand, there occur sentences that endure in their native vigor. There the west wind (Favonius) breathes; here the breeze of the Holy Spirit blows. There thorns hedge the garden in place of a wall; here the providence of God renders the reader safe. There the cicadas are clamorous with their shrilling; here [are] songs resounding with sweet jubilation. There, from the very sight, a certain delight is conceived; here, from the very hearing, very much of usefulness is plucked. For the meditation of the Psalms brings much pleasure and consolation; it draws the mind away from earth, exalts the thought, raises the spirit, and carries it aloft. A garden is circumscribed within some one place; but the melody of hymns is carried about in every inhabitable place of the earth. A garden, moreover, serves men's needs according to the quality of the seasons; but the reading of the Psalms flourishes alike in winter and in summer time, leafy on every side, and laden (dropping its grains) with the weight of its fruits. Be attentive, therefore, to the words of this Psalm, which we have undertaken to expound — the shortest of them all — for the sake of those who cannot hold long Psalms in memory.

Second Part: Didactic

PRAISE THE LORD, ALL NATIONS: it is a short Psalm, but one having great meaning; for it contains a Prophecy of the Church of believers, and a prediction of the evangelical preaching, which was to occupy the whole globe of the earth. For the Psalm calls together to the praise of God not merely two or three nations only, but ALL NATIONS and peoples. By "all nations and peoples" we understand here not only the Jews, but all the nations, as many as anywhere exist, in the whole world; of whom Hosea said: I will call not-my-people, my people; and her that was not beloved, beloved: and [one] shall rise up to rule the nations: and the nations shall hope in him [8] — which indeed came to pass, when the coming of Christ shone forth. Then he shows how much the nations [→ p184]

(Rich PDF p. 184 — printed folio 167. Continues the worked Chrysostom Homily on Psalm 116. End of the Didactic part: "his mercy is confirmed over us" = we are saved by God's mercy alone; "and the truth of the Lord remains" = Christ is that Truth (John 1:17; 14:6). Then the whole Third Part (Adhortatory): praising God is no light thing but the greatest sacrifice (Ps 50:23; 69:31); praise with deeds as well as words (Matt 5:16); the seraphim's praise and Isaiah's "Woe is me" (Isa 6:5); praise God with the angels (Ps 148); a wicked life makes God blasphemed among the nations (Rom 2:24 / Isa 52:5); guard tongue, lips, ears (Eph 4:29,31; Matt 5:33; Ps 50:20). Ends at the catchword "DOXO[logia]." Running head: LIBER TERTIVS.)

[continuing the Homily on Psalm 116, from p183 — Second Part, Didactic]

…the nations have occasion for praising [God], saying: FOR HIS MERCY IS CONFIRMED OVER US — that is, because not by our own deeds, nor by our life, nor by our own confidence, but by the mercy and clemency of God alone, are we saved. And this mercy, he says, is "confirmed" — that is, it has been made firm, strengthened, has grown together, and been made firm and solid, and harder than a rock. For it daily receives increase, daily spends itself, and never fails: so that it may daily rejoice in its gains, because there is greater joy in heaven over one sinner converted from the vanity of his way than over ninety just who have no need of penance. There follows: AND THE TRUTH OF THE LORD REMAINS FOR EVER. What is this truth that remains for ever? The Truth is Christ — so called because in his coming that truth shone forth most greatly which in the old testament had lain hidden under types and figures. Signifying this very thing, the Evangelist also said: The Law was given through Moses; grace and truth came through Christ. [1] This same truth is also that which holds a right, true, and whole faith, and which cleaves to Christ, who says, I am the way, the truth, and the life [2] — he is the truth that remains for ever, and leads us on to the Ancient of Days, to our eternal God, who abides without end. To his perpetual praise, therefore, the Psalm here calls us together.

Third Part: Adhortatory

Moreover, this praise which God requires of us is no light thing, but a mighty and most excellent ministry, the greatest sacrifice, and by far the offering most acceptable to God of all. For "the sacrifice of praise," he says, "shall glorify me"; and again, "I will praise the name of God, and I will magnify him with praise: and it shall please God above a young calf that puts forth horns and hoofs." [3] Nothing does God require of us so much as praises and thanksgivings; for this cause he breathed a soul into us, made us rational, and severed us from the brutes by speech — that we might praise, celebrate, and continually glorify him. Not that he himself has need of our praising, but that he may teach us to be grateful, and to acknowledge the Bestower of so many good things; and that whatever gain comes from this celebration may return to ourselves, and make us ever worthy of greater helps. Now it is not, as some wrongly suppose, a matter of small moment and slight labor to praise God. Rather, if we would offer anything to God, we have nothing greater than praise, nothing more difficult than praise. "And what difficulty," you will say, "has praise? To whom, even of humble and abject condition, is it not easy to render this, and to praise God?" If you learn the matter diligently and exactly, O beloved, you will see both the labor that is in it, and the gain — which is very great — that is gathered from it. First, indeed, this praise is required of the just; and one must first rightly order one's life, and so sing hymns to God: for "praise is not comely in the mouth of a sinner." [4] Secondly, one must praise not with words only, but also with deeds: and this praise God chiefly requires, this glory. "Let your light so shine before men," he says, "that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father who is in heaven." [5] So the Cherubim and Seraphim praise God; wherefore Isaiah too, when he had heard that mystical melody of the angels, afflicts himself and accounts himself wretched, saying: "Woe is me, for I am a man having unclean lips, and I dwell in the midst of a people having unclean lips." [6] And therefore, when the Prophet enjoins that praises be offered, he begins from the higher Powers, saying thus: "Praise the Lord from the heavens, praise him all his angels." [7] One must therefore become an angel, and so praise God, that his glory may be made illustrious by the right ordering of our life. For just as, when we live wickedly, God is visited with insults and reproaches — God saying: "You have made me to be despised among the nations of the earth: and because of you my name is blasphemed among the Gentiles" [8] — so, when we take care for virtue, the name of God is glorified because of us by others also. And this is God's most glorious magnifying: when through countless tongues we offer him glorification, praising God not only with our own tongues, but also stirring up our neighbors to magnify God in our name. And this indeed comes to pass when, even in silence and saying nothing, we so live that men are astonished at our good works, and, bursting forth into divine praises, say: "Glory to you, O God — what manner of men are your servants! what philosophy they display! how they despise present things! how all things are reckoned by them a shadow and a dream, and they are fixed on nothing visible, but pass all things by, like men who dwell in a foreign land, as pilgrims, and daily long and pant to migrate out of this life!" How much, do you think, is God celebrated and magnified by these words? And — what is very admirable and rare — even those who so judge of us shortly desist from their error, and, provoked by our example, return to the best life. [9] For just as, when a light has appeared, it dispels the darkness, so also virtue, if it be conspicuous in us, puts wickedness to flight and drives off the darkness of error, and stirs up the minds of the beholders to glorify God, no less by words than by deeds. Let us therefore not think this praise of God a light matter, but let us strive that, before our very face, our life may praise him. Let us so order our life that we give no one occasion for blasphemy, but rather make all break forth into the praises of God; let us decline from evil, be zealous for virtue; let each one of you flee vice in continence, and work the virtue of sobriety. Whoever is hasty and of a rash tongue, and blurts out whatever comes to hand, let him set a guard upon his mouth, and never utter words without profit, but let him hear Paul saying: "Let all clamor, and wrath, and blasphemy, and obscenity and scurrility be taken away from you, with all malice" [10]; and again, "[Let] any good word [go forth] that is useful for edification, that it may give grace to the hearers." [11] Let him also flee vain oaths in every way, hearing the saying of Christ: "It was said to them of old, You shall not forswear yourself; but I say to you, Swear not at all." [12] And with all these let us fortify our tongue, our lips, and our mind, that nothing of evil thoughts may either be born within, or be uttered abroad through the tongue. Let us also carefully hedge our ears, that they hear not vain fables: as also blessed Moses enjoins, saying, "You shall not receive a vain report." [13] Let us not speak against our neighbor, lest David accuse us, saying: "Sitting, you spoke against your brother, and against the son of your mother you laid a stumbling-block." [14] If, then, we so exercise our ears, our tongue, our mind, and our works, and make our works consonant with our words, not only shall we be worthy praisers of God, but in our name also "all nations shall praise the Lord, and all peoples shall praise him together."

Let us pray, that these things may be granted us by the grace and mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ: to whom, together with the Father and the Holy Spirit, be glory, dominion, and honor, now and always, and unto the ages of ages. Amen.

On Collation (Conference) — The Fifteenth Method

Collation, or the Collative exposition, [1] is that which expounds the divine oracles by familiar and mutual colloquies and dialogues; of which there are two species [2] — namely the Continuous and the Interrupted. Now the Continuous [3] is that in which, the course of the discourse being unbroken, one person speaks throughout, reporting a conversation held by himself or by another with others, and at the same time connecting, by the words "I say" and "he says," the questions and answers of those conversing — as among the Greeks Cebes the Theban did in the dialogue whose title is πίναξ [pinax], that is, the Tablet, explaining the sense of a mystical picture; and among the Latins Severinus Boethius, in the two dialogues he published on the exposition of Porphyry. But the Interrupted [4] is that in which — lest "I say" and "he says" be too often and tediously repeated — the progress of the narration is interrupted, and, after the manner of Plato and Cicero, various persons are brought in conversing among themselves and examining the senses of the sacred volumes by mutual questionings, so that the discourse seems to be held face to face as if by persons present. The former species of Collation was embraced, among the Greeks, by John Cassian, [5] discoursing on many places of the divine letters in his Conferences; and by Zacharias, bishop of Hierapolis, in his dialogue upon the golden statue of Daniel, [6] which is entitled ΧΡΥΣΕΙΚΩΝ [Chryseikon, "the Golden Image"]; and among the Latins by Jacobus Sadoletus, bishop of Carpentras, in his commentaries on the epistle to the Romans. The latter species was followed, among the Greeks, by Apollinaris the Younger, bishop of Laodicea, reducing the evangelical and apostolic writings to the form of a dialogue; and among the Latins by Salonius, bishop of Vienne, and by John Gerson — of whom the former expounded the Proverbs and Ecclesiastes of Solomon, the latter the Song of Songs of Solomon, in dialogue. Examples of both species are these:

An Example of Continuous Collation, on Psalm 116

When yesterday, expounding the hundred-and-sixteenth Psalm in a sermon, I had said that this same Psalm is the beginning, end, sum, and compendium of all Psalms and Hymns, our Aurelius, who was then present, came to me when the discourse was finished; and when he had fallen into talk about the things I had spoken, he said that he wondered how this Psalm — by far the shortest of all — could comprehend all Hymns and Psalms; and he asked that this be explained to him by us. Then I: "There is nothing, best son, why you should wonder, if you consider that the whole kind of Psalms and Hymns was invented for the singing of the praises of the divine works, but especially for celebrating those twin virtues of the most high God, Mercy and Truth — the fullness of which comprehends all the deeds and wondrous works of God, David saying: All the ways of the Lord are Mercy and Truth." [7] And thereupon Aurelius: "I confess," he said, "that not only is this the aim of all hymns, but that all the divine works are contained in these two virtues. But what you would gather from this, set forth." I then [said]: "Do you not see how these two most excellent works of God, Mercy and Truth, are set forth in the present Psalm most abundantly — in brief words indeed, yet plainly eloquent and fruitful?" "I see," said he, "and I have both sufficiently in view." Then I, as though drawing a conclusion from what he had granted, said: "Since, therefore, this Psalm declares the praises of the divine mercy and truth, by which all the divine works, everywhere sung in all songs and hymns, are comprehended — it follows that, as many as there are in the whole compass of Psalms and odes, it embraces the praises and encomia of the divine works, as though compressed into a sum and compendium," etc. [8]

An Example of Interrupted Collation, on the hundred-and-sixteenth Psalm

AURELIUS: Tell me, venerable Augustine — is it true, what I lately heard when you were preaching, that the hundred-and-sixteenth Psalm is the beginning, end, and compendium of all Psalms and hymns? AUGUSTINE: It is true, my Aurelius. AUR.: I wonder how it can be that a Psalm, by far the shortest of all, should comprehend so many and almost innumerable hymns, Psalms, and odes. AUG.: Yet so it truly is. For just as all lines run together into the very center of a circle, so into this one Psalm all the rest flow together as into the end and beginning of all Psalms. AUR.: I could wish this to be explained more openly. AUG.: Do you grant that every kind of Psalm and hymn contains the praises of God, and was framed chiefly for celebrating the divine works? [9] AUR.: I grant it. AUG.: Do you confess that the sum of all the divine deeds is referred to those two most splendid works — Mercy, I say, and Truth? [10] AUR.: I confess it; and often too I have that saying of David upon my lips: All the ways of the Lord are mercy and truth. AUG.: But do you not see how this Psalm proclaims these two admirable works of God, in brief but most fruitful words? AUR.: I see indeed, and acknowledge it well enough. AUG.: Therefore, since the aim and argument of this Psalm is to celebrate those two things, within which the arguments of all the Psalms are compressed, it is agreeable [to reason] that all the Psalms are concluded in this one Psalm, etc.

On Meditation — The Sixteenth Method

Meditation [11] — or Contemplation, or the affective exposition — is a narration bursting forth, from the inmost and fervent affections of a glowing spirit, into living and ardent words; which certain devout expositors are especially wont to use, who direct all their efforts to this one end: that they may rouse and provoke themselves to the love of the things they read and explain; that they may in a manner transform into themselves what they handle, and, by the living experience of affections and works, may feel what they set forth in words — always with [→ p186]

…always dwelling with God in pious thoughts, sweet meditations, ardent desires, and fiery colloquies; ever aspiring, sighing, and panting after those things which, in explaining the divine scriptures, by the enlightening of the Spirit they have learned, and now within themselves, by the enkindling of the same Spirit, have begun to experience. This Exposition many, briefly defining it, call a soliloquy of the soul speaking with God about the divine scriptures; or thus: Meditation is the most secret speech of the expositor with God, and the most ardent contemplation of the divine darkness. Now this divine kind of explanation — scarcely known to very few — is accomplished chiefly by three exercises, [1] that is, by Ascent into God, Descent into oneself, and Return into God. For example, if that saying of Paul to the Colossians is to be explained — In Christ are all the treasures of the wisdom of God [2] — etc.:

First, the expositor will lift up his mind into God, and will piously contemplate how great and how admirable is the wisdom of God; and, with all the splendor of speech he can, he will display the treasure of the divine wisdom, which by a single and unceasing gaze always beholds and surveys all things — not only the greatest and noblest, but each least and meanest thing; to whom all the stars of heaven and all the sands of the sea are numbered; to whom every mind and every will speaks; to whom lies open every thought however hidden; and whom no secret escapes, reaching even to the inmost and impenetrable and unsearchable recesses of the human heart.

When the expounder has long and much revolved these things in wondering mind, in the second place let him turn his pen upon himself, and, descending into himself, let him meditate how that God, who beholds all things, directs his eyes even upon him, and considers all his thoughts and desires, his words too, and all his deeds, and continually observes them. After he has weighed these with himself in utmost reverence, he will apply all that he had already conceived of God to his own person, in this manner: O how great a necessity of doing well lies upon me, who do all things in the eyes of God who beholds all! O that I, a sinner, might find grace and good-will in the eyes of Christ Jesus, whose knowledge knows me and whose wisdom perpetually beholds me! O that I may please him! O that I may ever do the things that offend not his sight!

Thirdly, returning into God, whence he had descended, he will frame his explanation, in the manner of a prayer, thus supplicating: O Savior of men, Christ Jesus, in whom are all the treasures of the wisdom and knowledge of God — you who deign to look with the eyes of your supreme wisdom upon me, a most vile little worm, from whom none of my thoughts are hidden, with whom the groaning of my heart and the desire of my wretched will is not concealed — grant me, your servant, that I may do nothing unworthy of the sight of your majesty.

Most renowned in this form of expounding were Bernard the Abbot, Peter of Ailly, cardinal of Cambrai, Jerome Savonarola, and Franciscus Titelmannus.

An Example of Meditation, on Psalm 116

That highest Good, than which nothing greater can be conceived, is — as the most wise son of Sirach says — greater than all praise; [3] for its essence is incomprehensible, its majesty inaccessible, and its name utterly ineffable — which no creature can conceive in mind, much less express in words. Yet God himself commands, and bids, and wills to be praised by the mouth of men: and now especially, in the present Psalm, through the mouth of David he calls together all the peoples of the Hebrews and all the nations of the Gentiles to his own praises. What then shall I do? With what words, with what tongue shall I — a mute little worm — praise the unpraisable God? Though all the members of my body should be turned into tongues, and all my limbs should resound with a human, nay even an angelic, voice, I could say nothing worthy of his divine loftiness: before whose sight all praise falls silent, and every encomium ends in silence. Shall I then be silent? and despise the voice of God, crying to me through the mouth of David, and provoking me to praise my Creator? Far be it. I know what I shall do. I will fall down at the feet of him whom the Cherubim, the Seraphim, and all the hosts of angels ceaselessly praise together with heavenly hymns; and from my inmost heart I will say to him: O most clement Almighty God, whose incomprehensible majesty cannot be praised — grant that at least I may offer you some praises for your works, which can be celebrated; but especially for the mercy which you have shown to me, a wretch, and for the truth of your promises, which you have fulfilled in me. Do not leave me an orphan, but confirm your mercy over me: that your truth — Christ, my life — may remain with me for ever, and unto age of age. Amen.

On the Poetic Exposition — The Seventeenth Method

Of the Poetic explanation — which expounds the divine volumes in various kinds of verse — there are two kinds. [4] The one, consisting of verse only, is called the Verse (Carmineum) kind; which, in expounding the sacred volumes, was used among the Greeks by Apollinaris the Elder and Gregory Nazianzen, and among the Latins by Juvencus the presbyter and Arator the deacon. The other kind is, after the imitation of the works of Boethius On the Consolation of Philosophy and of Martianus Capella On the Marriage of Philology and Mercury, intermingled with variety of prose and verse, and for that reason called by most the Prose-and-Verse (Prosocarmineum) kind; [5] in which kind there prevailed most, among the Greeks, Eulalius bishop of Cynopolis, and among the Latins Williram, abbot of Marburg — each of whom elucidated the Song of Songs of Solomon with a graceful intermingling of prose and verse.

On the Epistle — The Eighteenth Method

The Epistolary Method [1] was used by those who expounded the divine scriptures by letters and epistles, sent especially to friends who consulted them. Of their number, among the Greeks, was Isidore of Pelusium, who, in explaining the sacred volumes, wrote up to ten thousand letters; among the Latins, Jerome, and sometimes Augustine and Ambrose, of whom very many epistles of the holy oracles survive. To append an example of this Method I judge to be superfluous.

On Inquiry (Investigation) — The Nineteenth Method

Inquiry [2] is that which expounds the divine scriptures by the investigation and untying of difficulties; of which there are three species: [3] the Problem, the Question, and the Disputation.

The Problem [4] — which is also called a "problematic Question" — is that in which the reply to a proposed interrogation about the holy letters is given rather by inquiring ambiguously than by determining anything certain; or whose answer settles nothing by firm assertion, but still leaves what had been proposed to be inquired into more diligently: as happens in almost all the questions which Augustine, in the twelve books On Genesis to the Letter, rather (as he himself confesses) sought than found. [5]

The Question — which some call an "Inquiry" (Percontatio), others a "Simple question," others a "little question" (Quæstiuncula) — is that in which the reply to the proposed interrogations is given with a certain and firm assertion, and a simple brevity: as is done in the two books of the Evangelical Questions of St. Augustine. [6]

The Disputation [7] — which by some is called a Debate (Disceptatio), a Contest (Decertatio), and a Composite Question — is that which, upon some part of the sacred volumes, with contraries brought in on both sides (the reasonings and argumentations both of heretics and of catholics), disputes most amply and most learnedly: whether to defend, in an apologetic manner, the truth of the divine scripture shaken by the engines of heretics, or to exercise and more and more sharpen the powers of the wit. Above all mortals in this kind of disputation there prevailed Augustine, bishop of Hippo, [8] especially in the books of disputations against the Manichees and against the Pelagians. Examples of the three species of this Method, adapted to one and the same proposition by St. Augustine, are these:

An Example of a Problem

Or of a problematic Question, upon the lie by which the Egyptian midwives deceived Pharaoh, from Augustine in the Questions on Exodus.

Concerning the lie of the midwives, by which they deceived Pharaoh, it is wont to be asked whether such lies are approved by divine authority — since it is written that God did well to the midwives. [9]

Response. It is answered that it is uncertain whether God, out of mercy, pardoned the lie, or whether he judged the lie itself worthy of reward. For the midwives did one thing in saving the little infants alive, another in lying to Pharaoh; for in saving them alive there was a work of mercy, but that lie they used for their own sake, lest Pharaoh should harm them — which could pertain not to praise, but to pardon. Yet no authority for lying is to be taken from this; but this Question must be discussed more diligently by other examples, which are found in the scriptures like to this.

An Example of a Simple Question

Upon the same lie of the midwives, from Augustine's book To Consentius, Against Lying.

Since God did good to the lying midwives, and built them houses, it is rightly asked whether he approved their lie. [10]

Response. That it is written that God did good to the midwives — it was not so done because they lied, but because toward men they were merciful for God's sake. In them it was not the deceit that was rewarded, but the good-will, the kindness of the mind, not the iniquity of the liar. For just as it would not be strange and absurd if God should be willing to pardon certain evil works committed by them at some earlier time on account of later good ones, so it is not to be wondered at that, at one time, in one case, God, beholding both — that is, the thing done mercifully and the thing done deceitfully — [→ p188]

[continuing the Simple Question on the midwives' lie, from p187]

…both rewarded the good, and on account of it pardoned that evil. It remains, therefore, that we understand a reward to have been rendered to those women for their humanity and mercy — a reward, to be sure, temporal, not eternal.

An Example of a Disputation

Upon the same lie of the midwives, from Augustine's book On Lying, to Consentius.

The Proposition of the Disputation

Great is the question about lying, which often troubles us in our very daily acts — some thinking that one must sometimes lie with a certain honorable, dutiful, and merciful lie, but others affirming that a good man ought in no way to lie.

The Arguments of the Adversaries

Those, then, who agree with the Priscillianist heretics that it is sometimes lawful to lie [1] — that is, to declare a falsehood with the will to deceive — bring forward testimonies for their opinion out of the sacred letters: recalling that Sarah, when she had laughed, denied to the angels that she had laughed; [2] that Jacob, questioned by his father, answered that he himself was Esau, his elder son; [3] and that the Egyptian midwives lied (that the Hebrew infants being born might not be killed), with God even approving and rewarding them. [4] And, choosing many examples of this kind, they recall the lies of those men whom you would not dare to blame; and thus [urge] that you must confess that a lie can sometimes be not only not worthy of reproof, but even worthy of praise. They add also — whereby they may press not only those devoted to the divine books, but all men and common sense — saying: If someone flees to you who by your lie could be freed from death, will you not lie? If a sick man asks something which it is not expedient for him to know, one who might even be more gravely afflicted by your not answering — will you dare either to speak the truth to the man's ruin, or rather to keep silence, than to aid his health by an honorable and merciful lie? By these and such [arguments] they think themselves most abundantly pressed [to conclude] that, if the cause of counsel requires it, we may sometimes lie.

The Arguments of the Catholics

On the contrary, those to whom it seems that one must never in any way lie act much more strongly, using first the divine authority: since in the Decalogue itself it is written, Thou shalt not bear false witness [5] — under which category every lie is comprehended; for whoever declares anything bears witness to his own mind. But, lest anyone contend that not every lie is to be called false witness, what will he say to that which is written, Make no manner of lie [6] and The mouth that lieth slayeth the soul [7]? — which, lest anyone suppose it can be understood with certain liars excepted, let him read in another place, Thou shalt destroy all that speak a lie. [8] Whence the Lord himself with his own mouth thus says: Let there be in your mouth, Yea, yea; Nay, nay: for whatever is more than this, is of evil. [9] Hence also the Apostle, when he enjoined that the old man must be put off — by which name all sins are understood [10] — consequently says, laying it among the first: Wherefore, putting away lying, speak the truth. [11]

The Determination of the Disputation

These things, therefore, being considered on both sides, those seem to me rather to be heard who say that one must in no wise lie. [12] For all the testimonies of the scriptures counsel nothing else than that one must never lie at all.

The Refutation of the Heretical Objections

Nor are we frightened by those examples of lies brought forward from the old books; for there, whatever was done can be taken figuratively, although it really happened — and whatever is done or said figuratively is not a lie. [13] For every statement is to be referred to that which it states; and everything done or said figuratively states this, which it signifies to those to whom it was uttered to be understood. Whence it is to be believed that those men, who are recorded to have been worthy of authority in prophetic times, said and did prophetically all the things that are written of them, and that no less prophetically there befell them whatever so befell — so that by the same prophetic Spirit they were judged fit to be committed to memory and to writing. But concerning the midwives — since we cannot affirm that, by a prophetic spirit meant to signify some future truth, they reported one thing for another to Pharaoh — we say that they were approved and rewarded by God not for the lie, but for their charity and affection toward the innocent infants of the Hebrews. But what, if someone flees to me who could be freed by my lie? what, if a sick man who is to be healed by my lie consults me — shall I lie? Far be it: for he who lies slays the soul. [14] Wherefore, since by lying eternal life is lost, one must never lie for anyone's temporal life; for it is not fitting that one should die spiritually, that another may live bodily. [15] In no way, therefore, and on no pretext, do we determine that one must lie.

On the Collected Exposition — The Twentieth Method

The Collection, or the Collected or Collective Method, [16] is an exposition which takes, from any writings whatsoever, either the very words of the authors together with their senses, or the senses alone without the words — turning others' words and senses to its own use. Of this there are three species: [17] namely Rhapsody, Syllegma, and Abbreviation.

On Rhapsody

Rhapsody [18] — which some have called Stroma, or Stromatic exegesis — is an exposition cemented together out of various compositions of authors, there being heaped into one connection not only the senses, but the very clauses, sentences, and whole periods and paragraphs of the authors, with no word at all changed. And this Rhapsody itself is likewise threefold: [19] [→ p189]

On Hagiographic Rhapsody

Hagiographic Rhapsody [1] — which some call ἑαυτοῦ ἐξήγησιν [heautou exegesin], that is, a "self-exposition" [of Scripture by itself] — is an elucidation of divine scripture, collected out of the very words and bare sentences of divine scripture, dispersed here and there, and reduced into one body, illustrating the more obscure places from the clearer ones. This method Augustine greatly commends in the third book On Christian Doctrine, chapter 26, and prefers it to the other expositions, [2] asserting that certain obscure places in the sacred letters cannot be better and more rightly understood and expounded than from other clearer places of the holy scriptures, in which those same things are recited more clearly and openly. But the Hagiographic expositor must, in fitting these places together, use such dexterity and art that those sentences may appear not to have been dragged by force into that place, but to have sprung up there of their own accord. And that this may be done more aptly and gracefully, it will be allowed to the expositor — rarely, yet sometimes — to insert a few little words of his own, by which, as by little handles, the sayings of Scripture, far separated from one another, may cohere in a more elegant structure. In this part there labored, in times past, St. Bernard, and Martin of Laon the Carthusian (whose Paraenetic book, to a novice monk, still survives — heaped together with wondrous art out of sacred sentences interwoven with one another); and, in our own times, Henry Elmesius of Germipolis, [3] who lately fitted together, with beautiful art, homilies on all the Epistles and Gospels which are read through the circuit of the year, out of the bare Stromata and Rhapsodies of holy Scripture. Let a Specimen of this exposition be the following:

(In it those few words written in a different and somewhat larger type are not of the text of divine scripture, but taken in from elsewhere. But the little minuscule letters, interlined together with the numbers set in the margin, show the chapters of the scriptures from which the pieces of this cento are taken.)

PRAISE THE LORD — ■God and the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, ■who blessed us with every spiritual blessing in the heavenly places in Christ; who predestined us unto the adoption of sons, through JESUS CHRIST, unto himself, according to the purpose of his will, unto the praise of the glory of his grace — ■praise and exalt him above all forever — ALL NATIONS: ■you who once were Gentiles in the flesh, who were called "uncircumcision" by that which is called "circumcision" made by hand in the flesh; ■you who once were led, going astray, to dumb idols; ■you who at that time were without Christ, alienated from the citizenship of Israel, and strangers to the testaments, having no hope of the promise, and without God in this world — but now, in Christ Jesus, you who once were far off are made near in the blood of Christ; ■you who once were not the people of God, but now are the people of God, who had not obtained mercy, but now have obtained mercy; ■you who now are no longer strangers and foreigners, but are fellow-citizens of the saints and of the household of God. ■To you I say, O Gentiles — ■out of every nation that is under heaven, ■from the East and the West and the North and the South — ■to you, I say, O Gentiles, ■whom God created unto his praise, his name, and his glory: ■bring to the Lord glory and honor; ■shout to God with the voice of exultation, ■sing to him a canticle, sing well to him with jubilation, ■admonishing yourselves in Psalms, hymns, and spiritual canticles, singing and making melody in your hearts with joy, ■and giving thanks always, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, to God and the Father. PRAISE HIM — ■give glory to his praise, ■sing him a psalm ■in the voice of exultation and of confession — ALL PEOPLES: ■O Israelites, whose is the adoption of sons, the glory, the testament, the legislation, the service, and the promises; whose are the fathers, of whom is Christ, who is over all things, God blessed forever; ■whom the Lord God chose that you should be to him a peculiar people out of all the peoples that are upon the earth — not because you surpassed all nations in number (since you are fewer than all), but because the Lord loved you, and kept the oath which he swore to your fathers. ■■And do you also, O Gentiles, honor God for his mercy: FOR HIS MERCY IS CONFIRMED OVER US — the Gentiles — ■■when the goodness and kindness of God our Savior appeared, not by the works of justice which we had done, but according to his own mercy he saved us, by the laver of regeneration and the renovation of the Holy Spirit, whom he poured out abundantly through Jesus Christ. Do you too, ■■all the seed of Israel, glorify him. For THE TRUTH OF THE LORD — ■■who keeps truth forever, ■■whose name is Faithful and True, ■■who is not as man, that he should lie — REMAINS FOR EVER; ■■for it is impossible for God to lie: he who ■■swore an oath to Abraham our father that he would give himself to us in his beloved Son, ■■in whom we have redemption through his blood, ■■and the hope of eternal life, which God, who lies not, promised before the ages of the world. ■■To him be glory unto the ages of ages. Amen.

On Ecclesiastical Rhapsody, or the Catena

Ecclesiastical Rhapsody — which by the common appellation is called a Catena [4] — is an exposition collected word-for-word out of the various writings of the ecclesiastical Fathers. This is twofold: [5] Anonymous and Named (Proonyma). Now the Anonymous catena [6] is that which, the names of the authors being untold and suppressed, reduces their sentences and sayings alone into the consonance of one continuous narration — no otherwise than if one man alone were speaking — in which the expositor sometimes adds some things of his own, that he may more becomingly and more clearly connect the diverse varieties of the unconnected sentences. This, among the Greeks, Procopius of Gaza excellently performed, who [expounded] the Octoteuch — that is, the first eight books of the Old Testament [→ p190]

[1] What Hagiographic Rhapsody is. [2] St. Augustine commends the Hagiographic Rhapsody. — Obscure places of Scripture are best explained through clear places of the same Scripture. [3] Henry Elmesius composed homilies out of the very sentences of Scripture. [4] The definition of Ecclesiastical Rhapsody. [5] Ecclesiastical Rhapsody is twofold. [6] The Anonymous catena.

…expounded from the Rhapsodies of unnamed Fathers; and among the Latins, Eucherius, bishop of Lyons, and Isidore, bishop of Seville.

The Named Catena

The Named Catena (Catena Proonyma) [1] is that which weaves the periods and sentences of the expositors together by the same art of texture — differing from the former catena in this one thing only, that the former omits the names of the authors, whereas this ascribes the names of its authors within the text of the scripture, or outside the text in the margins of the pages; most of all observing this, that it may not superfluously repeat the sentences of all the authors who have brought the same explanation upon the same place, but may take up only those expositions in which different expositors have said different things about the same matter. So, among the Greeks, did Oecumenius and Theodolus, presbyter of Coele-Syria; and among the Latins, [2] the Venerable Bede, Thomas Aquinas, and Aloysius, bishop of Verona.

An Example of a Catena, on Psalm 116

JEROME: This Psalm is small in the number of its verses, but great in the sacrament of spiritual mystery. CASSIODORUS: For the choir of the saints cries out, saying that all nations ought to praise the Lord — Praise the Lord, all nations. THE GLOSS: that is, all the Gentiles. LYRA: [the Gentiles] to be called to the faith of Christ. JEROME: You who, the idols being forsaken, have come to him through faith — which the Magi, coming from the East, began, offering gifts to the new-born King, as Matthew says. [3] Praise him, all peoples. LYRA, HUGH the Cardinal, THE GLOSS: that is, all the Jews divided into twelve tribes, who — as though using reason, because they lived under the law — are called "peoples," in respect of the Gentiles, who lived as it were like cattle, without law. LYRA: He sets the Gentiles before the Jews, because few of the Jews believed at first, and many of the Gentiles, as the Apostle says. [4] CASSIODORUS: The reason why the Lord ought to be praised throughout the whole world is subjoined, when it is said: For his Mercy is confirmed over us. HUGH the Cardinal: When, in the coming of Christ, he showed forth the mercy which he had promised through the Prophets. CASSIODORUS, THE GLOSS: For what he had promised through the Prophets, he fulfilled in the coming of Christ, and confirmed his mercy; because whatever he gave, he guarded, that it might never be moved. JEROME, THE GLOSS: Or, the mercy was then confirmed, when he poured out the Holy Spirit upon believers, according to the promise which Luke the Evangelist records. LYRA: And when he says "is confirmed," he speaks of the future in the manner of the past, on account of the certainty of the Prophecy; for in the coming of Christ, and not before, was the mercy of God confirmed in effect, which before was awaited with great longing — and the truth of the Lord remains for ever.

On Ethnic Rhapsody

Ethnic Rhapsody is an exposition culled word-for-word from the sayings and sentences of Gentile authors. And this too is twofold, [5] namely the Catena and the Cento (also called Centro). The Cento differs from the Catena in that the latter, without great labor, gathers lengthy periods and long shreds of discourse into one texture — especially from writings that consist of prose, or loose speech; but the Cento is put together with greater labor and more skillful industry, chiefly out of the writings of the poets, from whose various and unconnected verses a certain new structure of verse is solidified — in this manner, namely, that into one verse there come together either two half-lines, or one half-line and the following one together with a middle. For to place two whole verses joined together is unfitting, and to fit three in one series is mere trifling. Not a few wits, by no means to be despised, labored in collecting these Rhapsodies in various ways; but in my own judgment they did not always obtain from the Gentiles the exposition of the divine scriptures which they sought, but rather a certain symphony and consonance between the divine sentences and the profane sentences of the Gentiles — not altogether useless to students of the sacred letters. In the former form of this Ethnic Rhapsody labored Dominic Nanus of Alba, [6] expounding various places of the four Evangelists from the sayings of the Gentile philosophers, orators, and poets. But in the latter form, two most illustrious women exercised their wit with the highest praise: [7] Eudocia, daughter of Leo the Athenian philosopher and wife of the Emperor Theodosius, and Proba Falconia, wife of the proconsul Adelphus — of whom the former wove Ὁμηρόκεντρα [Homerokentra], or Homerocentos, but the latter Virgiliocentos: that is, they either transcribed or expounded various places of both Testaments out of the Greek verses of Homer and the Latin verses of Virgil. Examples of these labors are these:

This heaven which now is, and the earth, are laid up for fire against the day of judgment: in which the heavens shall pass away like a river, and the elements, set on fire, shall be dissolved; and the earth, and the things that are in it, shall melt away; and the heavens being inflamed, the elements too shall liquefy.

The Vulgate edition has it thus: The heavens which now are, and the earth, by the same word are kept in store, reserved unto fire against the day of judgment… the day of the Lord shall come as a thief, in which the heavens shall pass away with great violence, and the elements shall be dissolved with heat; but the earth, and the works which are in it, shall be burnt up. [8]

The Sibyl, in the second book of the Oracles:

> Then a burning, fiery river shall flow down from heaven on high,
>
> And shall utterly consume all places;

and the fabric of the world, shall fall in ruin.

Nor does my mind deceive me: how new and wondrous a thing comes to my mind — the coming destruction of heaven and earth.

Ovid, book one of the Metamorphoses.

He remembers, too, that it stands in the fates that a time shall come when the sea, when the earth, and the seized palace of heaven shall burn, and the laborious mass of the world shall be in travail.

Seneca, at the end of the book of consolation to Marcia.

If the common fate can be a solace to you: nothing shall stand in the place where it stands. [Time] shall lay all things low and carry them off with itself; it shall press down mountains, swallow up seas, turn aside rivers; and, the intercourse of nations being broken, it shall dissolve the fellowship and gathering of the race; elsewhere it shall draw mountains down into vast chasms; it shall shake cities with tremors, and send up breaths of pestilence from the depths, and kill every living thing, the world being submerged; and with vast fires it shall scorch and burn up mortal things. And when the time shall come at which the world, about to renew itself, extinguishes itself, these things shall give way by their own strength, and star shall rush upon star, and — all matter blazing — with one fire whatever now shines in its ordered place shall burn.

Lucan, book one of the Pharsalia.

— So, when the frame being loosed, the last hour shall have gathered so many ages of the world, seeking again the ancient chaos, all the stars shall clash with stars mixed together; the fiery stars shall make for the sea; the earth shall refuse to stretch out its shores, and shall shake off the sea; and Phoebe [the moon], going contrary to her brother [the sun], refusing to drive her chariot obliquely across the sphere, shall demand the day for herself; and the whole discordant fabric of the sundered world shall confound its covenants.

On the Syllegma

The Syllegma — that is, a "collection of senses" [1] — is an exposition collected, according to the sense only, out of the various commentaries of the expositors. In it, only the truth of the sense being preserved (which is drawn out of the expositions of others), the kind of diction is varied, and a different style is adopted: as among the Latins Haymo, bishop of Halberstadt, and Rupert, abbot of Deutz, did; and, as it also seems to some, St. Jerome, [2] who culled all the commentaries of the Greek expositors.

On Abbreviation

Abbreviation differs from the Epitome (of which we spoke above) only in this: [3] that the Epitome gathers the divine scriptures into brevity, whereas this compresses into a compendium and a sum the lengthy explanations and most ample volumes of the expositors of divine scripture, with a succinct and clear brevity — so that they may be more easily read and understood, both by the busy and by the simpler, with little expense of time and labor. In this part there labored more successfully, among the Greeks, Theophylact, the abbreviator of Chrysostom, and among the Latins Odo the Abbot, who compressed the thirty-five books of the Commentaries of Gregory on Job [4] into the narrow bounds of one small volume.

On Accumulation — The Twenty-First Method

Accumulation (Coacervatio), or the amassing manner of expounding, is twofold: [5] the one consisting in the accumulation of senses, the other of testimonies. The first is that which, for the elucidation of the passage taken up, either heaps together four or six chief expositions of divine scripture at once mingled and confused, or, gathering them singly and separately, subjoins one after another and joins them into one series of continuous explanation. For among the expositors there are some who, keeping no order, confound Historical, Ethical, and Mystical explanations, without any distinction, into one heap; but, on the contrary, some to whom order is pleasing lay down first the Historical narration, as the basis of the whole explanation; in the second place they set over it the Moral, for the profit of readers; thirdly they add the Allegory; fourthly the Anagogy, for delight and ornament — which [→ p192]

[1] The Syllegma is defined. [2] St. Jerome excerpted his commentaries out of the writings of the Greeks. [3] In what respect Abbreviation differs from the Epitome. [4] The 35 books of St. Gregory [the Moralia in Job] were reduced to the narrow bounds of one small volume. [5] There is a twofold mode of Accumulation.

(Rich PDF p. 192 — printed folio 175. Finishes Method 21 (Accumulation): the first mode (heaping the four senses — Denis the Carthusian, William Pepin; Gregory confounds Allegory and Anagogy) and the second mode (aggregating testimonies — the mammoth commentaries of Henry of Langenstein on Genesis and Thomas Hasselbach on Isaiah 1; Gregory's Moralia in Job as the great quarry from which Paterius, Bede, and others drew; the example is Gregory on Job 1:20). Then Method 22: On the Thematic Exposition — mapping a whole theme onto a scriptural figure (after Xenophon's Cyropaedia*): Philo's Abraham = the contemplative man and Joseph = the civil man; Gregory of Nyssa's* Life of Moses*; Ambrose's* On Abraham. Then opens Method 23: On the Scholastic Method — twofold, Old and New, continuing on p193. Running

[continuing Method 21 (Accumulation), first mode, from p191]

…which, among the more recent, Denis the Carthusian observed in his commentaries on the Psalms, and William Pepin in his commentaries on Genesis and Exodus, most diligently. But among the ancients, St. Gregory, in his commentaries on Job, immediately after the Historical exposition subjoins the Allegorical and the Anagogical (which with him are the same); [1] and from these, lastly, he draws out the springs of the Ethical (moral) narration, for the forming of morals.

The Second Mode of Accumulation

The second mode of Accumulation is placed in the aggregation of testimonies; which, for the untying and confirmation of the passage proposed, brings together into one various testimonies, authorities, and similar passages out of the divine letters, contracted into one — and these again, especially if they be obscure and involved, it expounds in particular, a new exposition being interposed and superadded; whence it happens that, while the expositor proceeds by expounding the individual scripture-testimonies adduced, the body of the explanation grows in a manner immense, and scarcely finds an end. In this kind of expounding there toiled, among the scholastics, Henry of Langenstein, [2] who, having spent many years in the public exposition of Genesis, scarcely reached the fourth chapter of that book after four whole years, having published on these four great volumes, in which he interpreted almost all the books of both Testaments. Him Thomas Hasselbach surpassed by a far more prolix work, [3] who, when in the space of one-and-twenty years he had not yet reached the end of the first chapter of Isaiah (which he had continuously expounded), at last left twenty-four books of his Exposition on the first chapter of Isaiah. But among the Fathers, St. Gregory labored in this task with greater praise, [4] who in all his writings — but especially in the thirty-five books of his Commentaries on Job — so heaped together the sentences and fragments of so many divine oracles, and expounded what he had heaped up, that from these, as from a most rich storehouse, many not ignoble expositors received entire expositions of almost all the volumes of holy scripture: such as Paterius, notary of St. Gregory; Claudius, abbot of Chiusa; Bede the Presbyter; Alulf the monk; Werner of Paris; and very many other students of the Gregorian reading, who gathered from Gregory's sentences explanations upon both Testaments. Since an example of this Method cannot be given without much prolixity, we remit the curious reader to the commentaries of St. Gregory on Job, but especially to the second book of that work — in whose 29th, 30th, and 38th chapters, for the exposition of that sentence, Then Job arose, and rent his garments, and, his head being shaved, falling down upon the earth, adored, etc., [5] there are brought forward and explained twelve divine testimonies gathered from various places of the Bible.

On the Thematic Exposition — The Twenty-Second Method

The Thematic Method of explaining [6] is that which applies particular parts of divine scripture, together with their expositions, to the treatment of some particular subject — showing that the whole body of the subject undertaken, and its several members and parts, are to be found, as though painted in a picture, in the proposed places of holy scripture. The artifice of this interpretation, St. Ambrose intimates, flowed from Xenophon, the hearer of Socrates, who — in that book which he entitled Κύρου παιδίαν [Kyrou paidian], that is, the Education of Cyrus — setting before himself the person of Cyrus king of the Persians, and the narration of the things done by him, described the discipline of a just and wise king from the inmost bosom of Philosophy. Him afterward the distinguished expositors of the divine volumes emulated. Among whom Philo, among the Jews, being about to treat of the subjects of the twofold life (namely the contemplative and the political), wrote two separate books: in the former, entitled On the Life of the Wise Man Perfected by Doctrine, or On Abraham, he expounds summarily the life of Abraham gathered from the 12th to the 23rd chapter of Genesis, showing that Moses wished to paint in Abraham the image of a man perfected through contemplation; [7] but in the latter, entitled On the Civil Man, or On Joseph, expounding selectively the deeds of Joseph from the 37th chapter of Genesis to the 48th, he teaches that Joseph is the exemplar of the civil man, [8] and one fit for the helm of the commonwealth. This same thing, among the Greeks, Gregory of Nyssa performed, in the book to which he gave the title On the Perfect Life of Man, or On the Life of Moses, in which, briefly explaining what Moses wrote of himself in the Pentateuch, he expressed in the image of Moses whatever conduces to a perfect kind of life. [9] This very thing also, among the Latins, Ambrose did, in various books which, under diverse titles and subjects, he composed for the explanation of the Old Testament — but especially in the two volumes entitled On Abraham the Patriarch, or On the Man Perfect through Action, in which, explaining the deeds of Abraham from the 12th to the 18th chapter of Genesis, he delineated the idea of the moral and truly active man. In these authors, therefore, you may read an example of the present method, which cannot here be inserted on account of its prolixity.

On the Scholastic Method — The Twenty-Third Method

The Scholastic kind of exposition is twofold: [10] Old and New. Now the Old is that which, in expounding the holy letters, those most eloquent Fathers once used, who — after a long exercise of eloquence, coming from the schools of the Rhetoricians to sacred studies — [made] their expositions [→ p193]

[1] St. Gregory confounds the Allegorical and Anagogical exposition. [2] Henry of Langenstein published 4 great volumes on the first 4 chapters of Genesis. [3] Thomas Hasselbach wrote 24 books on the first chapter of Isaiah. [4] The Commentaries of St. Gregory on Job are commended. [5] Job 1:20. [6] The Thematic method is defined. [7] Moses depicted in Abraham the image of a man perfect through contemplation. [8] Joseph was the exemplar of the civil man. [9] Moses was a perfect man. [10] The Scholastic kind of exposition is twofold.

*(Rich PDF p. 193 — printed folio 176. Continues Method 23 (Scholastic): the Old scholasticism = the eloquent Fathers who brought rhetorical polish to sacred exposition (Prudentius, called by Bede the noblest Spanish scholastic; Musaeus, Julian, Eucherius per Gennadius; Jerome; Paul at the Areopagus). Then the New scholasticism — born c. 1130, after Lothair II revived the buried Roman law-books and monks, seeing scripture eclipsed by legal study, imitated the jurists — distributed into ten genres: Concordances, Dictionaries, Histories, Postils, Question-books, Lectures, Compendia, Sermon-books, Metrical works, Meditations — each here described. …their expositions with the rhetorical ornaments which they had brought with them, for the sake of delighting — mingling in also the weightiest affections for the stirring of minds, so that the things they said might not only be understood by the hearers, but also loved. And in this signification Bede the presbyter, in the book On the Metrical Art, called Prudentius the most noble Scholastic of the Spaniards; [1] and Gennadius, in his catalogue of illustrious writers, reckoned Musaeus, Julian, Eucherius, and very many others among the Scholastics — that is, among the highest professors of Scholastic eloquence. Jerome too writes that he, while still glowing in the very studies of the Rhetoricians, painted many things about sacred matters with a scholastic flower [of style]; and in his Commentaries on the epistle to Titus he says that the Apostle Paul, when he was preaching in the Areopagus, drew the argument of his sermon from the inscription of the Altar of the Athenians, with a certain scholastic elegance.

The New Scholasticism

The other kind of scholastic explanation — which we now have, compounded from sacred Theology and Philosophy, especially the Peripatetic — is recent and new, [2] born about four hundred years ago, a little after the times of the Emperor Lothair II, who in the year of the Lord 1130 found the books of the Roman laws covered over with dust, brought them back to light, and commanded that they be publicly read in the schools, and that law be pronounced according to those laws. And so, by this occasion, the treasury of the laws was recalled into use, whence many wrote many commentaries on the laws. But, the studies of the laws now flourishing everywhere, and being embraced by all the most learned (as is wont to happen in a new thing), certain devout clerics and monks, perceiving that the knowledge of sacred scripture was growing cold and being despised in comparison with the study of the laws, themselves also undertook the Theological study, and, by the example of the Jurisconsults, began to expound the holy books and to publish their expositions in writing. Of these, those which up to this day have been more in use in their schools are distributed into ten orders: [3]

- The first embraces Concordances;
- the Second, Dictionaries;
- the Third, Histories;
- the Fourth, Postils;
- the Fifth, Question-books;
- the Sixth, Lectures;
- the Seventh, Compendia;
- the Eighth, Sermon-books;
- the Ninth, Metrical [works];
- the Tenth, Meditations.

1. In the Concordances, [4] then, they first digested all the words — both declinable and indeclinable — contained in the divine volumes into alphabetical order, all and every one of the books, chapters, and lines being noted, in which any words are found similar and concordant to the word sought.

2. In the Dictionaries [5] (which they also called Distinctionaria, on account of the manifold distinctions of the words that are in them), they expounded all the words of divine scripture, disposed in alphabetical series, in a manifold sense both literal and spiritual — dividing, distinguishing, defining, and dilating the significations of the individual words, and treating diverse matters according to the nature of each word.

3. In the Histories, [6] they reduced all the historical books of both Testaments into one body of continuous and complete history, interspersing (wherever the series of things seemed to require it) many histories not only external — borrowed from undoubted writers — but also apocryphal narrations, received rather by the tradition of the ancients than by any writing; adding besides, for explaining the obscure places of the history, brief little annotations gathered from the sayings of the holy Fathers.

4. In the Postils, [7] they elucidated the divine Scriptures according to the literal and spiritual understanding most simply and most briefly, all subtlety of disputations being entirely omitted.

5. In the Question-books, [8] on the contrary, almost all expositions of Scripture being set aside, they proposed obscure doubts and questions out of various places of the scriptures, and, with contraries brought in on both sides (both Philosophical and Theological arguments), disputed most subtly and most fully about the places proposed.

6. In the Lectures, [9] embracing both parts, they expounded the manifold senses of the Scriptures more broadly and more fully than they had done in the Postils, restricting into a narrow compass the questions which they had treated most amply in the Question-books, and mingling them with their own explanations.

7. In the Compendia, [10] they divided the books of divine Scripture (either all, or some) by a certain general partition into parts and members, and, thus divided member by member, compressed them into brief summaries.

8. In the Sermon-books, [11] they set forth popular sermons and discourses upon diverse places of divine Scripture, woven together out of scholastic doubts and moral instructions.

9. In the Metrical [works], [12] they expounded the holy books with a manifold variety of new verses and Rhythms first invented by themselves.

10. In the Meditations [13] (which are also called affective contemplations), they explain the divine letters by certain imaginary representations, which they devised for the moving and inflaming of minds.

Moreover, as regards the phrase — that is, the manner of speaking — it is the same for all of them. [14] They use no coloring of secular eloquence, no choice of accurate elocution; inasmuch as they desire neither to delight nor to sway, but only to teach. They have a simple, brief, and compressed narration; but a lowly, open, and most common, worn-out speech — stuffed, according to the custom of the vulgar, with barbarisms and solecisms; yet in the Lectures, and especially in the Question-books, obscure and abstruse, both on account of the subtlety of the most difficult Questions, and on account of certain new and Barbarous words, unheard by Latin ears, and lately sprung up in their own Schools. Whereby it happens that some of the Rhetoricians, devoted to eloquence, [15] not only abstain from reading them, but also [reject] the very name "scholastic" as Barbarous, unlearned, [→ p194]

(Rich PDF p. 194 — printed folio 177. Finishes Method 23 (Scholastic). Sixtus defends the scholastics against the rhetoricians who scorn them: Cicero himself asked of a philosopher erudition, not eloquence; Paul was "rude in speech, yet not in knowledge" — and Sixtus was raised in their schools. He lays out the five props of the scholastic method (Division, Distinction, Definition, Argumentation, Allegation/Citation), the anatomy of a scholastic commentary (the "subject" + four causes; Preface and Treatise, endlessly subdivided), and of a scholastic sermon (Exordium from a Theme; a threefold/fourfold Narration; a closing "Practical" of rebukes; the Manipulus Florum and Polyanthea *as quote-quarries). A roll of masters by genre (Hugh of St-Cher, Bersuire, Peter Comestor, Lyra, Albert, Aquinas, Vincent Ferrer, Godfrey of Viterbo, Bonaventure, Gerson…). [continuing Method 23 (Scholastic), from p193]

…unlearned, and abhor it as worthy of no esteem — who indeed seem to me gravely to err in this, and to despise the judgment of their own Cicero, which they so greatly admire. For he requires of a philosopher not eloquence, but erudition. [1] For in the book On the Ends of Goods and Evils, making mention of Epicurus, he says: "The style of that Philosopher does not offend me; for he both embraces in words what he wishes, and says plainly what I understand. And yet from a Philosopher, if he brings eloquence, I accept it; if he has it not, I do not much demand it." Since, therefore, Cicero does not at all require eloquence of philosophers, I do not see why the same should be so greatly demanded of the Scholastic Theologians — who, though (according to Paul's saying) they be rude in speech, yet not in knowledge; [2] but the more they are destitute of elegance of elocution, the more they excel in erudition, setting forth things not painted but solid, teaching the things that most profit and that pertain to the intended end, and teaching thus, as is fitting, both with the rude and with the learned. But of these things elsewhere; for I have not undertaken, in the present place, to take up the defense of the Scholastics (in whose schools I was educated and advanced), but only to explain their manner of expounding.

The Five Props of the Scholastic Method

As, then, regards the manner of teaching, the whole Method of their explanation rests chiefly upon five props [3] — namely: Division, Distinction, Definition, Argumentation, and Allegation (Citation) — according to the custom of the Peripatetics and the Jurisconsults. In Divisions they so abound [4] that they explain no period of divine scripture, however brief, unless they first divide and distribute it into diverse parts and members. Of Distinctions so great is the force among them [5] that they distinguish almost every single word of the passage taken up into various and diverse significations of words and things, and explain each distinct one by its own definitions and descriptions. Of Allegations they are so copious [6] that in any matter proposed they bring forward a numerous multitude of witnesses and testimonies, the name of the authors being always cited, with the title of the books and the number of the chapters, from which the testimonies are drawn.

The prefaces of their commentaries — whether these be Postils, Lectures, Compendia, or whatever else — they always begin [7] from some sentence of the holy scriptures, but taken from outside the book which they are about to expound, and from some other sacred volume; and from the words of that sentence they draw out the argument of the whole book (which they call the subject), together with the four causes of the work, which they call Material, Formal, Efficient, and Final. These being explained, they divide the whole work into two principal parts [8] — namely, the Preface (Proœmium) and the Treatise — and again subdivide each of these into three or four less-principal [parts], and these again they dissect into yet smaller particles; and in this manner, now dividing, now explaining what is divided, they reach at last the end of the book.

In almost this manner they treat that part which pertains to popular discourses, which they call Preachings, dividing them into Exordium and Narration. [9] The Exordium they begin from some sentence, taken almost always either from the Gospel reading or from the epistle read that same day in the sacred mysteries — which they call the Theme. [10] Then, the argument of the sermon being briefly proposed, they divide the things to be said by a partition chiefly threefold or fourfold, into three or four parts — which some call Mysteries, some Doctrines, some Truths, some Advisements — terminating each member of the partition in a rhythmic consonance, that they may be more easily apprehended by the mind and more tenaciously retained in the memory. Then, in the Narration (which they call the Familiar part), following the order of the proposed partition, at the beginning of each Mystery or truth they accommodate to the exposition of the proposed passage certain scholastic doubts — taken either from the theological summae of St. Thomas, Albert, Alexander, Bonaventure, and Scotus, or from the dogmas of the Peripatetics — confirmed most copiously from many testimonies (of divine scripture and of the ecclesiastical Fathers, as well as of poets, orators, and Gentile writers, gathered either from the Manipulus Florum [Handful of Flowers] or from the Polyanthea, and cited by name and by number). These being explained, at last, at the end of the Mystery, they turn to the detestation of vices — which they call the Practical part, and Fervor — using worn-out and most common reproofs, chidings, and rebukes.

The Chief Masters of the Scholastic Method

This, then, is the scholastic Method, described according to its orders and parts; in which the more excellent were: [11] as regards the Concordances, Hugh of St-Cher and Conrad of Halberstadt; in the Dictionaries, Pierre Bersuire the Frenchman, and Marcus of Ulm; in the Histories, Peter Comestor, author of the Scholastic History; in the Postils, Hugh of St-Cher and Nicholas of Lyra; in the Lectures, Albertus Magnus and Thomas Aquinas; in the Sermon-books, St. Vincent the Spaniard [Ferrer] and Robert of Lecce; in the Metrical [works], Godfrey of Viterbo and Peter Riga of Reims; in the scholastic Meditations, Bonaventure the Cardinal and Landulph the Carthusian, John Gerson, and Denis the Carthusian. From these, therefore, we have thought fit to insert in this place certain more notable examples of the scholastic variety, for the exact knowledge of the present artifice.

An Example of a Dictionary Exposition

From the Dictionary of Pierre Bersuire, the Frenchman by surname.

Of the Dictionary. — Exposition on the letter A, or, concerning the letter A.

In the first place we may note that this letter, or syllable, A, can be taken in three ways; for it is taken as an initial letter (litera principiativa); as an interjection of grieving and lamenting [→ p195]

[1] Cicero requires in a philosopher not eloquence, but erudition. [2] 2 Corinthians 11:6. [3] The method of teaching scholastic Theology rests chiefly on five props. [4] Division is very frequent among the Scholastics. [5] Great is the force of Distinctions in Scholastic Theology. [6] The Scholastics are diligent in citing authors. [7] The scholastic Theologians are wont to begin the prefaces of their commentaries from some sentence of Scripture. [8] The Scholastics divide their works into prefaces and treatises. [9] The scholastics divide their sermons into Exordia and Narrations. [10] What the "Theme" is in the sermons of the scholastics. Finishes the Dictionary example (Bersuire on the letter A: three senses — the initial letter = God, "I am alpha and omega" [Rev 1:8]; the interjection of grief = the human condition [Wis 7:3, the newborn's first cry]; the ablative preposition = evil princes [2 Cor 11:32; Ps 140]). The Scholastic-History example is skipped (Peter Comestor, "Master of the Scholastic History"). [continuing the Dictionary example (Bersuire on the letter "A"), from p194]

…of lamenting; and as an ablative preposition. By the first [sense] I can understand the Author-of-all-beginnings of all things; by the second I can take the wretched man and wayfarer; but by the third, the impious man and sinner.

For, in the first way, A is the first letter of the alphabet, signifying him who is first in the order of things — namely God, who says of himself in Apocalypse 1: I am alpha and omega, the beginning and the end. [1] For "Alpha" in Greek is the same as "A" in Latin. In the second way, A is the interjection of one grieving; and so it can signify the human condition, which is doleful and empty (vain) — whence this is that first cry which the boy, coming into this misery, at once utters, saying "A, A," as if grieving for the misery into which he has entered; of which it is written in Wisdom 7: I, being born, drew in the common air, and, weeping, sent forth my first voice, like all others. [2] In the third way, A is an ablative preposition, serving the Ablative — that is, the princes of the world; and so it can signify to me proud men, who always wish to be set before others — and especially prelates and bailiffs, who serve "the ablative," that is, the princes of the world, who cease not to take away the goods of their subjects. 2 Corinthians 11: At Damascus the governor of the nation of King Aretas wished to seize me, etc.; [3] whence of such an "A" can be said that which is written in Psalm 140: From the wicked man deliver me. — Again, of the first "A," the initiative, can be said whatever is said of God, or of a beginning; of the second "A," the lamentative, whatever is said of human misery; of the third "A," whatever is said of evil princes, etc. I pass over, for brevity's sake, the other significations of this letter, which the same author pursues at length, with many words, at the beginning of his Dictionary.

An Example of Scholastic History

…which, for brevity's sake, we here omit; you may see it in the history of Peter Comestor, who by a certain excellence is called by the Scholastics the Master of the Scholastic History.

An Example of a Scholastic Question, on Psalm 66

[so printed; the objections and reply that follow work with Psalm 116, whose text is cited in the sed contra.]

It is asked: whether God is to be praised, and especially with the praise of the mouth?

Objection 1. And it seems that [he is] not. For the Philosopher says in the first [book] of the Ethics: "Of the best things there is not praise, but something greater and better." But God is above all the best things; therefore praise is not owed to God, but something greater than praise. Whence in Ecclesiasticus 43 it is said that God is greater than all praise. [4]

Objection 2. Moreover, the praise of God pertains to his worship, for it is an act of religion; but God is worshipped more with the mind than with the mouth — whence the Lord, in Matthew 15, against certain persons adduces that saying of Isaiah: This people honoreth me with their lips, but their heart is far from me. [5] Therefore the praise of God consists more in the heart than in the mouth.

Objection 3. Moreover, men are praised with the mouth to this end, that they may be provoked to better things; for as the wicked grow proud from their praises, so the good are provoked by their praises to better things — whence it is said in Proverbs 27: As silver is tried in the melting-pot, so a man is tried by the mouth of them that praise him. [6] But God is not provoked to better things by the words of men, both because he is immutable and because he is supremely good and has nothing whereby to grow; therefore God is not to be praised with the mouth.

But on the contrary is that which is said in Psalm 116: Praise the Lord, all nations, etc.; [7] and in Psalm 62: My mouth shall praise thee with lips of exultation. [8]

I answer that it must be said that we use words toward God for one reason, and toward man for another. [9] For toward man we use words that we may express to him the conception of our heart, which he cannot know except by our words; and therefore we use the praise of the mouth toward man, [10] that it may be made known either to him or to others that we hold a good opinion of the one praised — so that by this we may both provoke him who is praised to better things, and lead others (before whom he is praised) into a good opinion, reverence, and imitation of him. But toward God we use words — not indeed that we may manifest our conceptions to him who is the inspector of hearts, but that we may lead ourselves, and others who hear, to his reverence; and therefore the praise of the mouth is necessary, [11] not indeed for God's sake, but for the sake of the one praising, whose affection is stirred up toward God by praising him — according to that of the Psalm: The sacrifice of praise shall glorify me. [12] And in so far as a man ascends toward God in affection through divine praise, in so far by this is he drawn back from those things which are against God — according to that of Isaiah 48: For my praise I will bridle thee, lest thou perish. [13] The praise of the mouth also profits toward this, that the affection of others may be provoked toward God — whence it is said in the psalm, His praise shall be always in my mouth, and afterward is subjoined, Let the meek hear and be glad. Magnify the Lord with me. [14]

Reply to Objection 1. It must be said that we can speak of God in two ways: in one way, as regards his essence; and thus, since he is incomprehensible and ineffable, he is greater than all praise — but according to this comparison there is owed to him reverence, and the honor of latria (adoration). [15] Whence also in the psalm, according to Jerome's translation, it is said: To thee praise is silent, O God [16] — as regards the first; and to thee shall the vow be rendered — as regards the second. In another way, [we speak of God] according to his effects, which are ordained to our benefit; and according to this, praise is owed to God — whence it is said in Isaiah 63: I will remember the mercies of the Lord; the praise of the Lord over all things which the Lord hath rendered to us. [17] And Dionysius says, in the first chapter On the Divine Names: "Every holy hymn of the theologians (that is, divine praise) thou shalt find dividing the manifestative and laudative namings of God unto the blessed processions of the Thearchy — that is, of the divinity."

Reply to Objection 2. It must be said that the praise of the mouth is useless to the one praising, if it be without the praise of the heart; [18] for then [only] does he speak praise to God, when he ponders the great works of his deeds with affection. Yet the exterior praise of the mouth avails to excite the interior affection of the one praising, and to provoke others to the praise of God, as has been said.

Reply to Objection 3. It must be said that we do not praise God for his own benefit, but for our benefit, as has been said.

An Example of a Scholastic Lecture, on Psalm 116

A shortened word (verbum abbreviatum) hath the Lord made upon the earth — Isaiah, chapter 10, and to the Romans, chapter 9. [19] In this sentence of Isaiah are touched the four causes of this Psalm — namely, the Material, the Formal, the Agent [Efficient], and the Final. And first the Material is intimated by the word "VERBVM" (Word), because the matter treated in this psalm is the mercy and truth of God, shown forth in the incarnate Word [→ p196]

[1] Revelation 1:8. [2] Wisdom 7:3. [3] 2 Corinthians 11:32. [4] Ecclesiasticus 43:33. [5] Matthew 15:8, citing Isaiah 29:13. [6] Proverbs 27:21. [7] Psalm 116:1 (Vulg.). [8] Psalm 63:6 (Vulg. 62:6): "with joyful lips shall my mouth praise." [9] For a different reason we use words toward God than toward man. [10] Why men are praised. [11] God is praised with the mouth not for God's own sake, but for the sake of the one praising. [12] Psalm 50:23 (Vulg. 49:23). [13] Isaiah 48:9. [14] Psalm 34:1–3 (Vulg. 33:2–3). [15] To the ineffable God, as regards his essence, is owed the honor of latria (adoration). [16] Psalm 65:2 (Vulg. 64:2), per Jerome: "praise waits for thee in silence." [17] Isaiah 63:7. [18] The praise of the mouth without the praise of the heart is useless to the one praising. [19] Isaiah 10:22; Romans 9:28.

(Rich PDF p. 196 — printed folio 179. Finishes the Scholastic Lecture on Psalm 116: the psalm's four causes worked out (Formal = "shortened"; Agent = "the Lord hath made" [through David]; Final = "upon the earth" = the whole world's benefit); its structure (Title "Alleluia" / Treatise, subdivided); and the scholastic difficulty "whether God is to be praised" with its answer (as to essence, God is above all praise; as to his effects — mercy and justice — he is rightly praised). Then On the Scholastic Compendium — Prose vs. Metrical; Universal vs. Particular; the Particular further split into Tree (branching-diagram) and Column (two-column) forms. A worked Universal Compendium from Pierre Auriol (Cardinal) divides all Scripture into eight principal parts by eight modes of teaching, then divides Genesis (the "political/legislative" part) in exhaustive detail. Continues on p197. Running head: LIBER TERTIVS.)

[continuing the Scholastic Lecture on Psalm 116, from p195]

…incarnate. The Formal is touched in the word "ABBREVIATVM" (shortened), because the form of this psalm is a compendious brevity, comprehending all the divine praises that are dispersed throughout the whole book of psalms. The Agent [cause] is touched there, "FECIT" (hath made): "DOMINVS" (the Lord) — for God was the agent cause, who made this Psalm through the mouth of David. [1] The Final is touched in the words "SVPER TERRAM" (upon the earth), because the end which moved God to send the incarnate Word, and to pronounce this Psalm concerning the incarnate Word, was the benefit of the whole earth. Now the present psalm is divided, after the manner of the other psalms, into two parts — namely, into Title and Treatise (which begins, "Praise the Lord," etc.). The Title is "Alleluia," in which it is intimated that this Psalm is hallelujatic — that is, laudatory — inviting the whole world to praise God for the mercy obtained in the coming of the incarnate Word. But in the Treatise the author carries out what he had proposed in the title; and it is divided into two parts: in the first he invites all men to praise God; in the second he renders the cause of the invitation, there: "For his mercy is confirmed." The first part is again divided into two: the second begins there, "Praise him, all peoples"; the first there, "Praise the Lord, all nations" — in which he invites the Gentile nations (which are called "nations") to the praise of God. But a difficulty arises: whether God is to be praised? And it seems not; for the Philosopher says, in the first [book] of the Ethics, that of the best things there is not praise, but something greater and better; but God is above all the best things; therefore praise is not owed to God, but something greater than praise — whence in Ecclesiasticus 43 it is said that God is greater than all praise. [2] But on the contrary is that which is here said in the Psalm, "Praise the Lord, all nations." I answer, it must be said that we can speak of God in two ways: in one way, as regards his essence; [3] and thus, since he is incomprehensible and ineffable, he is greater than all praise — but according to this comparison there is owed to him reverence, and the honor of latria. In another way, according to his effects, which are ordained to our benefit (such as mercy and justice); and according to these, God is to be praised, and in fact is praised in the present psalm, etc.

On the Scholastic Compendium

The Scholastic Compendium is divided into Prose and Metrical; [4] and of these, the Prose is twofold: the one Universal, which divides, enumerates, and gathers only the chief heads of the whole work; the other Particular and more distinct, elaborated with greater industry, which divides the primary parts of the whole work into smaller particles, and the particular members even down to the least articles and the incisions of the articles — enumerating them, and summarily touching upon them, for the easier convenience of the apprehensive faculty and for the help of memory. This [Particular kind] is again distinguished into two, namely into Tree (Arboreum) and Column (Columnare): of which the Tree [5] is so called because, digested through many deductions and divisions of lines and branches proceeding from one trunk, it represents the appearance and figure of a branching tree. But the Column [6] is so named because it is wont to be written in two columns of the same page: in the first of which the individual clauses, members, and incisions of the compendium are fitted, in fitting order, one under another; but in the other column, the words or sentences of holy Scripture, corresponding to the individual members of the compendium, are collocated over against them (è regione). Examples of both are these:

An Example of a Universal Scholastic Compendium

From the compendium of Pierre Auriol, the Cardinal, on the whole of Scripture.

Divine Scripture can be divided into eight principal parts, according to the eight modes of teaching which it assumes. [7] For it teaches politically and legislatively in its first part, namely in the Pentateuch; it teaches, secondly, chronicle-wise — or historically and narratively — in its second part, namely in the ten books: Joshua, Judges, Ruth, Kings, Chronicles, Ezra, Tobit, Judith, and the rest that follow (in which the author briefly pursues the division of the other parts). These being finished, he again undertakes the division of the first part, in these words:

And so the first part, which is Political and legislative, is contained under five books. For it treats: first, of the quality of the Lord who enjoins the law; secondly, of the quality of the servant who proposes the law; thirdly, of the quality of the assembly that contains the law; fourthly, of the quality of the people that admits the law; and fifthly, of the brevity of the epilogue that expounds the law. Genesis, then, begins the political part, and treats of the Lord who enjoins the law — describing his omnipotence, in that he was the creator of all things from the beginning (which it declares in five chapters); in that he was the savior of men in the flood (which it declares in four other chapters); in that he was the disperser of all nations, their lip being confounded, throughout the whole world (which it declares in two chapters). Describing also his benevolence and friendship toward men, especially toward the spiritual fathers of Israel — which it shows from the segregation of Abraham: as to place, Go forth out of thy land [8] and out of thy kindred; as to the sign of circumcision; as to the deed of the son of oblivion — and this from the twelfth chapter to the twenty-fifth. Likewise from the keeping of Isaac, whom he preserved and guarded among those wicked nations — and this from the 25th chapter to the twenty-ninth. Likewise from the predilection and multiplication of Jacob, from the twenty-ninth chapter to the thirty-ninth. Likewise in the exaltation of Joseph, from the thirty-ninth chapter to the end. As if that book wished to argue thus: "The laws of that Lord who is most omnipotent, and the only benevolent God, are to be observed by men; but that Lord who instituted and enjoined the laws which shall be set down in this political treatise is the only most omnipotent God, supremely benevolent to the human race, and especially to the holy fathers; therefore his laws are to be observed by men." So that, as the political [sciences] humanly invented begin from the end of all human acts, so this political [science], divinely revealed, may begin from the productive beginning of all things — from whom, as from the one enjoining, all laws, and goodness, and rectitude, take their lot. Thus far Genesis; to which is joined Exodus, as a second book, and it treats, etc.; and so onward it runs through the individual volumes of divine scripture, even to the last.

The First Part of this epistle, serving for the salutation, comprehends three things, which render the epistle worthy of faith and acceptable — namely, the Salutant (one saluting), the Saluted, and the Greeting (salus):

Analysis (Compendium)	Scripture (Romans 1)
I. First, it contains the person saluting, described from four things:	I.
1. from his name	1. Paul,
2. from his condition	2. a servant of Jesus Christ,
3. from his dignity	3. called an Apostle,
4. from his office of preaching the Gospel — which Gospel is praised from four things:	4. set apart unto the gospel:
1. from its origin	1. of God,
2. from its antiquity	2. which he had promised before,
3. from the truth of its witnesses	3. by his prophets in the holy scriptures,
4. from its fruit — which is the Son of God, incarnate for us; [1] whom it commends as the Son of God from two things:	4. concerning his Son, who was made to him of the seed of David according to the flesh;
1. from the power of [his] might	1. who was declared the Son of God;

Analysis (Compendium)	Scripture (Romans 1)
2. from the bounty of [his] liberality	2. through whom we have received grace.
II. Secondly, it contains the persons saluted, whom it expresses and honors by a double title:	II. To all that are at Rome:
1. eternal	1. beloved of God,
2. temporal	2. called to be saints.
III. Thirdly, it contains the Greeting, or the form of saluting, in which he prays for the Romans two greatest goods:	III.
1. the beginning of all goods	1. Grace to you, and
2. the ultimate end of all goods	2. peace, from God the Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ.

On the Last Mode of the Scholastic Compendium (the Metrical)

The Metrical Compendium [1] is a most strict sum of the sacred volumes, comprehended in very few words, in whose individual words the arguments of the individual chapters of divine scripture are compressed with a most artificial brevity. Such is that brief little summary of the whole Old and New Testament, most briefly concluded by Alexander of Villedieu, of Dol, in a hundred and twelve hexameters [2] — in which the individual words touch upon the arguments of the individual chapters of the sacred scripture. And, lest the narrowness of the brevity should take away the understanding of the verses, to each word is subscribed, by an arithmetical mark, the number of the chapter whose sum is contained in it — interlinear little glosses of smaller writing being also added, indicating the signification of each word. An example of this compendium, taken from Alexander himself, is this: [→ p199]

On the Metrical Explanation of the Scholastics

I am not unaware that the Poetry of the Scholastics is despised by all the learned, [1] and utterly hissed off as inept, superstitious, and worthy of laughter; yet, lest I seem to be wanting to the plan of the work I have undertaken — in which I proposed to indicate all the varieties of exposition, whatever they be — I shall not be reluctant to explain this part too, briefly, whose occasion was this: [2] When throughout all Europe the custom had already grown up that Rhythms (that is, unpolished verses, ending in the same consonance of the final syllable, composed in the vernacular idiom of each province) should be sung, the poetry of Vernacular Rhythms began to be held in such price that no poem seemed worthy of any applause or praise which was destitute of rhythmic harmony. Wherefore, when the Scholastics desired to allure the men of their age (given to rhythms) to the studies of the sacred letters, taking occasion from this, they too devised a new method of the Metrical art, compounded from the old Latin and the recent vernacular poetry. From the old they took the quantity of syllables, the number of feet, and the laws and measures of the whole verse, most diligently to be observed; but from the new and vernacular they took the consonances of rhythms, the like endings of syllables, and sometimes an equal number of syllables and letters in the diverse verses. And they distinguished this new Poetry — or Metrical exposition of divine scripture — into two species: [3] namely, into the Prose-Verse (Prosocarminea), which is composed of verses with prose intermingled, and into the Verse (Carminea), which consists of verse alone. This latter they again divided into two parts — that is, into the Rhythmic and the Leonine — of which we shall here set down both the descriptions and the examples.

On the Rhythmic Explanation

The Rhythmic Exposition [4] consists of unpolished and rude verses, which answer to one another by an equal number of syllables and by the likeness of the final syllables. An example of it, taken from the exposition of the Carthusian [Denis the Carthusian] on the beginning of the gospel according to John, is thus:

Scripture (John 1)	Rhythmic paraphrase
In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God.	Thou, the Word, in the beginning / wast, with no beginning, / in the Father eternally / abiding, timelessly. // Confounded are the heretics / who slanderously assert / that thou didst begin from a mother, or in time, / and in body: / but that "thou wast not before" — / herein these men are shown to lie. // …Thou wast with God the Father, / true God with him — / not as through an instrumental / cause distinct from the Father.
All things were made by him,	Through thee all things were formed, / O Christ, uncreated Power. / Through thee were all things made, / thou who teachest even through dreams; / O everlasting Glory, / O Light supremely to be loved. // The World was created through thee — / but as through a co-principal, / first exemplary Cause; / through thee it stands firm in good things.
and without him was made nothing.	Apart from thee, nothing — and sin — / was made; thou holdest it not to have / true being as to the formal, / for it is not any posited thing.
What was made, in him was life.	The creatures, in thee, were life, / O infinite Light; / for in thee, ideally, / they existed vitally.

On the Leonine Exposition

The Leonine [exposition] — so called from Leo, its first inventor [5] — is that which, the metrical laws of the Latin poets being preserved, adds a rhythmic consonance (rhyme) to the verses. And this is bipartite: namely, Heroic, consisting of hexameter verse, and Elegiac, running in hexameter and pentameter verses. Again, the Heroic is distinguished by a threefold division: namely, into Monorhythmic, Dirhythmic, and Isogrammatic — of which the definitions and examples here follow.

On the Monorhythmic

The Monorhythmic [6] is when each two hexameters, in similarly-ending syllables [→ p200]

Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)*

[continuing the Monorhythmic, from p199]

…syllables, terminate the last foot of the verse, they make a rhythmic symphony. An example of it, contained in the exposition of Peter Riga [Petrus Rigensis] on the beginning of the book of Job, is this: [1]

> Some masters ascribe the book of Job to Moses,
>
> as its author; but the opinion is false, of a perverse
>
> judgment it proceeds. Others have held the little books > to have had no author born [i.e. no single named author] — but these things too are refuted,
>
>
> as falsehood is wont to be, etc.

On the Dirhythmic

The Dirhythmic exposition [2] is when, in two hexameter verses, a rhythmic consonance (rhyme) is kept both in the middle of the verse and at its end. Of which sort there are many in the same Peter Riga, especially in his exposition of the fourteenth chapter of Job, where the author expounds that sentence, Who can make clean that which is conceived of unclean seed, save thou, who alone art? [Job 14:4] in these verses: [3]

> Scripture unfolds the pure mysteries of Christ,
>
> Concerning the sacred Breath [Spirit] who came forth without guilt,
>
> Not out of the unclean, proceeding from clean seed,
> Cleansing the unclean — through whom mind and flesh are made clean.

Such also is the postillary exposition of Alexander of Villedieu [Alexander Dolensis] on the Acts of the Apostles, thus beginning:

> If thou wouldst know the transacted Apostolic deeds,
>
> This Postil shall handle those for thee in verses.

On the Isogrammatic

The Isogrammatic — that is, the Equal-letter — exposition [4] is that in which any two hexameters, succeeding one another, together with the consonance of rhyme have also an equal number of letters, and as many letters are counted in the one verse as in the other. This they are wont to divide into the Simple and the Pictured, or Figured.

On the Simple Isogrammatic

The Simple [5] is that to which, beyond the rhyme and the equal number of letters, no further artifice is added. Of this sort there are many verses in Peter Riga, in his exposition of the book of Job, especially upon those words of the third chapter, Let the day perish wherein I was born [Job 3:3], which are expounded in these verses: [6]

> Let that day perish, which brought me forth to birth, ■
>
> Nor let that night behold the rising of the noble Dawn, ■ 34
>
> Let that night be heavy, nor worthy of the favor of praise, ■
> Let it stand sundered, far from the honor of the true light. ■ 36

If you count the letters of these verses, you will find in each verse of the former distich 34 letters, and in each verse of the latter distich 36 letters. [7]

On the Figured Isogrammatic

The Figured exposition [8] is that which, beyond the rhythmic consonances and the equal number of letters, adds yet another new artifice to the verse — of most curious subtlety and of immense labor and time. For by the arrangement and placement of the letters set within the verses it expresses various images of figures — such as angels, men, birds, quadrupeds, trees, crosses, rings, and other figures like these: which letters of the verses, marked out in red-lead [minium] or any other color, both form the figure and unfold the history and mystery of that same figure. The scholastic poets borrowed this invention — which may appear rather the vanity of men at play than of expositors — from Rabanus Maurus, bishop of Mainz, whose poem, elaborated with a like skill of industry, still survives, entitled On the Praises of the Holy Cross [De sanctae crucis laudibus]. From it we set before you the following example, expressed in the figure of a cross:

[The outer hexameters, read straight across (left + center + right), come out — where legible — as e.g.: "Arbor odore potens frondoso vertice nata" (A tree, mighty in fragrance, born on a leafy crown); "Hortus ditatus, & par cui nullus in orbe est" (An enriched garden, whose equal is nowhere in the world); "Floribus & folijs milleno germine dives" (Rich in flowers and leaves with a thousandfold seed); "Arbor sola tenens varios virtute colores" (A tree alone holding, by its power, colors of many kinds). The lines are contrived to force the letters of the central stripe, so several read stiffly.]

If you notice, all these verses consist of an equal number of letters; and, reading down through the middle of them, this verse is read:

> Forma sacrata crucis venerando fulget amictu.
>
> (The sacred form of the cross shines in venerable vesture.)

And again, while you move from right to left, this other:

> Magnus vestit honor, latus loquor hoc nationi.
> (A great honor clothes it; broadly I speak this to the nation.)

(Rich PDF p. 184 [printed folio 184]. A worked Example of a Scholastic Sermon (Robert, bishop of L'Aquila, on the Wrath of God, Eph 5:6) — with an embedded quaestio "whether there be wrath in God" and a closing jeremiad — then opens On Scholastic Meditation. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

An Example of a Sermon, or of a Scholastic Discourse

From Robert, bishop of L'Aquila [Roberto, episcopus Aquilanus]. A sermon on the wrath of God, upon that text, "The wrath of God cometh upon the sons of unbelief." Ephesians ch. 5. [1]

The wrath of God cometh upon the sons of unbelief: these are the words of the Doctor of the Gentiles [Paul], originally at Ephesians ch. 5, and in the epistle of the present Lord's day.

I have judged it the most effective remedy for sinners, that they may return to repentance, to set before their face beforehand the terribleness and horror of the wrath of God. For, as Augustine says in the 4th book On Christian Doctrine, the merciful, long-suffering of God makes very many unbelievers sin without fear, because they do not reckon God to be the avenger of their sins. [2] We therefore, wishing to provide against this danger, shall in the present sermon make our discourse on the wrath of God; and although to many who have an infected taste such words are grievous, yet to the humble and devout they will seem the medicine of languishing souls. For Augustine says (23, q. 4, ch. Piety itself): The physician is troublesome to the raging madman, and the father to the undisciplined son; yet not for that reason is medicine to be denied to the sick, nor discipline to be withdrawn from the son. To this we are called, that we may cry out, and reprove, and detest offenses, and proclaim the dread judgments of God — for by Isaiah, ch. 58, the Lord says: Cry aloud, cease not, lift up thy voice like a trumpet, and declare unto my people their crimes [Isa 58:1]. For the salvation, then, and the correction of sinners we speak securely of the wrath of God: concerning which three principal mysteries are to be contemplated. [3]

The first is called Contemptibility [the despising of it]. The second, Terribleness. The third, Nearness. But let the Virgin Mary first be saluted: Hail Mary, full of grace, etc.

The first mystery to be contemplated concerning the wrath of God is called Contemptibility. In which it is worth seeing why it is that many, when they hear men speak of the dread wrath of God, do not fear it, but rather, as experience teaches, despise it with laughter. And three principal reasons for this error can be gathered. [4]

The first is called [the reason] of foolish thinking. The second, of false opinion. The third, of long-continued expectation [i.e. delay].

The first reason why the wrath of God is not feared by many is called [that] of foolish thinking: because they suppose that in God there is no wrath. Concerning whom we ask, whether in God there is wrath? [5] Some argue that there is not — because no passion befalls God, but wrath is a certain passion; therefore it does not befall God. And they confirm their error: because every sin is to be removed from God, but wrath is one of the seven capital vices; therefore it is to be removed from God.

Nevertheless, against those who hold thus there are authorities and sayings, whether of Sacred Scripture or of the Gentile and moral philosophers. Whence Exodus 15: In the multitude of thy glory thou hast put down all our adversaries; thou didst send forth thy wrath, which devoured them [Exod 15:7]. [6] And in ch. 32, Moses, praying to God, says: Let thy wrath cease, and be appeasable over the wickedness of thy people [Exod 32:12]. [7] And 2 Kings 22: Great is the wrath of the Lord kindled against us [2 Kings 22:13]. [8] And Deuteronomy ch. 11: The Lord, being angry, shut up heaven, and the rains descend not [Deut 11:17], [9] and the rest that follow — divine testimonies of Scripture. And Valerius Maximus, book 1: For with slow step does the divine wrath proceed to its vengeance, and it compensates the slowness by the gravity of the punishment. [10] And Ovid, in the Art of Loving:

> An angry god is bent [appeased] by a beseeching voice.

And Augustine, book 18 On the City of God, ch. 12: For Delphic Apollo, musical games were instituted that his wrath might be appeased — the wrath by which they thought the regions of Greece were afflicted with barrenness, because they had not defended his temple, which king Danaus, when he had invaded those same lands, burned in war. And in book 1, as above, ch. 2, it is said of Juno, who was worshipped as a goddess among the Gentiles: For in Virgil, Juno is brought in as hostile to the Trojans, saying to Aeolus, king of the winds, to stir him up against them:

> A race hateful to me sails the Tyrrhenian sea, > carrying Ilium into Italy, and its vanquished household gods.

thus he. And the same Virgil relates, at the beginning of the 1st book of the Aeneid, that on account of the wrath of Juno Aeneas was made a fugitive with the rest of the Trojans, saying: [11]

> Arms and the man I sing, who first from the shores of Troy,
>
> an exile by fate, came to Italy and the Lavinian
>
> shores; much was he tossed both on lands and on the deep,
> by the force of the gods above, on account of the mindful wrath of savage Juno, etc.

For the solution, then, of the objections, three things are first to be noted — according to Bonaventure on the 3rd [book] of the Sentences, dist. 33, and Richard [of Middleton] on the 4th, dist. 26, and Thomas [Aquinas], part 1, q. 20: that whenever anything is said of God which in us denotes a passion, it is said of God according to the effect, and not according to the defect of passion. [12] Hatred therefore, love, wrath, and the like, which in us are passions, are said in God according to the effect as regards us: so that He is then said to hate, when He shows us the effect of hatred; then to be angry, when He displays to us the effect of wrath. But God Himself remains stable, without passion — and the rest that follow.

We say therefore that God, who is most merciful, without change of Himself, without passion, without sin, becomes angry when His own justice requires it, often trampling down sinners obstinate in [their] wrath when He shows them the effect of [His] wrath. Hence come wars, pestilences, tempests, hailstorms, barrenness of the earth, famines, earthquakes, terrors from heaven, and great signs. O presumptuous sinners, you have now heard that your opinion is false: for you were saying that God is not angry; and behold, so many proclamations of the Scriptures cry out that the wrath of God is to be feared by all — and not only to be feared, but that it is also most grievous and most near. O, if I could ascend into such a watchtower, from which I might behold all Italy, and all could hear my voice — truly I would cry out: O Italy, weep! O Italy, fear! O Italy, beware, lest on account of thy obstinacy the wrath of God rage against thee! He Himself has called thee for many years; He has endowed thee with ampler benefits; He has sent to thee His preachers; He has terrified thee with signs and prodigies; thou hast felt earthquakes, pestilences, and the barren state of the seasons; God has threatened thee. Thus surely He did this, that He might lead thee to repentance — and thou art made harder day by day in [thy] sins; and, persevering in malice, now everywhere public usury is practiced, all things are defiled with the filthiest vices of the flesh and with shameful Sodomy; the pride of pomps has now seized all cities and lands; blasphemy, perjuries against God, lies, injustices, violences, oppressions of the poor, and the like superabound. O comely Italy, O region full of riches! Do not despise God, do not exasperate His majesty. I exhort therefore all peoples that they cease from their evil way, lest perchance, if they persevere in it, the wrath and indignation of God suddenly come upon them — from which may He Himself free us, who is blessed and praiseworthy through the infinite ages of ages. Amen.

[continuing On Scholastic Meditation, from p201]

…read[ers] it is the more accommodated: it is occupied chiefly about the historical contemplation of the matter, setting before the eyes the things said and done in the past as if they were present; and, that it may make a greater impression on the mind, it represents to the imagination of the reader not only those things which are written in the divine letters and which certainly happened, but also those things which, according to the variety of places, persons, and times, could have happened concerning the matters narrated in the Holy Scriptures. Yet those who use this form of meditating advise that their thoughts be not so taken as things undoubtedly asserted and firmly defined, but as the pious and devout contemplations of the meditating mind.

But the Sublime kind of meditation, which is also called Mystical Theology, [1] and is known only to those who have been worn [practiced] in Scholastic theology, is occupied almost always in the anagogical explanation of the Scriptures. It contains certain abstruse and sublime thoughts, drawn from the inmost recesses of Scholastic theology and expressed in scholastic language — by which those men are chiefly moved, and are excited to admiration and love of the divine goodness, who have been consumed in scholastic studies by long exercise. Of both kinds the examples are these. [2]

An Example of a Lowly Meditation

From the Meditations on the Life of Christ of Ludolph the Carthusian [Ludolphus/Landulphus Carthusianus], upon the words of Matthew, ch. 2.

He withdrew into Egypt, and was there until the death of Herod, etc. [Matt 2:14–15]

They went, therefore — Mary and Joseph, with the child — to a certain city of Egypt which is called Heliopolis; and there, renting some little house, they dwelt for seven years as strangers and pilgrims, poor and needy. But here there occurs a beautiful, pious, and very compassionate meditation. For whence, and how, did they live for so long a time? Did they beg? But it is read of the Lady [Mary] that with distaff and needle she sought for herself the necessaries by [her] thread. She sewed, then, and spun — the Lady of the world, the lover of poverty. In every way these greatly loved poverty, and kept faith with it perfectly unto death. But did she go about through the houses asking for cloth, and other things on which she might work? For this had to become known through the neighborhood; otherwise she would have sat idle from such works, because those women could not divine [guess her need]. But also, when Jesus began to be five years old, or thereabouts — did not He too carry His mother's errands, seeking for her those things on which she could work? For she had no other squire [attendant]. And did He not carry back the finished works, asking on His mother's behalf the payment and the price? Was not the boy Jesus, the Son of the most high God, made to blush at such things — and the mother too, in sending Him? But what if sometimes, when He had delivered the work and asked the price, some proud, quarrelsome, and talkative woman answered insultingly, took the finished work, drove Him out without payment, and so He returned home empty? O how many and how great are the injuries done to strangers — which the Lord came not to avoid, but to undergo! What also, if sometimes, returning home and suffering hunger, after the manner of children He asked for bread, and the mother had nothing whence to give it? Were not her inward parts shaken at these and similar such things? She consoled her son with words, and provided by work as she could, and perhaps sometimes withheld from her own food to reserve it for the son. And if it was necessary to seek food from the work of the hands, what shall we say of clothing? What of the utensils — namely beds, and other things needful within the house? Did she have double sets? did she have superfluous ones? did she have curious [fancy] ones? These are against poverty; and even if she could have had them, she, the lover of poverty, would not have wished them. But did the Lady, in sewing or doing other works, make curious [fancy] works after the manner of certain women? Far be it — for this is dangerous, and a very great fault. Behold, then, now the Lady, busy in her labors and works — spinning, cutting, sewing, weaving — how she does them faithfully and humbly, with diligence, and nonetheless keeps the governance over her son and her house, and, according to her power, always attends to vigils and prayers, and to have compassion on Him with all her affection. And consider that she, the Lady of the kingdom, did not have the kingdom of God altogether for free. But holy Joseph too, the carpenter [worker in wood], himself works something in the craft of wood.

Whence, since matter for compassion presents itself, at last, when you have spent some delay with them, ask leave to depart; and, having received a blessing — first from the boy Jesus, then from the mother, afterward from Joseph, with knees bent — with tears and great compassion bid them farewell: for like exiles from their fatherland without any cause, and banished men, they remain to sojourn there for seven years, destined to live in the sweat of their brow, etc.

These things Ludolph [takes] from St. Bonaventure, who in his book of Meditations on the Life of Christ, ch. 14, admonishing the reader not to despise the humility of meditations of this kind, thus writes: These things, and things like these, in this place concerning the exile of the boy Jesus you can meditate; and become a little one with the little one Jesus, nor lightly esteem such humble things, and to meditate about Him in things which seem childish. For they seem to give devotion, to increase love, to kindle fervor, to induce compassion, to confer purity and simplicity, to nourish and preserve the vigor of humility and poverty, to make familiarity and conformity, and to lift up hope. For to ascend to sublime things we are not able; but that which is foolish of God is wiser than men, and that which is weak, is mightier [1 Cor 1:25]. The meditation of such things seems also to take away pride, to enervate cupidity, and to confound curiosity. You see how many good things come thence? Be therefore, as I said, a little one with the little one, that you may grow with Him as He grows, and follow Him whithersoever He goes, and gaze upon His face always. Thus he.

The ancient expositors seem not to have shrunk from this form of explaining — especially those more eloquent ones, whose chief care was to bring in a clearer and more delightful elucidation of the divine scripture, [feigning], according to the laws of the Rhetoricians, certain sayings or deeds which — according to the diversity of the characters described in the sacred letters — might seem able to have been said or done. Among these, Philo the Jew, wonderfully delighted with the composition of this kind of explanation, very often fashioned little speeches of various kinds, put forth in the person of those whose virtues or vices he especially strove to express. Of these we have decided to set down one here for the sake of example, that from the comparison of it it may appear what likeness, and what difference, there is between the artifice of the ancient Rhetoricians and of the recent scholastics.

An Example of a Rhetorical Meditation

From the book of Philo the Jew, On the Life of the Civil Man, upon that [text] of Genesis 37: They took Joseph's tunic; which when the father had seen, he said: "It is my son's tunic; a most wicked beast hath devoured him"; and, rending his garments, he mourned for a long time. [Gen 37:31–33] [1]

But when it was brought to the father — not what was true (that the son had been sold), but that fabrication about his being consumed by beasts — the news struck his ears, and at the same time the spectacle struck his eyes; for the tunic had been brought torn, and foully bloodied. Troubled with grief, he was struck dumb for a long space of time, not even able to lift his head, overwhelmed by so great a calamity. At last, suddenly bursting into tears which poured out as from a fountain, he beat his breast and, tearing his face, rending his garments [cried]: Not so much do I grieve for thy death, my son, as for the loss of a tomb. For if a tomb had befallen thee in thine own land, and consolation were not lacking to me, I would dutifully have sat by thee, sick, before death; I would have bestowed the last kisses on thee, dying; I would have closed thine eyes; I would have bathed thee, dead, with tears; I would have borne thee out magnificently; I would have omitted nothing of the just funeral rites. And even if thou hadst died abroad, I would have said to myself: The debt of nature has been paid, grieve not. The living have their own fatherlands; of the dead, all the earth is a tomb; all men are of brief span — for he who was most long-lived, how little time did he live, if you compare it to eternity? Or, if thou wert altogether slain by violence and treachery, it would have been a lighter thing to be destroyed by the hands of men who at least, pitying the dead, would have covered him with earth and entombed the corpse — or, [even] had they been most cruel, what more could they have done than to cast him out unburied? Whom soon some passing traveler, mindful of the common nature and touched by mercy, would have buried. But now, as it is reported, thou hast fed the savage and carnivorous beasts, and hast glutted them with my [own] bowels. Hitherto I have drained many unlooked-for labors; in these miseries I am abundantly practiced — wandering, sojourning, serving for hire, bearing hard commands, harassed even to the peril of life by those from whom I least ought [to have suffered it]. Many things I have seen, many I have heard, many grievous things I have suffered, by which, schooled to patience, I have endured. But nothing is more intolerable than the present chance, which has overturned and cast down all the strength of my mind: for what mourning can be greater, or more miserable? The boy's garment has been brought to the father — of him[self] not a limb, not a fragment, not even the least remnant: the beasts have devoured the whole; nothing is left to be carried to the tomb; nor have I even received a garment, save that at the sight of it the memory of grief may break out afresh, that never can forgetfulness of so great a calamity creep in. Thus did he bewail his lot.

An Example of a Sublime Meditation

On that saying of Exodus, ch. 3, "I am who I am," from the meditations of Denis the Carthusian [Dionysius Carthusianus]. [2]

O Being [Ens], in every genus of beings the first and the supreme — uncreated Being, uncaused, fountal Being, in the highest degree simple, most sincere [pure], formally infinite, and totally perfect: to Thee alone truly, fully, and properly does it belong to be in a perpetual and unfailing eternity. Whence, to Moses asking what Thy name was, Thou rightly didst answer, I AM WHO I AM. Truly, O superblessed, O infinite and uncircumscribed Being, Thy being — like an immense sea flowing into itself — comprehends in itself most eminently all the perfection and eminence of every being; and to all beings it grants to each its own being and existence. Thou, O most superglorious fountal Being, dost so subsist, pure in Thy purity and immense simplicity, that nothing of the imperfect is mingled to Thee: Thou art [Thy] being, and the same is [Thy] essence, nor is there any difference of the two in Thee. Thou who art ideal Being, subsisting through Thyself, first, one, and altogether simple. So great is the excellence of Thy most-praiseworthy being that created essence, compared with it, is as though it were utterly nothing and empty, and our subsistence is as a most vain shadow that passes away. Thou who art always the same Thyself, O final Being, into whom all beings are finally resolved — [beings] led by Thee from non-being to being — fulfill the imperfect [portion] of our entity, take from us the non-being of our defects, pour into us the true being of Thy grace: that after this mortal being shall have been laid aside by us, we may rest in the beatific object of Thine essence — to whom [be] praise and glory. Amen.

On Pandesia. Method 24.

Pandesia, or the Pandesian Method, [3] is the broadest and most copious elucidation of the divine scripture — gathering, either from all or from the principal Methods of exposition, the more powerful and the best of each into one most-enriched body of explanation, not without keen judgment: in which nothing is omitted that could contribute to a whole, perspicuous, and most-rich knowledge, examination, proof, and adornment of the matter to be explained — [resources] summoned from everywhere, out of every variety of tongues, disciplines, and arts, with their riches and ornaments, to illustrate, adorn, and amplify the dignity of the matter to be explained. Now we have chosen to call an exposition of this kind Pandesia, because it is like a common banquet, prepared with the parts of each publicly contributed, and furnished with so great an abundance and variety of foods of every kind that nothing in it could be desired to fill up the pleasure of all the senses: for such a banquet is called by the Greeks Πανδεσία. There seem in a certain way to have approached the amplitude of this [kind of] explanation those things which St. Augustine, explaining the first three chapters of Genesis, gathered together in ten homilies and in twenty books — overflowing with the most affluent abundance of all divine things. An example of the present Method the ingenious reader will be able to prepare for himself out of all the Methods already described, drawn together into one.

Peroration

These things concerning the Methods of explaining the sacred letters — written out by no one before us — we have, after our fashion, comprehended in this third book of the Holy Library. In which, if you should perhaps find any formulas of explanation set forth superfluously, or explained with superfluous words, or at greater length than you would have wished, in demonstrations and examples — know, friendly reader, that we have expended this kind of labor not only for the learned and practiced, but also for the unlearned, and especially for beginners [tyros], to whom very many things in this kind would be unknown and utterly unheard of, which to you, perhaps, and to others like you, have long since been clearer than the noonday light. Therefore take in good part whatever has been sweated out by us in this matter; and embrace with willing mind at least this our attempt, if not the thing itself, receiving with a cheerful brow the following judgment, which — as the final colophon [coronis] of this book — we append for you concerning the catholic expositors of the divine volumes.

Which Expositors of Divine Scripture the Students of Sacred Letters Ought to Choose Above the Rest, and to Provide for Themselves

The Judgment of Friar Sixtus of Siena

When once I was reading the Parerga Iuris [Legal Byways], written by Andrea Alciato, the prince of the jurisconsults of our age, among other things I found his Judgment concerning the greatest interpreters of the civil laws — that is, concerning the usefulness which each one could obtain from the principal expositors of the laws. This he had pronounced in these verses, approved by the assent of all the learned:

In law, compared with the rest, the first place Bartolus will hold.

For his frequent [use in] cases, the forensic [practitioner] upholds Baldus.

By no means to be neglected, most of all by beginners, is the exposition of Castrensis [Paulus de Castro].

The Clashing-Rocks [Symplegades] of opinions the more safely wilt thou overcome, with Alexander [Tartagni] for [thy] guide.

For [good] order, and by the name of light [clarity],

Jason [de Mayno] is to be consulted by those in haste.

But if anyone add other interpreters to these,

he more truly burdens than honors [them].

Let it be permitted me too — whatever sort I myself may be — by the example of this most illustrious man to pass judgment on the chief interpreters of the divine laws and of the Holy Scriptures: not upon their doctrine (for this I, a manikin of the lowest class, ought not to dare), but upon the fruit which each one can gather, the greater, from their writings. All these things having been weighed with what diligence we could, we think it can rightly be done in this manner:

History, drawn from the Hebrew and Greek fountains, thou shalt learn, with Jerome for [thy] guide.

Allegories, and the Anagogical [sense], will unlock Origen [and] Ambrose.

Senses fit for the forming of morals will expound

Chrysostom [and] Gregory.

In doubtful matters, and in places sunk in deep darkness,

Aurelius [Augustine] will bring light.

But the brief and easy exposition of the Lyran [Nicholas of Lyra] is not to be scorned by the beginner.

The Titles of the Whole Art of Expounding the Sacred Volumes, Explained in the Holy [Third] Book

The art of expounding the sacred volumes has three parts — the Definitive, the Inventive, and the Dispositive. Of which:

- The Definitive is that which describes the senses and expositions of divine Scripture. Now, of divine scripture there are:
- Two senses, namely:
- Literal, which is twofold:
- Proper
- Metaphorical
- Mystical, which is threefold:
- Moral
- Allegorical
- Anagogical
- Two kinds of exposition, namely:
- Universal, which is fourfold:
- Historical
- Moral
- Allegorical
- Anagogical
- Particular, which is threefold:
- Elemental
- Physical
- Prophetic
- The Inventive is that which teaches to inquire into and to find the senses of divine scripture already described; whose species are:
- Tropical
- Topical
- Chronological
- Physical
- Mathematical
- Ethical

• The Dispositive, or Methodical, is that which reduces the found expositions of the senses into various Methods — of which the principal are these ———

Which you see noted on the immediately following page.

English translation — Bibliotheca Sancta, Book IV

Note on the Latin sources. This English version is drawn from two copies of Sixtus's Bibliotheca Sancta. The front matter and pages 6–108 were translated from the 1586 Cologne edition (Maternus Cholinus), which carries few marginal notes; the marginal glosses were then supplied from a second, more heavily annotated copy of the same work. From page 109 onward the translation is made directly from that margin-rich copy. The printed leaf- and page-numbers in both copies are frequently misprinted, so pages are aligned by content and scan sequence rather than by the printed folios.

F. Sixtus of Siena, of the Order of Preachers — On the Catholic Expositors of the Divine Volumes. The Holy Library, Book Four.

Preface

The Third book of our Library set forth the art of expounding the sacred letters, and all the modes of explaining the sacred volumes familiar to the divine expositors. The Fourth book, which we now arrange according to the alphabetical order of the letters, comprehends — of all the Catholic expositors, both extant and not extant, who from the three-hundredth year before Christ down to this day have expounded the divine volumes — their names, surnames, family, dignities [offices], dates, the number and variety of their commentaries, their language, style, kind of exposition, and method of expounding, together with the judgments of illustrious men upon the writings of most of the noble expositors. To these, as by way of appendix, there will follow at the end of the volume a Catalogue of the Hebrew expositors, who explained in Hebrew the Hebrew scriptures of the Old Testament; and likewise a brief admonition concerning the causes of false ascriptions [of titles], and by what conjectures their falsity may be detected.

All which things we have gathered both from the most approved authors of Ecclesiastical History — Eusebius, Theodoret, Socrates, Sozomen, Evagrius, Zonaras, and Nicephorus — and from those who published Catalogues of the illustrious writers of the church, among whom we have chiefly followed Jerome, Gennadius, Isidore, Honorius, Sigebert, Notger, and Trithemius. [1] The rest we have supplied as best we could from the various Libraries [catalogs] of Italy, Gaul, Spain, and Greece, which — partly through friends, partly through ourselves, having undertaken many journeys through Italy and Gaul — we have surveyed, not without great labor. [2]

But lest anyone wonder, or impute it to me as a fault, that in this volume I have omitted very many works of various kinds written by Catholic expositors, let him know that this alone was my care: that I should gather only the exegetical writings which the Orthodox explainers had expressly destined for the explanation of the holy volumes chiefly — but should omit the rest, which had flowed from them on other occasions and toward other ends, as it were "exoteric." Not indeed that I would defraud those most excellent men of any part of their labors (from whom, being brighter than the light of the Sun, my silence can take nothing away, nor can my speech add anything), but because the plan of the present work admitted only those things which pertain to the interpretative kind of writing. Moreover, we have deferred the censures and corrections which the noble fathers of the church [made] upon the various commentaries of the more illustrious expositors to the next following book, lest the size of the present volume should grow more than is fair — [the present volume] which we now begin from the first letter of the Alphabet.

A

The Abbot of Vercelli [Abbas Vercellensis], whose name I have not yet been able to find — a man (as his Paraphrase on Dionysius the Areopagite shows) of the highest erudition and religion — composed expositions on the Song of Songs of Solomon, of a style not to be despised, in which he insisted chiefly upon the anagogical sense, taking the likeness of the supreme created love which is in the seraphic spirits, to whose sublimity he strove to raise the soul, and in a certain way to transform it into God. John Gerson mentions this work in the preface of his commentaries on the Song of Songs. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1400.

Abbo of Fleury [Abbo Floriacensis], abbot of the monastery [of Fleury], wrote homilies on the Gospels. He lived in the year 1000.

Acacius — whom, because he was one-eyed, they used to call Μονόφθαλμον, that is, "One-eyed" — bishop of the church of Caesarea in Palestine, disciple of Eusebius bishop of Caesarea and his successor in the bishopric; a man exercised in the divine scriptures, but perverted by the Arian impiety. He flourished so greatly under the Emperor Constantius, that [→ p208: ut in…]

…that he set up at Rome, in the place of Liberius, Felix the Arian as bishop. He elaborated, upon various passages of Divine Scripture, [a work] of συλλεκτῶν ζητημάτων — that is, a Volume of Selected Questions — from which many fragments are preserved in the Greek Catena of explanations on Genesis; and Jerome mentions this work in his epistle to Minerius and Alexander. He also composed seventeen volumes of commentaries on Ecclesiastes. I would not have listed him, had not Jerome done so before me. He flourished in the year of the Lord 350. His acts are written in the fifth book of the Tripartite History.

There are weighty Theologians who deny that this Felix was an Arian — although before his Pontificate he communicated with the Arians, whom, after he was made Pontiff [Pope], he detested, and was therefore killed by them, or at least sent into exile. See Rufinus, book 10 of the History, ch. 22; Theodoret, book 2 of the History, ch. 17; and Sozomen, book 4 of the History, ch. 10 and 14.

Adam Sasbout, of the Order of Minors [Franciscans], who for many years publicly professed the Sacred letters in the University of Louvain, published a succinct exposition on Isaiah, and on all the Pauline epistles, gathered from all the Orthodox fathers, both Greek and Latin, in which he confuted many errors of the heretics. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1540. [1]

Adam of Barking [Adamus Barkingensis], an Englishman, a monk of Clairvaux, wrote commentaries on the 4 Gospels. He lived in the year of the Lord 1216.

Adam Marsh [Adamus de Marisco], an Englishman, wrote an Elucidarium of Scripture. He flourished in the year 1260.

Adam Wodeham [Adamus Wodeham], of the Order of Minors, disciple of William of Occam, wrote commentaries on the Song of Songs, and a Postil on Ecclesiastes. He died in the year of the Lord 1358.

Adomnán [Adamannus], Presbyter and Abbot of the monks dwelling on the island of Hy [Iona], beyond Britain, wrote to Aldfrid, king of the English, a book on the holy places — most useful for the understanding of the whole scripture — which he gathered from the conversations of Arculf, a bishop of Gaul, who had surveyed all the holy land with his own eyes. He flourished under Justinian the Younger, Augustus, in the year of the Lord 690. This Adomnán, by surname Colodius, was by nation a Scot [Irishman], a man especially learned, from whose writings Bede borrowed not a few things.

Ailred [Adilredus / Aelred], abbot of a certain Cistercian monastery, studious of the Holy scriptures and not ignorant of secular philosophy, wrote many little works for the benefit of his brethren; among the rest, one homily on the boy Jesus at twelve years old, on the second chapter of Luke, which begins, When Jesus was twelve years old, and is found among the works of Bernard. He flourished under Henry the Sixth, in the year of the Lord 1200.

Giles [of Rome] [Aegidius], Archbishop of Bourges, by fatherland a Roman, of the illustrious family Colonna, once Prior General of the Order of Hermits [Augustinians], disciple of St. Thomas Aquinas, a man most learned in the divine scriptures, and in Aristotelian Philosophy second to none in his time, of subtle intellect, scholastic in speech, and — for the constancy of his doctrine — one who obtained the surname of the Most-Founded [Doctor Fundatissimus]. He wrote on the sacred letters many excellent explanations, of which are reported:

- On the Hexameron, two books, filled with a multitude of scholastic questions, which we have read, printed for the first time at Venice in recent years; their beginning is, Since [it is] concerning the works of the six days.
- Likewise, on the Song of Songs, a Scholastic Lecture, distinguished into nineteen lections, which begins, Let thy voice sound, etc., at the head of each book.
- On the Epistle to the Romans, a Lecture of 53 lections. [beginning] Enoch pleased God.
- On the Ave Maria, a little work.

He flourished under the Emperor Rudolph [of Habsburg], in the year of the Lord 1280.

Giles Faber [Aegidius Faber], of Brussels, a Carmelite, Doctor of Louvain, wrote Commentaries on Ruth, Job, and on the Epistle of St. Paul to the Romans. He died at Brussels in 1506.

Giles Topiarius [Aegidius Topianus] wrote discourses on the Gospels and epistles which are wont to be set forth during Lent, and on the Gospels and epistles of the whole year. He flourished under the Emperor Ferdinand.

Aelius — see Antonio of Nebrija [Antonius Nebrissensis].

Agathius of Guidiacum [Agathius Guidiacensis, or Guidacenus], royal professor of sacred Theology in the original languages, wrote commentaries on the first twenty-four Psalms of David, in which he especially examines the Hebrew text of the Psalms. The same [author] embraced the Song of Songs in a succinct explanation. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1540.

Agrippa, by surname Castor, a very learned man, wrote, under Antoninus Pius, against the 24 volumes which the heretic Basilides had composed on the gospel — very eloquent books, in which he most strongly refuted the insane blasphemies of Basilides. He flourished in the year of the Lord 160.

Aidan [Aidanus Auinius], a Scot [Irishman], bishop of Lindisfarne, wrote commentaries on the Scriptures. He died in the year of the Lord 651.

Alalphus, or Alulf of Tournai [Alulphus Tornacensis], a Benedictine monk, gathered from the works of St. Gregory a work of Excerpts on the New Testament, which is entitled the Gregorianum.

Alan Cope [Alanus Copus], an Englishman, wrote a Syntaxis of the Gospel History, in which the deeds of our Lord Jesus Christ are narrated in the order in which they were done. The book was printed at Louvain in 1572. He flourished under Maximilian II, Emperor, and departed from the living at Rome.

Alan of Lille [Alanus Insulensis], a German [of the Low Countries] — orator, poet, Philosopher, and Theologian, the most excellent of all of his time, moderator [head] of the sacred University of Paris, who, on account of his erudition in all things of every kind, earned the surname of the Universal Doctor [Doctor Universalis] — left, among the many illustrious monuments of his labors:

- Five books of Commentaries on the whole Pentateuch.
- Likewise, on the Song of Songs, one book, whose beginning is, Many, for adorning.

• But also [he embraced] both Testaments in a small compendium, which [is entitled] The Eye of Sacred Scrip[ture]… [→ p209: -ture]

[1] The commentaries of this author on all the epistles of St. Paul are not extant.

…entitled The Eye of Sacred Scripture, he touched upon [in brief]; its exordium is, To the most reverend father and lord. He flourished under the Emperor Albert, in the year of the Lord 1300.

Alan of Lynn [Alanus de Linna], an Englishman, a Carmelite, wrote On the Various Sense of Scripture, 1 book; and Morals of the Bible [Moralia Bibliorum], 1 book. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1420.

Alan de la Roche [Alanus Rupensis], a German, of the Order of Preachers [Dominicans] — a man learned in the divine scriptures, excellent in sacred declamations, venerable in life and conversation, and a chief lover of the Blessed Mary ever-virgin, and also the restorer and promoter of that confraternity which, under the name of the Rosary, is dedicated to the holy virgin — wrote one book on the Song of Songs, in which he most becomingly fitted the individual words of Solomon to the Virgin Mary and to Christ her son, as conversing with each other in turn. He flourished under the Emperor Frederick III, and died in the year of the Lord 1474.

Alard of Amsterdam [Alardus Amstelredamus], by nation a Hollander — whose celebrated book of Sacred Parallels [Sacrorum similium] survives, gathered from the orthodox fathers, and another, On the Miracles Wrought through the Venerable Eucharist — gathered from all the catholic doctors all the tropes, phrases, idioms, and various figures of speech used in the divine scriptures, and arranged them most fittingly into a single volume according to the Alphabetical order. He also expounded Ecclesiastes according to all the topics [loci] of Rudolph Agricola. He flourished under Charles V, Augustus, in 1538.

Albert [son] of John, of Haarlem [Albertus Ioannis Harlemensis], a Carmelite, Doctor of Louvain, wrote a Lecture on Ecclesiasticus, 1 book, and on the first Canonical [epistle] of John, 1 book. He died at Mechlin in the year of the Lord 1496.

Albert Novocampianus wrote a Biblical Scope [Scopus Biblicus] of the Old and New Testament, with Annotations embracing the Sum of Christian doctrine; Lazarus Andreas printed it at Cracow in the year of the Lord 1552.

Albert the Great [Albertus Magnus], Archbishop of Regensburg, of the Order of Preachers, by nation a Swabian, from the town of Lauingen — a man of admirable erudition, from whom few things of divine matters, and perhaps none of human, lay hidden, excelling by the sublime powers of his intellect and memory even to a miracle, by far the most learned in divine studies, and the prince of all the philosophers whom all Germany brought forth either before or after him. On account of the exceeding multitude and greatness of his sciences, he obtained before his death the surname of the Great [Magni] — which never befell any of the learned. For many years he taught Peripatetic Philosophy and Scholastic Theology in the most flourishing Universities of Paris and Cologne [Agrippina]; in which, among other excellent hearers, he had as his disciple Thomas Aquinas, of divine natural gift and most excellent intellect. Then, called — nay, almost unwilling — to the Archbishopric of the Church of Regensburg by the Emperor Rudolph, and drawn thither by the Supreme Pontiff Urban IV, when he had magnificently presided over it for some years, he was recalled again, by the most grateful recollection of his old studies, to the former exercises of letters; and he freely resigned the care of the Church. [1] Having cast off the Episcopal dignity, he returned as a private man to his monastery at Cologne, where he most happily passed what remained of his life — reading, writing, teaching, and serving God day and night — departing from human affairs in the 81st year of his age; and he was buried in the middle of the choir of his Dominican church, in the reign of the Emperor Rudolph, in the year from the redemption of the world 1280. Of his innumerable works upon the whole of divine scripture, heaped up in the scholastic kind of explanation, I have seen only these, namely:

- On the Twelve Prophets, 12 books. [beginning] The bones of the twelve Prophets.
- On Matthew, one book. [beginning] Take thee a great book.
- On Mark, one book. [beginning] Behold, the lion of the tribe of Judah has prevailed.
- On Luke, one book. [beginning] Where very many harvests appear.
- On John, one book. [beginning] A great eagle of great wings.
- On [The angel] was sent [the Annunciation, Luke 1], one book.
- On the Magnificat, one book.

Albert of Padua [Albertus Patauinus], a Hermit [Augustinian], disciple of Giles of Rome, that most excellent doctor — exquisitely learned in both sacred and profane letters, and most celebrated in the office of preaching — wrote these things, namely:

- Of Commentaries on the Pentateuch, in the scholastic manner, five books, filled with an unpolished medley of sacred authorities.
- On the four Gospels, four books.
- On all the epistles of Paul, fourteen books.
- A huge volume of Lenten sermons on the 42 stations [from Exodus] and on the daily gospels.

He lived in the times of the Emperor Albert, in the year of the Lord 1300.

Albert, Patriarch of Jerusalem [Albertus, Patriarcha Hierosolymitanus], a man of admirable sanctity and doctrine, who — by the command of Pope Innocent III of that name — gave to the Carmelite brothers, still dwelling in the holy land, a form and rule of living; he wrote commentaries, not to be despised, on the site and condition of the Holy Land. He flourished under the Emperor Henry VI, in the year of the Lord 1190.

Albert of Siegburg [Albertus Sigebergensis], a monk, [wrote] a Glossary of the Old and New Testament.

Albinus Flaccus, by surname Alcuin [Alcuinus] — monk, deacon, and abbot of the monastery of St. Martin of Tours, by nation an Englishman, a hearer of Bede the Presbyter, a man most celebrated in his time in every kind of the sciences, and the teacher of Charlemagne [Charles the Great] Augustus — wrote on the sacred letters the volumes written below:

- To Sigulf the Presbyter, a brief little commentary on Genesis — of a compiled exposition from the opinions of the fathers, arranged by question and answer in a simple and historical narration; whose beginning is, To my most beloved brother in Christ, Sigulf.
- On the fifteen Songs of Degrees — that is, from Psalm 119 to 133 [Vulgate] — of moral annota[tions] [→ p210: -tions]

[1] Albert the Great resigned his bishopric, that he might close his last day in the Order of St. Dominic.

[Alcuin, continued from p209:]

…a brief commentary [of moral annotations on the Gradual Psalms], which begins, They are steps [degrees].

• On the seven Penitential Psalms, according to the moral sense, succinct, pointed, and wonderfully expressive annotations, whose beginning is, The Title of the Psalm.

• On Ecclesiastes, to Ozias and Candidus, one book.

• On the Song of Songs, one book.

• On the gospel of John, seven books of commentaries of succinct and lucid brevity.

• On all the epistles of Paul, fourteen books.

• On the Apocalypse, one book.

He also gathered, and reduced into order at the command of Charlemagne, the homilies of the most excellent doctors of the church on the gospels which throughout the year are read publicly in the churches. And these are: of Augustine 48, of Jerome 6, of Ambrose 10, of Hilary 1, of Fulgentius 2, of Origen 4, of Maximus 17, of Chrysostom 11, of Severian 1, of Leo 21, of Gregory 39, of Bede 48, of Isidore 1 — the sum of all the homilies, 209. But those which are inscribed under the title of Hilary, Ambrose, Jerome, and sometimes Bede are not homilies, but centos of explanations sewn together out of the commentaries of these authors; and in this volume they are numbered among the ancient homilies. He flourished under Charlemagne, Augustus, in the year of the Lord 770.

Aldhelm [Aldelmus], an Englishman, gathered the flowers of both Testaments, 2 books. He flourished in the year of the Lord 709.

Alexander, bishop of Cappadocia and martyr, a man eminent in sanctity and in the erudition of the sacred letters, left among other monuments of his genius a commentary on the epistle to the Galatians, from which Jerome confesses that he derived some things into his own commentaries on the same epistle. In the seventh persecution under Decius — at which time Babylas suffered at Antioch — he was led to Caesarea and shut up in prison; for the confession of Christ he was crowned with martyrdom, in the year of the Lord 255.

Alexander, bishop of Chester [Cestriensis], wrote a Scholastic Postil on all the Psalms, in the year of the Lord 1238.

Alexander Seton, a Scot, wrote on both epistles of St. Peter, on the epistle of St. James, and on chapter 18 of Acts. He lived in the year 1541.

Alexander Wendock, bishop of Chester, wrote a Postil on the Psalter, 1 book; Sermons and Lectures, 2 books. He lived in the year of the Lord 1238.

Alexander of Villedieu [Alexander Villadeus], by fatherland of Dôle, a Franciscan — easily the chief poet of the Leonine verse which was once in esteem, whose work still survives, entitled the Doctrinale, once used by boys in the grammar schools for grasping the rudiments of Grammar — composed on the Acts of the Apostles a Scholastic Postil in Leonine hexameters, which begins:

If thou wouldst know the transacted Apostolic deeds,

This Postil shall handle those for thee in verses.

He also wrote, for the convenience of those who wish to commit to memory and retain the sum of the divine volumes, a most brief and compressed little compendium of the whole divine scripture, tightly enclosed in two hundred and twelve hexameter verses, in which the individual words comprehend the individual chapters of the holy books. And that the words of these verses might be more plainly understood, he inscribed over each of them the number of the chapter contained in it, with some interlinear glosses of smaller character beneath, which indicate the meaning of each word — thus [for Genesis 1–7]:

Six. He-forbids. They-sin. Abel. Enoch. And-the-ark-is-made. They-enter.

(glossed: 1 the days; 2 the tree of life; 3 the first parents; 4 [Abel] is slain; 5 [Enoch] is translated; 6 by Noah; 7 into the ark.)

He flourished under Frederick II, Emperor, in the year of the Lord 1240.

Alexander [of Hales], from the town of Hales, which is on the island of Britain, a professor of the Franciscan religion, teacher of the cardinal St. Bonaventure, a public doctor of Theology in the University of Paris — who attained in the Scholastic arts and in the knowledge of the divine sciences so great a name and glory that he deserved to be called by the most learned of his time the Fountain of Life [1] — besides that noble Summa of Theology which he composed at the command of Pope Innocent IV, illustrated both sacred Testaments with various annotations here and there, like little stars, which work he himself entitled a Postil upon the Whole Bible. He flourished under Frederick II, in the year of the Lord 1240.

Alexander Neckam [Nechan], an Englishman, wrote a Postil on the Song of Songs, 6 books; on Ecclesiastes, 2 books; on the Proverbs of Solomon, 1 book; and on Ezekiel. In the year of the Lord 1210.

Alphonsus de Castro [à Castro], of Zamora, a Spaniard, of the Order of Minors [Franciscans] — a man of keen intellect and a most fierce enemy of the heretics, against whom he also wrote several volumes — expounded some Psalms, and in particular published on the thirty-first Psalm one book, and likewise on Psalm 50, one book, in the year of the Lord 1546.

Alphonsus Martinez, of Baetica [Andalusia], of the Order of Preachers [Dominicans], published a censure [expurgatory index] of the Bibles under the name of the Holy Inquisition against the heretics, in the year of the Lord 1558.

Alphonsus Tostatus [Alonso Tostado], bishop of Ávila [Abulensis], by nation a Spaniard, from the town of Madrigal — a man the most learned of his time among all the professors of Scholastic Theology in the University of Salamanca, most skilled in the divine scriptures by long and continual exercise, and unwearied (nay, almost adamantine) in constant vigils and in the gravest labors of reading, teaching, and writing — elaborated on both Testaments volumes of immense size; in which, after the simple and historical exposition of the letter, which alone he pursu[ed] [→ p211: -ed]

[1] Alexander of Hales was called the Fountain of Life.

…pursued [alone], he heaped up so many and so great piles of Scholastic disputations that frequently, in the explanation of one single brief chapter, he brought forward above one hundred and seventy Scholastic questions, answering the various opinions upon that same chapter — always inquiring into some new and different difficulty upon each, even the smallest, particle of divine scripture. Of how great a bulk the load of these volumes once was, his commentaries on Matthew are an indication: which, when Peter Ximenes, a Spaniard, bishop of Coria [Cauriensis], his hearer and disciple, attempted to reduce into a small compendium that would contain only a fifth part of them, he yet could not so compress them but that the work abridged by him still remained huge and vast — for it comprises one thousand and twenty pages of the largest folio (which they call Royal), printed in small and tight characters. His other commentaries too, abridged with like zeal by various writers, extend into many and large volumes; of which these alone have come to my knowledge:

- On the five volumes of Moses [the Pentateuch], five books; [beginning] For it is a most lofty task.
- On Joshua, one book; Of the Sacred Scriptures.
- On Judges, one book; This book which we…

- On Ruth, one book; Here begins the book of Ruth.
- On the [books of] Kings, four books; Of temporal events.
- On Paralipomenon [Chronicles], two books; A great [part] now having been run through.
- On Matthew, twenty-five books; The ancients being for the most part explained.

He flourished in the times of the Council of Basel and of Pope Eugene IV, in the year of the Lord 1440.

Francisco Fontana [Franciscus Fontanus], born in the town of Llerena [Erena] in Spain, a canon of Alcalá [Complutensis], published an Index to all the aforesaid works [of Tostatus], contained in two large volumes, in which he most laboriously embraced everything pertaining either to Sacred Scripture or to the various erudition of man.

Aloysius Lippomanus [Luigi Lippomano], a Venetian, bishop first of Modon [Methone] and afterward of Verona — from boyhood instructed in all the best arts, and throughout his whole life engaged in the assiduous reading of the doctors of the church, both Greek and Latin — gathered, among many indefatigable labors of his genius, upon the whole book of Genesis a huge and most-enriched volume of explanations. In which, emulating the zeal of St. Thomas Aquinas, he wove together — for the convenience of those who have neither leisure nor means to turn over the countless and immense volumes of the fathers — a catena of expositions on the book of Genesis, drawn from authors both Latin and Greek, both ancient and more recent, succeeding one another according to the order of time, with his own not-to-be-despised annotations also inserted. He arranged the whole medley of the work in a most fitting order in this manner: First he set the explanations of the fathers which help toward understanding the obscure senses of the letter, the Hebrew and Greek copies being brought forward together with the Chaldaic [Targum] edition. Then, under the name of one mystical explanation, he gathered whatever pertains to the other three senses of divine scripture — namely the Allegorical, the Tropological, and the Anagogical — omitting, however, those long digressions by which the fathers are wont to wander off, whether to the disputation of difficult matters or to the instruction of morals, lest the volume, growing to an immense size, should breed weariness in the readers. He also cited everywhere not only the names of the authors from whom he gathered the opinions and words of the exposition, but faithfully noted the books, and the individual chapters of the books — with certain exceptions, whose opinions he took from the Greek catena of the Vatican Library, in which, the titles of the books being omitted, only the sayings of the ancient authors are read, with their names prefixed. He also happily completed the same labor upon the book of Exodus, promising likewise that he would elaborate with similar zeal upon the whole of divine scripture. He flourished under Charles V, Augustus, distinguished in the Council of Trent; and he died under Ferdinand I, Emperor, in the year of the Lord 1559. The beginning of the work is, Gloss: The author of this book is Moses. And the names of the authors whose expositions are contained in it are these:

The Greeks: Philo the Jew; Melito bishop of Sardis; Apollinaris bishop of Hierapolis; Irenaeus; Origen; Hippolytus of Rome; Theodorus; Eusebius bishop of Caesarea; Eusebius of Emesa; Eustathius bishop of Antioch; Acacius; Serapion; Didymus; Philo the bishop; Apollinaris of Laodicea; Ephrem; Basil; Gregory Nazianzen; Gregory of Nyssa.

The Latins: Zeno bishop of Verona; Hilary; Ambrose; Jerome; Augustine; Eucherius; Pope Leo; Prosper of Aquitaine; Pope Gregory I; Isidore bishop of Seville; Junilius; Bede; Strabo [Walafrid]; Albinus, who is also Alcuin; Rabanus; Pope Nicholas; Bernard; Hugh of St. Victor; Rupert of Deutz.

The Greeks (continued): Isidore of Pelusium; Epiphanius; Diodorus; Theophilus bishop of Alexandria; Theodore of Mopsuestia; John Chrysostom; John Cassian; John of Damascus; Severian of Gabala; Cyril; Theodoret; Gennadius; Isidore the abbot; an uncertain Greek author; the Greek Gloss.

The Latins (continued): Gratian; the Master of the Sentences [Peter Lombard]; Bonaventure; Thomas Aquinas; the Ordinary Gloss; the Interlinear Gloss; Cajetan; the Author of the Catena.

The expositions of the doctors — and their names — which are contained in the Catena of Exodus, are these:

The Greeks: Dionysius the Areopagite; Irenaeus bishop of Lyons; Antony the abbot; Athanasius; Irenaeus of Antioch; Euthymius Zigabenus; another Dionysius; Severus bishop of Antioch; another Severus; Oecumenius; the Sixth Synod.

The Latins: Cyprian; Maximus bishop of Turin; Hesychius; Gilbert; Pope Sixtus; Gilbert the Hollander; Guerric abbot of Igny.

In this very year 1586, in which this work is being printed, Aloysius's Catena on the Psalter came out for the first time, connected from more or less seventy ecclesiastical authors, both Greek and Latin.

Aelred of Rievaulx [Alredus Rievallis], an Englishman, a Cistercian monk, wrote on the 13th chapter of Isaiah, upon The Burden of Babylon, thirty-three Latin homilies, in the year of the Lord 1164.

Alvarus of Cahors [Alvardus de Cadurco], a Dominican, of Toulouse, wrote a Postil on the Apocalypse, 1 book; on the seven Penitential Psalms, 1 book.

Álvaro Gómez [Alvarus Gomes], a Spaniard, a man not unlearned, rendered the Proverbs of Solomon in verse.

Amandus of Zierikzee [Amandus Zierixiensis], a Zeelander, of the Order of Minors of the Observance [Observant Franciscans], wrote: on the Weeks of Daniel, 1 book; a Commentary on Genesis, 1 book; a history of the Lord's Passion, 1 book; on the Resurrection and Ascension of Christ, one book; on Ecclesiastes, 1 book; expositions on Job. He died in the year 1534.

Ambrose of Alexandria [Ambrosius Alexandrinus], a hearer and disciple of Didymus of Alexandria, whose are the books against Apollinaris; under Theodosius Augustus, in the year 400, he published very praiseworthy commentaries on the book of Job.

Ambrose Autpert [Ambrosius Ansbertus], a monk and presbyter of the Benedictine order, a man exquisitely learned in the divine letters, and elegant and sweet in speech, wrote — under Arnulf Augustus — an explanation on the Psalter, one book; on the Song of Songs, one book; on the Apocalypse, ten books (printed at Cologne in the year 1536). He flourished under the Emperor Arnulf, in the year of the Lord … [blank].

Ambrosius Catharinus Politus [Ambrogio Catarino Politi], first bishop of Minori, and afterward archbishop of Conza [Compsa], by nation a Tuscan, by fatherland a Sienese — my fellow-citizen, and my first teacher in the divine scriptures — a man strong in the powers of intellect, excelling in the riches of the disciplines, and mighty in eloquence both Tuscan and Latin. Having left the public school of Imperial [civil] Law — in which, among many illustrious hearers of his teaching, he had also Julius III, the Supreme Pontiff, as a disciple — he dedicated himself to Christ, entering the sacred order of St. Dominic; in which, persevering day and night in the study of the divine and sacred letters with the highest holiness of life, and fighting most valiantly, as in an arena, against all the heresies of our time, he was raised by Pope Julius to the care of a bishopric, and destined for the burden of the Cardinalate, which death snatched from him. He therefore, among many most noble works which — already an old man — he elaborated with the greatest industry upon the holy scriptures, left us most learned commentaries on all the Epistles of St. Paul; in which this was his chief care, that he might explain to the utmost the true sense of the Apostle, and at the same time show that no one fights more with the heretics of our age than Paul — whom they most impudently make out to be the champion of their heresies. Moved by this occasion, he resolved many difficult and arduous difficulties of our religion arising from the sentences of Paul. Among others, he attempts to crush with a great mass of many arguments that opinion concerning the "mass of perdition" (that it is left in its everlasting miseries, from the sole good-pleasure of God, without any consideration of works), as we shall explain more fully in the sixth volume, in the censures upon the epistles of Paul. The work begins, Before our most holy Lord Julius III, Supreme Pontiff. That so many things, with [those] of the ancients, etc.

- He also wrote, on all the Catholic [general] Epistles, briefer commentaries, whose beginning is, Of a most corrupt time.
- On the first five chapters of Genesis, clear and learned commentaries of an explanation according to the letter.
- On the Apocalypse, according to the letter, one book.
- On the authors and authority of the books of sacred scripture, one book.

(Rich PDF p. 194 [printed folio 194]. Book IV, catalog letter A: the death of Catharinus (†1552), then the major entry on St. Ambrose of Milan — Theodosius's praise, his style and method, and his Genesis works (Hexaemeron, On Human Dignity, On Paradise, On Cain and Abel), with a philological note that the Hexaemeron is really sermons. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

[Ambrosius Catharinus, continued from p212:]

He dies in the year of the Lord 1552.

Ambrose [Ambrosius], bishop of Milan, by fatherland a Roman, first governor of Liguria and Insubria, and then divinely attaining the bishopric of the Church of Milan, so excelled among the bishops of his time in stability of faith, integrity of morals, and admirableness of erudition, that the Emperor Theodosius, moved by the loftiness of his virtues, publicly cried out in the great church of the city of Constantinople: Ἀμβρόσιον οἶδα μόνον ἐπίσκοπον ἀξίως καλούμενον — that is, I know one Ambrose, who alone is worthily called a Bishop. Augustine writes that so great was the authority of his Christian doctrine that not even by his enemies could anything be found in his writings to be reprehended. He expounded almost all the divine scriptures with the highest praise, following in that labor Philo the Jew, Hippolytus, Apollinaris, both Eusebiuses, and Basil, but most of all Origen — with whose discourses, as Jerome testifies in the Epistle to Pammachius and Marcella, almost all his books are full; whence also (as Ambrose himself said of Origen) he appears far better in the old than in the new testament.

Now the kind of his exposition is varied, but insisting chiefly on the mystical senses, yet so that meanwhile the sense of the letter is not altogether neglected. His manner of speaking, as the variety of matters seems to demand, is varied, but everywhere pouring forth a lucid and perspicuous river of eloquence, as Augustine says — who also, in the fourth volume of On Christian Doctrine, brings forward from Ambrose's works certain most beautiful examples of the threefold Ambrosian style, that is, the plain, the moderate, and the grand; from which he shows that Ambrose spoke of humble things plainly, of middling things moderately, and of great things sublimely, according to the diversity and dignity of the matters. Yet he loved, with a peculiar and natural affection, a grave and pointed abundance of brief sentences, delighting wonderfully in a discourse distinguished sometimes by numerous commas and clauses, and painted with little flowers.

But his writings pertaining to the exposition of divine scripture are distinguished into four orders — namely, into Books, Commentaries, Treatises, and Epistles. [1] In the Books, in which he frequently embraces the method of Thematic exposition in imitation of Philo, the continuity of the historical context being passed over, he follows an interrupted order of explanation; and, summarily touching the chapters of the histories, he explains them in various and separate volumes of diverse arguments and titles. Whose number, arguments, and titles are these:

• On the first chapter of Genesis, the Hexaemeron, or On the Work of the Six Days — six books, or rather sermons to the people. Concerning which Jerome, writing to Pammachius and Oceanus, says: Our holy Ambrose so compiled the Hexaemeron of Origen that he rather followed the opinions of Hippolytus and of Basil. Which opinion of Jerome the exposition of Ambrose openly confirms: for it is indeed nothing else than that very Hexaemeron of Basil translated into Latin, with the same opinions and words everywhere (though the order of certain words and sentences is transposed), and with some little digressions added — whether from Hippolytus and Origen, or from another, or perhaps of his own. In translating and imitating which work Ambrose was so diligent that he did not even omit a certain artful lapse of memory which Basil, in the 8th homily of the Hexaemeron, had rhetorically feigned, pretending that in the middle of the discourse he was deserted by his memory.

These sermons — I know not who first transformed them into books and cut them up into many chapters (for both Bede, in his little work on the seasons, and Junilius, in the preface of the Hexaemeron, cite them under the name of books) — are nevertheless not books, but sermons delivered to the people and taken down by the hearers. Which their titles in the most ancient manuscripts indicate, and the little prefaces themselves demonstrate, being composed to prepare the minds of the hearers; likewise the perorations ending in doxologies, contrary to Ambrose's custom, who was not wont to end any of his [proper] books thus. But also those words which are found about the middle of the fifth sermon (or fifth book), chapter twelve, more evidently prove that Ambrose spoke these things in a discourse, and that while speaking, feigning a lapse of memory, he purposely fell silent for a little while, in imitation of Basil the Great, who in the narration of the same passage had artfully feigned himself deserted by his memory. For the Notary who was then taking down the words of the speaker, the course of the writing being interrupted, inserted this clause of his own, saying: And when he had here been silent for a little while, taking up his discourse again, he said: "The necessary disputation concerning the nature of things had escaped us, most beloved brethren, and a discourse of this kind had flown away from us with the birds themselves, etc." Which words that first transformer of the sermons — though the ancient copies everywhere protested, and the very sense of the matter resisted — inaptly enough accommodated to the very person of Ambrose, in this manner: And when I had here been silent for a little while, taking up my discourse again, I say: "It had escaped us, etc."

• There is also, on the same first chapter of Genesis, one book On Human Dignity, expounding that passage, Let us make man, and at the same time explaining the dignity of the human condition, both by reason of the image and by reason of the likeness.

• On the second and third chapters of Genesis, one book On Paradise: in which it is investigated what Paradise is, where it is, and of what sort; and concerning the things which befell the first parents in it, the discourse is elegant, but chiefly allegorical, certain most beautiful allegories being taken from the book of Allegories of Philo the Jew. [2]

• On the fourth chapter of Genesis, two books On Cain and Abel, in which, according to the mystical understanding, he expounds the birth, life, morals, and worship of the two brothers whom Moses described in that chapter. Here too he borrowed some things from the book of Philo the Jew which is entitled On the Sacrifices of Cain and Abel.

• On the fifth chapter of Genesis to the eleventh, [On Noah…] [→ p214: De Noë…]

Book IV, catalog letter A: the catalogue of St. Ambrose's scriptural works — his Genesis treatises (On Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, the Patriarchs' blessings), his letter-treatises on Old-Testament passages (Exodus through Micah), and eight sermons on Matthew. Running head: LIBER QVARTVS.)*

• On Noah and the Ark, one book: in which he narrates the life, morals, and deeds of the holy man Noah, and also the loftiness of his mind and the events of his times, expounding in the allegorical sense the history of nearly six chapters — namely, from the end of the fifth chapter to the end of the tenth.

• On Genesis chapters 12 to 18, two books On the Patriarch Abraham, which he composed in imitation of Xenophon and of Philo. For Xenophon — a fellow-disciple of Plato and a hearer of Socrates — in that book which he entitled Κύρου παιδίαν [the Cyropaedia, "the Education of Cyrus"], under the feigned person of Cyrus king of the Persians, described the discipline of a just and wise king from the inmost bosom of philosophy. Emulating him, Philo the Jew wrote a book on the patriarch Abraham, showing him to have been the image and pattern of a wise man perfected through contemplation, whence the whole institution of a wise life was to be sought. [1] Ambrose followed both in these two books, in which, under the narration of the whole life and deeds of Abraham, he expresses for us the image of the moral, and truly active, man. These two volumes contain the History of Genesis from the beginning of the twelfth chapter to the middle of the eighteenth.

• On Genesis chapter 21, two books On Isaac and the Soul: in the former of which, taking occasion from what is related of the birth of Isaac and his betrothal with Rebecca (chapters 21 and 24), he discourses, according to the allegorical and anagogical understanding, of the love between Christ the Bridegroom (prefigured in Isaac) and the soul the Bride (designated in Rebecca). In the second book, taking occasion from what he had foretold of the soul in the former, he treats of the good of death [2], which joins the soul to its Bridegroom Christ, to live for ever.

• On Genesis chapters 27 to 35, two books On Jacob and the Happy Life: in which, briefly running through Moses' narration (spread over nine chapters), he shows that the beatitude of the wise man is not only not lost, but can even be acquired, in the greatest perils of life [3] — by the example of blessed Jacob, to whom, living in exile, persecution, and servitude, nothing was lacking of what pertains to beatitude.

• On Genesis chapters 37 to 49, one book On the Patriarch Joseph: in which, discoursing with allegorical and anagogical explanation on the whole history of Joseph (twelve chapters in Moses), he sets before us in Joseph the example of many virtues, but chiefly of chastity. [4]

• On Genesis chapter 49, one book On the Blessings of the Patriarchs, containing the mystical explanation of Jacob's blessing toward his sons.

He also wrote, besides these books, three epistles on various passages of Genesis: the first, to Horontianus, On the Division of the Works of the Six Days, beginning The division; the second, to the same, On Man Produced after the Beasts, beginning That thou art moved; the third, On Paradise, to Sabinus, beginning The Hexaemeron being read.

Likewise, letter-treatises on other passages:

• On Exodus 8, On those things which the Egyptians abominate, to Irenaeus, one epistle.

• On Exodus 12, On the celebration of the Passover, to the Bishops of Aemilia, one epistle.

• On Exodus 24, On the Blood of the Victim divided in two ways, to Simplicianus, one epistle.

• On Exodus 30, On the Meaning of the Didrachma, to Justus, one epistle.

• On Exodus 32, On the Golden Calf, to Romulus, one epistle.

• On Leviticus 10, On Moses approving the counsel of Aaron, to Simplicianus, one epistle.

• On Numbers 23, On the Words of God to Balaam, to Chromatius, one epistle.

• On Deuteronomy 28, On the Brazen Heaven and the Iron Earth, to Romulus, one epistle.

• On Deuteronomy 32, On Woman, that she should not wear Man's garment, to Irenaeus, one epistle.

• On 2 Kings [2 Samuel] chapter 21, one book On the Apology of David, piously excusing David's adultery [5] and most beautifully expounding the fiftieth Psalm.

• On 3 Kings [1 Kings] chapter 21, one book On Naboth, against the unjust murder of Naboth and the insatiable avarice that was its cause.

• On the History of Tobias, against usurers, one book.

• On Job, On the Complaint [De interpellatione], three books, containing the exposition of the complaints by which Job everywhere throughout the volume expostulates with God.

• On the Psalter, eleven books are cited by Trithemius, seen neither by him nor by me. There now survive sixteen Treatises on sixteen Psalms, one on each — namely, on the first, and on Psalms 21, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 43, 45, 47, 48, 49, 61, 109; likewise, on Psalm 118, twenty-two Treatises.

• On the 30th chapter of Proverbs, one book On the Three Problems most difficult to know, entitled On Solomon.

• On Isaiah, one book of commentaries, cited by St. Augustine in the second book Against Julian and in the fourth book Against the Two Epistles of the Pelagians.

• On Jeremiah 17, On the Crying Partridge, to Irenaeus, one epistle.

• On that passage of Micah 5, And thou, Bethlehem, land of Judah, to Horontianus, one epistle.

And these are the works of Ambrose which we have on the Old Testament; but those which are extant on the New are these — from various passages of Matthew, eight sermons, that is:

• On Matthew ch. 4, On the Fasting of Christ, one sermon.

• On Matthew 7, On the Pearl, one sermon.

• On Matthew 8, On the Foxes that have Holes, one sermon.

• On Matthew 14, On Peter walking upon the Waters, one sermon.

• On Matthew 18, On him who shall be greater in the kingdom of heaven, one sermon.

• On Matthew 19, On the Camel passing through the Eye of a Needle, one sermon.

• On Matthew 22, On rendering to Caesar the things that are Caesar's, one sermon.

• On Matthew 27, On Judas the Traitor, one sermon.

• On Mark, a volume of commentaries, lost by the fault of the times, from which Bede [borrowed] many things [→ p215: he took to himself…]

[1] Abraham was the image and pattern of a wise man perfected through contemplation. [2] The good of death is explained by St. Ambrose. [3] Beatitude can be acquired even in the greatest perils of life. [4] Joseph was the example of many virtues, but chiefly of chastity. [5] Ambrose piously excuses the adultery of David.

Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)*

[St. Ambrose, continued from p214:]

…he [Bede] testifies that he copied out for himself.

On the Gospel of Luke, eleven books of commentaries of an interrupted exposition, succinctly arranged according to the mystical understanding. Concerning these, Rufinus, in the second book of his Invectives, reports that Jerome — in the preface to Origen's homilies on Luke, and in a certain epistle of which he himself had a copy — wrote that the author of these commentaries "played with words and dozed in the senses." Which I would rather believe to have been fabricated by Rufinus out of hatred of Jerome, than that such a judgment was uttered by Jerome concerning the learned commentaries of a most erudite man. Concerning these, Acca, bishop of Hexham [Cantabrigiensis], writes to Bede the Venerable, presbyter, thus: [1] There are certain things in the exposition of the blessed Ambrose on Luke, at once so eloquent and so lofty (which I doubt not that your holiness also has seen), that they can be understood only by the more learned; but by the rude or fastidious readers (of whom in the present age you will find many), on account of the difficulty of attaining what is eloquently said, or of grasping what is lofty, they are not even to be sought as too exalted, nor to be scrutinized as if too strong [for them]. And the most learned father Augustine gave no small judgment [of it], who, writing to Paulina, the servant of God, On seeing God, thought that he should use no testimonies more than those of blessed Ambrose taken from this work; and he judged that they should not only be set down simply, but also expounded — so much so that out of a very few little sentences of that commentator he made, by treating them, no small volume. Yet some things St. Ambrose passed over in this work undiscussed, which to him, as a man of the highest erudition, seemed plain and not worth inquiry. Thus far Acca.

There are those who think that this work was not divided into books by the author himself, but written in a continuous series; but that they are mistaken is clear from the writings of Augustine, who in the first book Against Pelagius and Celestius, ch. 44, cites by name the second, sixth, and tenth book of Ambrose on Luke; [2] and the Sixth Synod also, in the 10th action, cites the authority of Ambrose by number from the sixth book of the commentaries on Luke.

There survive also, after these commentaries, seven sermons on the same gospel, namely:

- On the sixth chapter of Luke, On the healing of the withered hand, one sermon, translated almost word for word from St. Basil's discourse on the same passage.
- On Luke 12, On the man whose field brought forth abundant fruits, one sermon.
- On Luke 13, On the grain of mustard seed, one sermon.
- On the same chapter, On the leaven, one sermon.
- On Luke 17, On the lightning flashing from East to West, one sermon.
- On Luke 23, On the thief, one sermon.
- On the denial of Peter, one sermon.
- On the burial of the Lord, one sermon.
- On John 4, On the Samaritan woman, one sermon.
- On John 9, On the man born blind, to Bellicius, one epistle.
- On John 19, On Christ accused before Pilate, one sermon.
- On that passage of John 20, Touch me not, one sermon.

On all the epistles of Paul, 14 books — brief indeed in words, but weighty in the weight of their sentences.

There are also carried about, under the name of Ambrose, commentaries on the Apocalypse, recently printed at Paris; but, besides that the diversity of style manifestly protests against it, there are also many opinions of Gregory scattered throughout the whole work, which show it not to be Ambrose's; and the author himself, in the explanation of chapter 17, openly confesses that he wrote after the Roman Empire had been occupied by the Lombards [3] — which happened more than two hundred years after Ambrose. The work begins, The blessed John the Apostle.

Ambrose flourished under Theodosius the Great, about the year of the Lord 380; and Paulinus, bishop of Nola, wrote his life.

Ammonius of Alexandria, the teacher of Origen Adamantius in Philosophy [4] — an eloquent man, most learned in the secular disciplines, famous in the times of the Emperor Alexander Severus — composed, among many monuments of his genius, an elegant work On the Harmony of Moses and Jesus, in which he gathered all the passages of the old and new law that are conformable to one another. He also made a volume which he entitled the Gospel Harmony, or Monotessaron (that is, One out of Four), in which, as by a certain chain [catena], out of the four incomplete histories of the gospels he wove together one whole and perfect history, whose beginning is, In the beginning was the Word. Him Porphyry falsely accuses, in the third book against the Christians, of having become a Gentile from a Christian — whereas it is established that he persevered a Christian to the very end of his life. [5] Volaterranus, in the 13th book of the Anthropology, reports from Suidas that an ass — the most stupid of all animals — was a hearer of his teaching. [6] He flourished under Alexander [Severus], son of Mamaea, in the year of the Lord 220.

Amphilochius, bishop of Iconium — who read to Jerome a book published by him On the Holy Spirit, in the times of the Emperor Theodosius, that is, in the year of the Lord 390 — wrote several learned and eloquent homilies, of which I have found these cited in Theodoret's Dialogues [entitled] Polymorphus:

- On that passage of Matthew 20 [read 26], Let this cup pass from me, one homily.
- On the sinful woman who anointed the Lord's feet, and the Pharisee, from Luke 7, one homily.
- On that passage of John 5, The Son cannot do anything of himself, one homily.
- On that of John 14, The Father is greater than I, one homily.
- On that, He who hears my word, and believes him [that sent me], one homily.

Anastasius, bishop of Antioch — who, because he lived the contemplative life on Mount Sinai and there subdued the sense of the flesh, obtained the surname of the Sinaite — left many lucubrations, of which Nicephorus reports that he read a learned book on the sixth Psalm, which he published at the beginning of the fasts [Lent]. He flourished under Maurice Augustus, and died under the Emperor Phocas, being cut down in the city of Antioch by the Jews, who, a sedition being stirred up against the Christians, [slew] this most blessed bis[hop] [→ p216: -hop…]

[1] Acca's judgment on St. Ambrose's commentary on the gospel of St. Luke. [2] The same Augustine also cites other books of Ambrose on Luke. [3] The Roman Empire was occupied by the Lombards more than 200 years after Ambrose. [4] Ammonius was the teacher of Origen in Philosophy. [5] Ammonius was a Christian. [6] An ass was a hearer of the teaching of Ammonius.

…this most blessed bishop, thrown down from his throne, and a rope being tied to his feet, dragged through the city, they afflicted with a foul death. For his private parts, cut off with a sword while he was being dragged, they cast into his mouth; and afterward they gave him over to the fire like a certain holocaust — a man illustrious in wisdom and virtue — in the year of the Lord 600. His Greek works are preserved at Rome in the Palatine Library.

Anastasius, bishop of Antioch, the successor in the bishopric of Anastasius the Sinaite, venerable in life and doctrine, published on the Hexaemeron twelve Greek sermons, adorned with most elegant allegories, which are preserved in the most flourishing Academy [Library] of Venice. He flourished in the year of the Lord 610.

Andrew Biglia [Andreas Bilius] of Milan, of the Order of Hermits [Augustinian], a Philosopher and Theologian learned in Greek and Latin, left on the Hexaemeron a remarkable commentary, which — together with his other most learned works, not yet printed — is kept in the Marciana Library at Milan. [1] He flourished under the Emperor Sigismund, in the year of the Lord 1434.

Andrew, Archbishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, by nation a Greek, elaborated in Greek eloquence a remarkable work on the Apocalypse, which he most aptly divided into 24 parts or discourses, and these into 72 chapters — for the number 24, thrice repeated, produces 72. He took the number 24 on account of the 24 elders named in the Apocalypse, who are the sign of those who pleased God well from the beginning of the world to the consummation; and he tripled this number in the chapters not inconsiderately, but because those who pleased God had a tripartite substance [hypostasis] — namely soul, body, and spirit — to delineate the appropriation of the omnipotent Trinity. He flourished, as I think, a thousand years ago.

Andrew, bishop of Crete, wrote several Greek sermons, of which the sermon on Lazarus (four days dead) is celebrated.

Andrew, bishop of Jerusalem, wrote in Greek, on the annunciation of the Virgin Mother of God and the salutation (from the first chapter of Luke), a most brilliant oration, which begins, Today is present the joy of all.

Andreas Gallus, of the Order of Preachers, wrote on the four books of Kings a scholastic Postil, whose authority Lyra, in the tenth chapter of 1 Kings [1 Samuel], having brought it forward, refutes.

Andreas Placus wrote an interpretation, or dictionary, of the more difficult Greek, Hebrew, and other foreign words which are found in the sacred letters.

Andrew of St Victor [Andreas Victorius], an Englishman, disciple of Hugh of St Victor, wrote Commentaries on the books of Moses, Joshua, Judges, Kings, Paralipomenon [Chronicles], Ecclesiastes, Proverbs, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Daniel, and Joel. He flourished 1150.

Angelomus, a monk of Luxeuil, of the Order of St. Benedict, a man endowed with a noble genius in the divine scriptures, at the command of Drogo bishop of Metz (son of the Emperor Charlemagne), gathered from the commentaries of the ancient fathers a pious and learned work — namely, on the four books of Kings, four books of Stromata [Patchwork], whose beginning is, Twenty-two; likewise, for the Emperor Lothair, son of the Emperor Louis, a Stromatic explanation on the Song of Songs of the same kind, whose beginning is, Before the imperial glory. He flourished in the year of the Lord 830.

Angelus of Camerino, an Italian, of the Order of Hermits of St. Augustine, wrote 4 books on the Gospels and 14 books on the Epistles of St. Paul. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1340.

Angelo Canini [Angelus Caninius] of Anghiari published a historical narration of some passages of the New Testament. He flourished under the Emperor Ferdinand.

Anselm of Laon [Anselmus Laudunensis], a Frenchman, surnamed the Scholastic — learned by continual study in the divine scriptures and the volumes of the sacred doctors, and not moderately instructed in all the disciplines, sharp in intellect, concise in speech, and an imitator of a certain Laconic brevity — expounded the books of both testaments, in a new and unusual manner of explanation, with certain very brief little annotations of the fathers: which, written in very small characters, he most artfully fitted between the very lines of the scriptures (written in larger letters), with no less curious than useful industry; and this labor — to distinguish it from the Gloss of Strabo, which is wont to be written in the margins of the sacred manuscripts — he called the Interlinear Gloss. He flourished under the Emperor Henry IV, in the year of the Lord 1110. He also wrote one book of commentaries on the Psalter.

Anselm of Canterbury [Anselmus Cantuariensis], bishop in England, formerly abbot of the monastery of Bec, of the Benedictine order, disciple of Lanfranc archbishop of Canterbury — a man nobly cultivated in both divine and human disciplines, of a wonderfully simple and pure, but not unpleasant, style — left, among his other monuments, the volumes written below:

- On the Heptateuch (that is, on the first seven volumes of divine scripture), 7 books.
- On the Hexaemeron, one book, cited by Trithemius.
- On the Song of Songs, one book, which begins, In the beginnings of books the reasons are to be stated.
- On various passages of the Gospels, very many homilies.
- On Paul the Apostle, commentaries, whose beginning is, About to speak, with the Lord's help, on the epistles of Paul the Apostle. (These we have found in old copies ascribed to Hervaeus the Monk.)

He flourished under the Emperor Henry III [IV], in the year of the Lord 1080; Eadmer, an English monk, wrote his life. Anselm's commentaries on Matthew were printed at Antwerp by Jan Grave [Ioannes Granius] in 1551, and all his works were published at Cologne by Maternus Cholinus in 1573.

Anselm, bishop of Lucca, a man distinguished by the sanctity of his morals and by his erudition in divine and human matters, an indefatigable fellow-laborer of Pope Gregory VII (of Sovana), and against Gilbert the Antipope [→ p217: he from…]

[1] He [Andrew Biglia] also wrote 4 books of expositions on the Gospels.

(Rich PDF p. 198 [printed folio 198]. Book IV, catalog letter A: Anselm of Lucca and of Mantua, the Antiochus/Antipater group, and a long run of Antonius entries (Antoninus of Florence, Guevara's Monte Calvario, Rampegollo's Figurae Bibliae, and others), ending at Apion. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

…against Gilbert the Antipope, subordinated to him by force by the Emperor Henry IV, a most fierce champion [of Gregory VII], he published on all the Psalms of David one book, and on the prophet Jeremiah a second book of explanation. He flourished under Henry III [IV], in the year of the Lord 1080.

Anselm, bishop of Mantua, famous for sanctity and erudition, at the exhortation of the most illustrious lady Matilda [of Tuscany], briefly and clearly expounded the Psalter from the beginning of the book to the versicle of Psalm 117 [118], We have blessed you out of the house of the Lord; he also pursued the Lamentations of Jeremiah with like zeal. He dies in the year of the Lord 1086, in the thirteenth year of his bishopric, and was buried at Mantua in the church of St. Peter.

Anselm, of the Order of Minors, described the holy land and the city of Jerusalem. The book was printed at Cracow in the year 1514.

Antiochus, bishop of the city of Ptolemais, a man of rare genius, of the highest erudition and eloquence — to whom Anianus, the most ancient translator of John Chrysostom, ascribes a pleasing pomp of speaking — left, among other monuments of his noble genius, on the ninth chapter of John, On the Illumination of the Man Born Blind, a most brilliant oration, full of the compunction of fear, of God, and of humility. He flourished under the Augusti Theodosius and Arcadius, in the year of the Lord 390.

Antiochus the Monk, a Greek, very learned in the divine scriptures, gathered a remarkable work, distinguished into sixty-three sermons, which he entitled the Pandects, comprising the expositions of various most excellent fathers on the Decalogue, together with the refutations of all the heresies which have arisen against the Decalogue. At what time he flourished I have not yet found.

Antipater, bishop of Bostra — who composed a refutation of the Apology for Origen written by Eusebius — published several homilies, among others one on the ninth chapter of Matthew, on the woman suffering from an issue of blood, whose beginning is, That the calling of the Jews. It is cited in the Second Nicene Synod, action four.

Antoninus, Archbishop of Florence, of the Order of Preachers, a writer of many works, patched together on the first chapter of Luke (on the annunciation, the Angelic salutation, and the Canticle of Mary) a volume of vast prolixity, disposed in scholastic method and style, and afterward placed it at the end of the last part of his Summa. He also published, on the history of the two disciples going to Emmaus, a Trialogue, in which — Christ (in the garb of a wayfarer), Cleopas, and Amaon speaking with one another — all the prophecies, oracles, and presages are declared which were written in the old testament concerning the life, death, and resurrection of CHRIST. The work begins, Beginning from Moses. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1460.

Antonio of Bitonto [Antonius Bitontinus], a Minorite [Franciscan], gathered from Nicholas of Lyra a postil on all the lessons of the old and new testament which are recited throughout the whole year, with certain little questions of his own added, not altogether to be cast away.

Antonio Broickwy of Königstein [Antonius Bruichius à Konigstein], guardian of the regular observance of St. Francis at Nijmegen, gathered a brief Gospel Monotessaron, taken from the four Evangelists in a most fitting order. And the same wrote on the four gospels four books of narration, in an almost scholastic but somewhat more polished style; and he also published commentaries on some of the epistles of St. Paul, whose beginning is, The evangelical office, etc. — intending to do the same on all the rest, had he lived longer. For he dies of a pain in the side, in the year of the Lord 1541.

Antonio de Ghislandis, of Turin, Inquisitor of heretical depravity, of the Order of Preachers, wrote a work of ten thousand little questions on the Gospels of the whole year. Its beginning is, To the Reverend Lord John Louis. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1490.

Antonio de Guevara, from a Franciscan monk [made] bishop of Mondoñedo, born in the city of Álava in Spain, preacher and chronicler of Charles V Augustus, wrote in the more polished Spanish tongue, on the history of the Lord's Passion gathered from the four gospels, a most learned work, to which he gave the title Mount Calvary [Monte Calvario], divided into two volumes. He also composed, on various passages of divine scripture, most elegant colloquies, which — on account of the elegance of the speech and the pointed weight of the sentences — the French, Germans, and Italians (together with his other little works) each translated into their own languages. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1540.

Antonio de Honcala, a Spaniard, by fatherland of Langa, a canon of the church of Ávila, piously learned, put forth most elegant commentaries on Genesis, in the year of the Lord 1558.

Antonio Marinari, a Carmelite, wrote On the Harmony of Jesus Christ and the Prophets, three books, not unuseful for understanding the prophecies of the prophets. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1541.

Antonio de Nebrija [Antonius Nebrissensis], from Nebrija, a noble town in Baetica [Andalusia], published annotations on certain somewhat-obscure passages of both the old and new testament.

Antonio Pucci [Antonius Puccius], a Florentine, Cardinal of the title of the Four Crowned Saints, Grand Penitentiary, wrote on the words of consecration (taken from the four evangelists) fourteen homilies no less learned than pious, whose beginning is, Since to each is attributed by nature. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1548.

Antonio Rampegollo [Antonius Rampegolus], a Genoese, a Hermit [Augustinian], by profession a Scholastic, wrote for the young students of his order in the monastery at Naples, on various passages of the old testament, a rude little work, in which — expounding almost all the sacred histories morally in a well-worn eloquence — he accommodated each to each of the moral virtues. The title of the work is the Figures of the Bible [Figurae Bibliae], and its beginning, To religious men in Christ. He flourished in the Council of Constance, disputing against the Hussite heretics, under the Emperor Sigismund, in the year of the Lord 1418.

(Rich PDF p. 199 [printed folio 199]. Book IV, catalog letter A: Apollinaris the Elder of Laodicea — who, when Julian the Apostate banned Christian classical education, recast almost all of Scripture in Homeric, Pindaric, and tragic verse — and Apollinaris the Younger, the heresiarch (his 30 books against Porphyry, and the errors charged against him). Running head: LIBER QVARTVS.)

…under the Emperor Severus, in the year of the Lord 200, wrote on the Hexaemeron six treatises — learned indeed, but in some things departing a little from the right rule of faith.

Apollinaris the Elder, having attained the dignity of the presbyterate in the church of Laodicea in Syria, a doctor of Greek letters and a professor of the art of Grammar, was by family an Alexandrian. He first taught at Berytus [Beirut], then migrated to Laodicea; and there, having married a wife, he had a son Apollinaris, afterward bishop of the same Church. With whom he lived many years, being forbidden the holy communion by Theodore, bishop of Laodicea, and by George his successor — whether because he was unwilling to agree with them (who taught the Son of God to be homoiousion [of like substance], and not homoousion [of the same substance]), or because he was joined by too great familiarity with Epiphanius the Sophist, whose name was suspect to the Christians and hateful to the bishops.

When therefore Julian the Apostate had brought in a law by which he forbade the Christians all the Greek disciplines and institutions [1] — affirming that it was not fitting that they should take utility from these teachings, which they [the pagans] handed down as fables, and which they [the Christians] attacked with weapons sought thence — Apollinaris rendered almost the whole old and new testament, most elegantly, in various kinds of verse, so that the boys, learning those instead of the Greek disciplines, might attain skill both in the Greek tongue and in verse. And his sacred poems are reported by name to have been these:

- From the beginning of the world to the reign of Saul, twenty-four books of heroic [epic] verse, each inscribed with each of the twenty-four letters of the alphabet, after the Homeric fashion.
- From the death of Saul to the end of the old testament, twenty books of various histories, elaborated partly in Lyric meter after the form of Pindar, partly after the manner of the comedies of Menander and the tragedies of Euripides.
- Of the cyclic lessons — that is, of those which throughout the circle of the year are read in the church from both testaments — two books, disposed with every variety of verse.
- Of the Paraphrase on the Psalter, one book, which, recently printed in hexameter verse, thus begins: ἄλβιος [ὃς] τοῦ οὐ πεπόρευται δυσσεβέων ἐνὶ βουλῇ — that is, Happy is he who has not gone into the counsel of the impious [Ps 1:1].

These poems the Christians used in place of Homer and the other poets, until the Emperor Jovian established a law that the Christians should be imbued with the letters of the gentiles, so that they might the more easily overcome the errors of the gentiles, using against them their own weapons. [2] Sozomen, in the fifth book of his History, brought forth a judgment on the labors of Apollinaris in these words: Apollinaris, in a short time, composed lucubrations very equal to the ancient Greeks in number, virtue, character of writing, and arrangement; and — unless men honored antiquity, and believed pleasing the things that are in use — the works of Apollinaris would (as I think) have been esteemed equal to the ancients. He flourished in the year of the Lord 360.

Apollinaris the Younger, reader of the divine scriptures of the Church of Laodicea in Syria, and afterward bishop, son of Apollinaris the Elder (presbyter of the same Church), from his early age was most nobly instructed in the oratorical arts (of which he was afterward a professor) by Epiphanius, the most illustrious Sophist of his age — on account of whose intimate acquaintance he was for a long time forbidden the fellowship of the faithful by the two Episcopal predecessors of his church, namely Theodore and Gregory. But when the Emperor Julian had prohibited to Christians the studies of Greek letters, he, leaving Epiphanius, gave himself wholly to the sacred letters; in which, when by the acuteness of his genius and by assiduous exercise he had in a short time greatly advanced, he first reduced the Evangelical and Apostolic doctrines into the form of dialogues, after the example of Plato, among the Greeks — by this art eluding the craft of the emperor. Then, attempting greater things, he published so great a multitude of volumes for the Christian faith, that St. Basil rightly said of him that Apollinaris had filled the whole world with his books.

Jerome, his disciple in the divine letters, testifies that he wrote on almost all the holy books commentaries not indeed to be despised, but constrained with so great brevity that he noted down rather certain little notes of exposition than expositions themselves. For thus Jerome says: He expounded all things so as to run over the whole, and with certain points and intervals — nay, with great compendia — to fly past the spaces of a long road, so that he seems to have gathered not so much commentaries as indexes of chapters. Whence, on account of the excessive brevity — touching the sense rather than explaining it — he could not lead the reader to a perfect understanding. Which he himself also acknowledging, when he was now older, at the request of his friends, gave somewhat fuller commentaries on some of the Prophets than those which, as a young man, he had briefly written on the same Prophets.

He also wrote against the insane Porphyry thirty books, superior in the judgment of all to his other works. Among which he composed a great volume — that is, the twenty-sixth book — for the defense of the book of Daniel, against which Porphyry had written the twelfth book of the fifteen books against the holy Christian scriptures which he had published. [3] He followed in his expositions sometimes the version of Symmachus, sometimes a certain edition compiled by himself out of all the editions; concerning which Jerome, in the second book against Rufinus, says: Apollinaris, with a good intention indeed, but not according to knowledge, attempted to sew together the patches of all the translations into one garment, and to weave the coherence of scripture not by the rule of truth, but by his own judgment. And again, in the commentaries on the twelfth chapter of Ecclesiastes, Jerome says: The Laodicean, having followed the interpretation of Symmachus, can please neither the Jews nor the Christians — since he is both far from the Hebrews, and disdains to follow the interpretation of the Seventy.

Apollinaris was also accused, by many writers of no contemptible name, of having been in the error of the Millenarians [Chiliasts]; of having introduced into the Trinity a "great, greater, greatest" — calling, namely, the Spirit "great," the Son "greater," and the Father "greatest"; and likewise of not thinking rightly of the incarnation of Christ, supposing that He brought His flesh from heaven, and lacked a rational [soul] [→ p219: -tional…]

…lacked a rational soul, the divinity supplying the office of the rational part. But since very many most weighty authors — among whom Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, most hostile to his name — relate that he overthrew, in many volumes, the Arians, the Eunomians, the Origenists, and many other sects of heretics, [1] it is credible that these heresies were devised by his disciples, who, to gain credit for them, imposed them upon their master — heresies which they themselves (as Epiphanius testifies in the third book of the Panarion) had neither learned nor heard from him. He flourished under Gratian Augustus, in the year of the Lord 380.

Aponius, a man most eloquent in the sacred letters, wrote on the Song of Songs (according to the Septuagint edition), to Armenius the Presbyter, six books, in which he most exactly described, in the allegorical sense, the nuptials of Christ and the Church. These Lucas, abbot of Mont-Saint-Corneille, contracted into an epitome; and Angelomus the Monk also, in his Stromata on the Song of Songs, plucked very many passages from these, the author's name not being concealed. The beginning of the work is, By that great example of beatitude. He flourished under the Emperor Louis, in the year of our salvation 810.

Apringius [Aprigius], a Spaniard, bishop of the city of Pax [Beja] in Spain — exactly learned in the secular disciplines, eminent in eloquence, and the most skilled of his age in all the holy scriptures, and in the explanation of the divine volumes second to none of the ancient fathers — published, under Justinian Augustus, about the year of the Lord 530, most learned and most elegant commentaries on the Song of Songs and on the Apocalypse.

Aquila, disciple of Rabbi Akiba, the second Greek interpreter [translator] of the divine volumes — careful and diligent, by nation a Pontic, by fatherland of Sinope, a man most skilled in both branches of mathematics [astronomy/astrology], and on that account dear to Hadrian Augustus, by whom he was even appointed overseer of the works for building up the city of Jerusalem (destroyed by Titus). This man, I say, when — the city being restored — the disciples of the Apostles were preaching the Gospel in it, believed in Christ and was baptized. But when, too intent on the casters-of-nativities, he daily marked out the positions of nativities, the horoscope of those being born having been inspected; and when, rebuked for this by the fathers, he did not desist but rather opposed himself to them insultingly — he was driven from the church by them. Which ignominy, bearing it more grievously and vexingly than can be said, he renounced Christianity, is made a proselyte, and is circumcised among the Jews; [2] and, having quickly been taught the Hebrew tongue, he translated the divine scriptures into Greek word for word — attacking the translation of the Seventy-two interpreters, that he might render otherwise certain testimonies concerning Christ brought forth in the scriptures and translated by them, and thus avenge the confusion he had received. His edition, as Jerome (at the beginning of the Hebrew Questions) and Severian, bishop of Gabala (in the exordium of the Hexaemeron), noted, had this beginning: ἐν κεφαλίδι ἐποίησεν ὁ θεὸς τὸν οὐρανὸν, καὶ τὴν γῆν· ἡ δὲ γῆ ἦν κενότης, καὶ οὐδέν — that is, In the chapter-heading [or in the sum] God made heaven and earth; but the earth was emptiness, and nothing [Aquila's rendering of Gen 1:1–2].

He flourished, as Epiphanius writes, under Hadrian Augustus, in the year of the Lord 120. But as Jerome supposes (in the third commentary on Isaiah), he flourished many years before the last Jewish captivity, and was a disciple of Rabbi Akiba, who lived before Christ.

Arator, subdeacon [and] Cardinal of the holy Roman Church, a distinguished poet, under the Emperor Justinian, in the year of the Lord 540, wrote in most elegant verses two books of the Apostolic History, in which, in hexameter verse, he sang whatever Luke the Evangelist wrote in prose in the Acts of the Apostles — with innumerable and elegant flowers of allegories intermingled in his work, which the venerable presbyter Bede, gathering into one, used to adorn his own commentaries on the Acts of the Apostles. When Arator himself had offered the volume of these books to Pope Vigilius, before the confession [tomb] of St.

Peter, on the 7th before the Ides of April [April 7], in a circle of many Bishops, he was ordered by the Pontiff to recite it aloud before all. But when the time of the hour had now passed, Pope Vigilius handed the codex to Surgentius, the venerable primicerius, to be placed in the archive, that he might finish the reading of it at the appointed time. All earnestly demanding that the book be read publicly before all, from the beginning — the Pontiff assenting — within the Church of St. Peter in Chains [ad Vincula], in a great throng of all the most learned, Arator himself reciting with distinct words, both books were heard four times over — since in one day scarcely the half of one book could be read, on account of the constant repetitions which the hearers demanded with auspicious and frequent acclamations. The beginning of the work is: As Judaea, polluted with the blood of its own crime… He flourished in the year of the Lord 560.

Archangelo Favorino [Archangelus Faorinus] published Denis the Carthusian's Adunation [Gathering] of the matters contained here and there in the various passages of the Epistles of St. Paul. The book was printed at Venice in the year of the Lord 1569.

Arethas, bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, gathered a certain brief explanation on the Apocalypse, which he reduced into order out of the divinely-instituted commentaries of the most blessed Andrew, Archbishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia. Its beginning is, It is to be known, that the whole, etc. This work was made Latin [translated] by John Henten [Ioannes Hentenius], a Hieronymite — afterward a Dominican, whom I heard teaching Theology in the University of Louvain in the year of the Lord 1565.

Aribo, Archbishop of Mainz, the 19th after St. Boniface the martyr, a man most illustrious in the study of the divine law — at whose command a Provincial synod was gathered at Seligenstadt in Germany, under Conrad the Younger Augustus — wrote one book on the 15 Psalms of Degrees. He flourished under the Emperor Conrad the Younger, in the year of the Lord 1031.

Aristobulus the Elder, by nation a Jew, from Paneas, a city of Phoenicia (which is called Caesarea of Palestine, or Caesarea Philippi) — disciple of Agathobulus the Jew, a most wise man (who himself also wrote on the Pentateuch) — a man of singular learning [→ p220: doctrine…]

[Aristobulus the Elder, continued from p219:]

…renowned in doctrine and sanctity, was one of those seventy elders who were sent by Eleazar, the pontiff of Jerusalem, to Ptolemy Philadelphus, the second king of Egypt, to translate the Hebrew books of the divine law into the Greek tongue; and he answered many things, out of the traditions of Moses, to the king who proposed and inquired of them. He therefore published, in the Greek tongue, five books of Questions on the Pentateuch addressed to Ptolemy Philadelphus — of which Anatolius, bishop of Laodicea, made mention in his book On the Pasch, from which Eusebius, in the seventh book of the Ecclesiastical History, brings forward a long testimony, embracing the words of Aristobulus. He flourished in the 124th Olympiad, that is, in the year 350 before the coming of Christ.

Aristobulus the Younger [Aristobulus Iunior], by nation a Jew, of the race of the priests, tutor of Ptolemy Philometor the sixth king of Egypt, a philosopher by profession, a Peripatetic by sect, but above all things imbued from his tender years with the knowledge of the holy scriptures, wrote — in polished Greek eloquence, to Ptolemy Philometor the king his pupil — commentaries on the Pentateuch of Moses, most excellent in doctrine and in eloquence, in which he showed that the whole Peripatetic philosophy had been drawn from the Mosaic law.[1] Clement makes mention of these in the fifth book of the Stromata, and Eusebius in the eighth book of the Preparation for the Gospel, and in the Chronicles. There is extant, addressed to this Aristobulus, a letter prefixed at the beginning of the second book of Maccabees, which the senate and the people of Jerusalem transmitted to him in these words: The people who are in Jerusalem and in Judea, and the senate, and Judas, to Aristobulus, teacher of King Ptolemy, who is of the stock of the anointed priests, and to those Jews who are in Egypt, greeting and health. Concerning the great things, etc. [2 Maccabees 1:10]. He flourished under the same Ptolemy Philometor in the 151st Olympiad, that is, in the year 215 before Christ was born.

Arlottus [Arlotto], Minister General of the Order of Minors, by nation a Tuscan, a man eminently learned and a keen disputant, compiled a book inscribed Concordances of the Old and New Testament, in which he fitted together, in becoming order, the testimonies of both Testaments mutually consonant with one another. He flourished under Adolph the Emperor, in the year of the Lord 1290.

Armandus Bellovisus [Armand de Beauvoir], a Dominican, whose work on the difficult terms both of philosophy and of theology is extant, wrote a scholastic postil on the Psalms.

Arnobius the African [Arnobius Afer], who under Diocletian Augustus, in Sicca, a city of Africa, taught rhetoric most flourishingly, and among the other youths whom he trained in declamation had as a pupil Lactantius Firmianus, a man of great and excellent genius and eloquence.[2] When, while still a pagan, he was called to the faith of Christ by hidden inspirations, and in a certain way compelled to belief, he demanded of the bishops of Africa the sacrament of regeneration; and when they rejected him — fearing lest the man, swollen with secular eloquence, might wish to make a mockery of the Christian religion which he had always assailed — he offered them, as an argument of his sincerity, most excellent volumes of disputations against his former religion, as hostages of his faith.

From which auspicious pledge, being received into the church, he is said afterward to have left behind some lucubrations upon the divine scriptures, from among which Trithemius reckons commentaries on the Psalter — of which, however, Jerome, in indicating Arnobius's works, makes no mention. There exist certain small and very brief commentaries on all the psalms according to the tropological and allegorical sense, which Erasmus of Rotterdam issued in print with the Frobenian types, together with a preface of a certain Arnobius written to Laurentius and Rusticus, bishops, a dedicatory epistle being added, in which he contends by many arguments that the work is, beyond any controversy, that of the famous rhetorician Arnobius. But the unpolished style and speech, teeming with countless solecisms and barbarisms, openly proves that its author differs from that Arnobius — of whom we now have seven most eloquent books Against the Nations[3] — more than heaven differs from earth. Which [seven books], although Jerome, writing to Paulinus, reprehends as being uneven in speech, and excessive, and confused without any division of the whole work, he nevertheless confesses to be otherwise most brilliant and happily elaborated by a most flourishing rhetorician.

Nor does that which Erasmus brings forward to excuse the diversity of style much satisfy me — namely, that Arnobius purposely wished, in these commentaries, to lower himself to the speech of the lowest of the common people, so that, all pomp of eloquence being laid aside, he might declare himself a Christian with his whole heart before those who could not be persuaded that he professed the Christian religion with a sincere mind. Which, although I would not deny that it could have been done, yet the diversity of the times most evidently shows the distinction between the two Arnobii. For that this Arnobius, the interpreter of the psalms, was long after the other Arnobius, can easily be detected from the exposition of psalm 109, in which Photinus, the restorer of the Ebionite heresy, is refuted by name. But it cannot be that Arnobius — who had Lactantius, still a young man under the emperor Diocletian, that is, around the year of the Lord 290, as a pupil — could have heard of the heresy of Photinus: who, as is gathered from the fifth book of the Tripartite History and from Jerome both in the catalog and in the chronicles, began to teach the impiety of his dogma in the year of the Lord 358[4] — that is, in the 30th year after Crispus Caesar, son of Constantine the Great, was slain, whose youth Lactantius Firmianus, in his extreme old age, instructed as tutor.[5]

To this is added also a conjecture, in my judgment indeed not to be disapproved: that in the explication of psalm 108, and 117, he assails as heretical the opinion of those who profess that God from eternity predestined some to blessing and reprobated others to cursing. But it is agreed, from the two epistles of Prosper and Hilary to Augustine, that this assertion arose so much under Augustine's own times that not a few most holy men throughout Africa and Gaul complained that no one ever among the ecclesiastical fathers had held those things which Augustine preached — no less newly than uselessly — concerning the eternal discretion of the predestined and the reprobate, made by God. Yet this work, whosesoever it be, appears (for Hierony■ [→ p221: -mus…]

…■mus does not enumerate it among the monuments of Arnobius) to be very ancient: for Bede the Presbyter, in his commentaries on the Psalms, uses its testimonies, marked beforehand with the title of ARNOBIUS.[1] And, if anything is to be granted to suspicions and conjectures, we can conjecture that its author — who, in the exposition of Psalm 105, places himself among the priests — was an African, and lived in Africa in Augustine's age, and dedicated his work to Laurentius and Rusticus, African bishops, whose names are set down in the preface of that same work. For indeed in the Council of Carthage I find that, together with Augustine, there took part a certain Rusticus, a bishop in Africa, and Laurentius, bishop of Icosium, legate of the province of Mauretania. And in these commentaries I find certain expressions everywhere in use among the Africans in Augustine's times — as in the exposition of Psalm 131, where it is read, But upon him shall my sanctification flourish [floriet]. Which expression Floriet Augustine writes to have been in his age in the mouth of the peoples, in the second book On Christian Doctrine, chapter thirteen, in which place, discoursing on the faults of speech, he says: THAT ALSO which we cannot now take from the mouth of the singing peoples — Upon him shall my sanctification flourish [floriet] — detracts nothing indeed from the sense; yet a more skilled hearer would prefer this to be corrected, so that it be said not Floriet but Florebit [both = "shall flourish," floriet being the vulgar form]; nor does anything impede the correction, except the custom of the singers. And in the explanation of Psalm 138, explaining that verse, My bone [os] was not hidden, he says: SINCE indeed my bone is not hidden from thee, that is, my ossum. Which word Augustine affirms to have been commonly corrupted among his own people, in the enarration of the same psalm, saying: He says his os [bone], which is commonly called ossum, and in Latin is called os; but let us rather say ossum. For it is better that the grammarians reprehend us than that the peoples not understand. These few things concerning Arnobius's commentaries on the psalms, which we had to say, we have said.

There are also carried about, under the name of Arnobius the African, certain little mystical annotations of no great moment upon various — but few — passages of the gospels, whose beginning is, In the beginning was the Word, printed at Cologne by Quentel: concerning which I leave to each his own judgment entire. Arnobius flourished under Diocletian up to Constantine the Great, around the year of the Lord 300.

Arnold of Austria [Arnoldus de Austria], a Carmelite, wrote Sermons and Questions on Scripture, in the year of the Lord 1400.

Arnold Haldrenius of Wesel [Arnoldus Haldrenius Vesaliensis], Canon of the Cathedral church of Cologne, a man conspicuous for singular holiness of life and for exact knowledge of sacred Scripture, most skilled also in the three tongues, namely Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, likewise strong in verse and in prose, published a little book on the ten precepts of the decalogue, which begins, If thou wilt enter into life. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1530.

Arnold of Wesel [Arnoldus Vesaluensis] wrote an exegesis of the decalogue, in the year 1542.

Arnulphus, an English preacher, wrote On the Works of the Six Days, one book; likewise homilies and other sermons. He lived in the year of the Lord 1126.

Ascensius, of the Order of Minors, a theologian not obscure, made a Postil on the Apocalypse.

Astensis [of Asti] wrote sermons on the Sunday gospels from Easter up to Advent.

Asterius, bishop of Amasea, a man of sincere piety and great erudition, wrote on Luke chapter 16, one sermon on the rich man and Lazarus, cited in the sixth session of the second Synod of Nicaea.

Asterius of Scythopolis [Asterius Scythopolitanus], the fourth of the Greek expounders of all the psalms. A follower of the Arian faction — whom I would not put in the catalog, unless Jerome before me had done so — under the reign of Constantius Augustus he composed many volumes on the sacred Scriptures, which were most studiously read by the men of his party. But among the rest he wrote most learned commentaries on the Psalter, whose fragments are still preserved in the Greek Catena of the Psalms, his name being prefixed. He gave also brief little commentaries on the four gospels, and on all the epistles of Paul. He flourished in the year 380.

Athanasius, nineteenth bishop of the city of Alexandria, of exceptional sanctity and erudition, a most vigorous champion of the Catholic faith, for whose defense — having endured many snares of the Arians — he fled to Constantius Augustus into Gaul; whence, returned with letters, and again put to flight after his death, he lay hidden until the reign of Jovian [printed "Jovinian"]; by whom, the governance of his church being restored to him, he dies in the year of the Lord 370,[2] having left to posterity many monuments of his distinguished genius, of which those pertaining to the divine scriptures are these.

A Synopsis of the whole of divine Scripture, that is, a Conspectus [Contuitus]: in which he embraced most briefly the arguments, inscriptions, beginnings, authority, and authors of all the books of both testaments. Its beginning is, All our Scripture, we who are Christians.

Of Questions from the Old and New Testament, to Antiochus the prince, one book, containing 162 questions. Its beginning is, Whence it can be declared. Which, however, does not seem to be Athanasius's: I suspect it was collected out of various writings of the fathers by some studious person, who in the fourth question alleges the mystical Theology of Dionysius — unknown, as I judge, to the age of Athanasius — and in question 33 cites Athanasius himself, and brings forth from him a differing opinion.

Commentaries on the Psalter of David.

Likewise, upon the Psalter of David, to Marcellinus, an Isagogic little book On the Titles and Force of the Psalms: in which, from the conference of a certain industrious old man, he teaches most briefly what utility each one can obtain from the settled reading of each particular psalm. Its beginning is, I praise thy will in Christ. Cassiodorus makes mention of this work in his prologue, and at the end of his commentaries on the psalms, saying: A witness is the magnificent discourse of Bishop Athanasius, who, examining the virtues of the psalms with searching truth, proves that all things are there which are contained within the compass of the whole of sacred Scripture.

Commentaries on Ecclesiastes of Solomon.

Commentaries on the Song of Songs.

On that passage from Leviticus chapter 9, And Moses said to Aaron, Approach to the altar, and make a holocaust for thy sin, and for the expiation of thy house — one sermon, which begins, Behold for thee in this place.

On that passage of Matthew 11, All things are delivered to me by my Father — against Eusebius and his followers, one book; [beginning] Not understanding this.

On that passage of Matthew 20 [read 21], Go into the village that is over against you — one sermon, which appears to be a fragment of some commentary, and begins, Because those things which are upon the earth.

On that passage of Matthew 27, And they came to the place which is called Golgotha, up to Truly this was the Son of God — a most eloquent sermon On the Passion of the Lord; [beginning] That which has now been recited, etc.

On Luke chapter 1, a homily On the Lord's Annunciation, concerning the most holy Mother of God [Deipara], beginning, The sacred things of the sacred.

Athanasius is also cited by St. Thomas in the book Against the Errors of the Greeks — in the case [theca], or volume, upon John.

Photius, Archbishop of Constantinople, writes thus concerning the writings and manner of teaching of Athanasius, to his brother Tarasius:[1]

> Athanasius, in his sermons, is everywhere clear in expression, and brief, and simple, yet acute, and lofty, and altogether vehement in his argumentations; and in these there is such abundance that it is admirable. But of logical methods he uses nothing thinly, nothing childishly (like boys and the untaught), but employs them philosophically and magnificently. He is well fortified with the testimonies and demonstrations of the Scriptures for conquering [his adversary] — and above all that discourse which was delivered on the humanity of the Word of God; and the five volumes of books against Arius, which are a trophy over every heresy, but especially over the Arian. And if anyone should say that Gregory the Theologian and the divine Basil, drawing as from a certain fountain out of his book, poured forth those beautiful and most lucid rivers of their own discourse against error, he would not go, as I judge, far from the likelihood [of the truth]. There have also been written by him commentaries on Ecclesiastes, and on the Song of Songs, and likewise on the Psalter, and elsewhere in many places; yet in grace and ornament there truly excel his sermons against Apollinaris, and his epistles — as many as contain the apology for his exile.

Gregory the Theologian celebrated the life of Athanasius in a brilliant oration.

Augustine of Ancona [Augustinus Anconas, Augustinus Triumphus], of the Order of Hermits of St. Augustine, a man learned in the divine scriptures and most practiced in Scholastic Theology and in the sacrosanct decrees of the pontiffs, wrote — with postillating zeal, upon the whole New Testament — the below-written books of commentaries, namely:

On Matthew, one book. On Mark, one book. On Luke, one book. On John, one book. On the Acts of the Apostles, one book. On the Acts of the Apostles, again, a catena from the explanations of the fathers, with insertions of his own throughout the opportune places, questions being proposed and solved in the Scholastic manner. On all the epistles of Paul, 14 books. On all Paul's epistles, a catena from the expositions of the fathers. On the Canonical epistles, 7 books. On the Canonical epistles, a catena from the explanations of the fathers. On the Apocalypse, one book. On the Apocalypse, a catena from the explanations of the fathers.

He wrote also, on the first chapter of Luke, upon He was sent [Luke 1:26], a useful treatise. Likewise, upon the Canticle of the Virgin [the Magnificat], another treatise, in which he prosecuted the words of the Canticle with a threefold exposition; but in both he discoursed copiously about the most sacred incarnation of the divine Word, and about the praises of the Blessed Virgin Mary.

He flourished under Louis IV of Bavaria and Pope John XXII — to whom he dedicated his work On the Power of the Pope — in the year of the Lord 1330.

Augustine of Ascoli [Augustinus de Esculo], of the Order of Hermits of St. Augustine, wrote Lectures on the whole of Scripture. He lived in the year of the Lord 1330.

Augustine Leo [Augustinus Leo], a hermit monk, wrote Sermons on the Lord's Prayer and on the Angelic Salutation.

Augustine of Nebbio [Augustinus Nebiensis; Agostino Giustiniani], bishop in the island of Corsica, by fatherland a Genoese, of the illustrious family of the Giustiniani, a most observant professor of the Order of Preachers, a Theologian sincerely learned, and most skilled in all the tongues that are dispersed throughout the whole world. By a new and vast enterprise, the first of all men, he reduced both instruments of the sacred law [both Testaments] — in five principal tongues, Hebrew, Chaldean, Greek, Latin, and Arabic — into one body, entitled the Octapla, with such artifice that on each single page he arranged eight columns, in which all the aforesaid tongues, expressed in their own characters, corresponding to one another in as many lines and as many words, might be seen at one and the same glance, in this order, namely:

In the first little column he set the Hebrew edition. In the second, a Latin interpretation corresponding to the Hebrew word for word. In the third, the common and Vulgate Latin edition. In the fourth, the Greek. In the fifth, the Arabic. In the sixth, the Targum — that is, the Chaldean paraphrase, written indeed in the Chaldean speech, but in Hebrew letters. In the seventh, a Latin translation corresponding to the Chaldean. In the eighth, certain very brief little scholia, or annotations, scattered and interspersed at intervals, by which he especially refuted the errors of the Jews.

Of this so illustrious a work I have deserved to see only two volumes: namely, from the Old Testament, an Octaple upon the whole Psalter, [dedicated] to Leo X, Supreme Pontiff, printed with types (whose beginning is, I know, most kind Father); and, from the New Testament, an Octaple upon the whole four gospels, [written] by the author's own hand, with ink and [→ p223: red-lead (minio)…]

Aurelius Augustine of Hippo entry. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)*

…and described with red-lead [minium]: whose beginning is, A salutary and great fruit, and increase of usefulness.

This most learned man flourished under Leo X, Supreme Pontiff, being distinguished at Rome in the Lateran Council; and he dies, consumed by a storm at sea, in the year of our salvation 1530, while he was sailing to Corsica for the administration of his church.

Augustine the Roman [Augustinus Romanus], Prior General of the whole Order of Hermits, most learned in Scholastic Theology, a subtle disputant, and practiced in the divine scriptures, published, in scholastic style, 14 books of commentaries on the epistles of Paul, and one book on the Apocalypse. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1410.

Augustine of Gubbio [Augustinus Eugubinus; Agostino Steuco], bishop of Chisamos [Kissamos], by fatherland of Gubbio, prefect of the Apostolic library in the Vatican, distinguished in every kind of wisdom, whose most celebrated work On the Perennial Philosophy is extant, composed upon the Pentateuch of Moses elegant and succinct annotations, most diligently explaining the phrases of the Greek and Hebrew tongue, and the idioms contained in the Mosaic books: whose beginning is, With all labor and study. And he strives, throughout this whole work, so to defend the Latin edition of St. Jerome that he may show there was no translation of the Old Testament, either among the Greeks or among the Latins, better than Jerome's, more elegant, more lucid, and even more Latin; in which, if anything either faulty is found, or dissonant from the Hebrew truth, or added, or subtracted, he demonstrates that all this is either of no moment, or has befallen through the fault of the copyists.

The same man illustrated the first two chapters of Genesis with a most eloquent explanation, which he entitled, by the Greek word, Cosmopoeia, that is, The Fabric of the World; its beginning is, There are two things. Likewise he wrote most eloquent and most learned commentaries on all the Davidic psalms, digested copiously and diligently according to the historical and mystical sense. The opening of the work is, Since, of all the sacred letters. He flourished under Charles V Augustus, in the year of the Lord 1540.

Augustine Steuchus of Gubbio [the same Agostino Steuco] wrote Annotations on the Pentateuch; an interpretation on Psalm 18 and 138; a Cosmopoeia on the first three chapters of Genesis; enarrations on several Psalms and on the book of Job; and Hebraic Expressions [Locutiones Hebraicae]. He flourished at Rome under Paul III, Supreme Pontiff.

Avitus [Alcimus Ecdicius Avitus], by forename Alcimus, of Vienne, bishop in Gaul; most copiously instructed in the secular disciplines, a most distinguished rhetorician and poet, conspicuous for holiness of life and for knowledge of the sacred volumes. He wrote, in the Latin tongue and in hexameter verses:

On the first chapter of Genesis, On the Origin of the World, one book. On the Flood of the world, on the 6th chapter of Genesis, one book. On the Crossing of the Red Sea, on the 13th [read 14th] chapter of Exodus, one book.

He flourished under the Emperor Zeno, in the year of the Lord 500. There are said to be six books of the same author, composed in heroic verse on Genesis and Exodus, extant at Vienna in the library of Wolfgang Lazius.

Aurelius Augustine [of Hippo], bishop of Hippo, by nation an African, by fatherland of Tagaste — a man above all mortals who were before him and after him up to now; endowed with an admirable sharpness of genius, instructed in all the liberal disciplines, most fully imbued with the Platonic philosophy, not ignorant of the Aristotelian doctrine, by far the most learned of all in the divine Scriptures, and in their explanation sublime with an incomparable subtlety beyond what can be told. He surpassed all the writers of the Latin Church in the labor of writing and in the multitude of his lucubrations, having published more than one thousand and thirty volumes of every kind of discipline:[1] of which he composed expressly, upon all the books of divine scripture here and there, very many exegetical writings of diverse kinds — that is, explanatory writings — which he himself, in the preface of his Retractations, divided into three parts, that is, into Epistles, Tractates, and Books.

In the Epistles he satisfied friends who consulted him about various difficulties of divine scripture. In the Tractates — under whose number are comprehended homilies, or sermons, and other enarrations of the divine volumes to the people — he discoursed publicly on the sacred letters, before the assembly, with his own voice. But the Books he, in the Retractations, divided into four orders, namely into Annotations, Questions, Disputations, and Continuous expositions. In the books of Annotations, passing over many things, he touched here and there only a few — cursorily, briefly, and lightly — which pertain to the understanding of the words and of the letter. In the books of Questions he proposes for inquiry, and resolves, various doubts from diverse passages of the scriptures. In the books of Disputations he most strongly defends some part of divine scripture that has been assailed by the calumnies of heretics. In the books of Continuous explanation he explains anew some parts of both testaments, in a continuous course of exposition, according to the varied understanding both of the letter and of the spirit.

And all these things Augustine attests, at the end of the Retractations, to have been produced by him in three ways, namely by dictating, by speaking, and by writing. Of the kind of Spoken works are the Tractates delivered to the people — to hear which, as Posidonius is witness, the heretics themselves also, together with the catholics, moved by the sanctity and erudition of the man, used to run together with vast eagerness from all Africa, bringing with them notaries who would take down and write out what was caught from his mouth. Of the number of the Dictated works are many epistles, and very many Tractates to the common people, and also some books. Of the order of the Written works are the books of Continuous exposition, the books of Questions, and of Disputations: which, with greater diligence and skill applied, he himself wrote more accurately.

Nor do I think this ought to be passed over in this place: that he himself, in the reading of his little works, wished the readers to observe, namely, the variety and the fourfold order of the times in which it befell them to be written.[2] For he wrote some things when he was a Catechumen, in■ [→ p224: -flated (inflatus) with secular letters…]

[1] Augustine published more than 1030 volumes. [2] St. Augustine warns the reader to observe the fourfold variety of the times in which he composed his works.

(Rich PDF p. 224 [printed folio 205]. Book IV, catalog letter A: the Aurelius Augustine of Hippo entry continues — the fourfold chronology of his works, his style (his preference for the Italic version; "I prefer that the grammarians reprehend me…"), his commonplaces, and the beginning of the list of his exegetical works: On Christian Doctrine, and the anti-Manichaean Disputations (against Adimantus, against Faustus, against an unnamed adversary of the Law and Prophets). Running head: LIBER QVARTVS.)

…■flated with the habit of secular letters; others he composed when first he was baptized, and still raw and a novice in the sacred letters; others he wrote when made a presbyter, more erudite and learned; and others, finally, when raised to the episcopate — by far the most learned of all. This distinction of the times Augustine therefore judged should be observed, so that from the consideration of it the readers might notice how he himself, after the manner of learners, gradually advanced by writing;[1] and thus they would the more easily pardon him if they should find anything erroneous in his earlier writings, and would take refuge in his last lucubrations as in the more erudite and firmer decrees of the author.

Besides these, he published also many other exoteric writings, in which — in passing, and as though doing something else — he explained, on various occasions, very many things here and there about the divine letters. Omitting these, I have collected only the exegetical works, and those that were composed by him of set purpose in the explanation and defense of the sacred volumes. The rest, if anyone desires to know, let him read the two books of the Retractations, in which Augustine reviewed and retracted the greater part of his labors.

His manner of teaching, in all the aforesaid works, always and everywhere savors of the same author; yet in the Books he is more erudite, acute, and — by the subtlety of sublime matters — more recondite than in the Tractates: so much so that Jerome, in a certain epistle, does not fear to call him the most obscure expositor of the scriptures.[2] He abounds, moreover, in a most copious supply of questions, disputations, argumentations, and reasonings; and, above all the ecclesiastical writers, he flows forth with the testimonies and sentences of divine scripture, like a great river overflowing with the winter's snow. In the Tractates the style is somewhat more sparing, and more open, and better accommodated to allegorical and moral explanations: in which Augustine, on account of the ears of the unskilled multitude, often lowers himself even to barbarism, frequently having that saying in his mouth, I prefer that the grammarians reprehend me, rather than that the peoples not understand[3] — choosing rather to be understood in barbarisms, even with the grammarians condemning them, than to abandon his hearers in the midst of eloquence. But he uses, in all his explanations, the translation of divine scripture of his own times, which was called the Italic;[4] for he himself, in the second book On Christian Doctrine, prefers it above the rest, as much for its fidelity of words as for its perspicuity of sentences, to the Latin editions.

His commonplaces, most peculiar to him — and with which above all his exegetical volumes are filled — are these: on the Holy Trinity, Foreknowledge, Election, Predestination, Vocation, Justification, Reprobation, Hardening; on Grace and free will; on Faith and works; on Gifts and merits; on Original Sin; and on other dogmas like these — with moral topics occasionally interspersed, which are in use among all the enarrators.

The kind of his oration and diction is most fruitful and most exuberant, most rich and most copious — not to say excessive — redounding with an affluence of diverse matters, and, with periods drawn out to length, mixedly and indiscriminately rolling and snatching along with itself very many things at once, wandering with digressions, excursions, and roundabout ways; [a style] which requires an ingenious, attentive, mindful, and patient reader — whom, lest he be wearied by the tedium of prolixity, he is wont to refresh with certain Punic [African] witticisms, playing very often with similarly-advancing and similarly-falling clauses, and with other not-unpleasant figures of the rhetoricians, which soften the long and intricate journey of a prolix reading. Let these things, concerning the kind of his lucubrations, the manner of teaching, and the character of speech usual to Augustine, be said sufficiently. But those works which he elaborated upon the individual and the universal parts of both testaments are these.

Upon the whole body of divine Scripture: On Christian Doctrine, four books; in which, for the instruction of him who is to be an expositor of holy scripture, he hands down the precepts of reading, understanding, and interpreting the sacred letters — showing by the aid of which tongues and arts, and by the reading of which authors, and by what rules he has need who inquires into the senses of the Scriptures; and what modes of narrating and expounding the expositor of the sacred volumes ought to have. The work begins, There are certain precepts.

Upon both Testaments: thirty-six books of Disputations against the heretics who blaspheme the Old Testament and accuse the New of falsification. Of these, while he was still a presbyter, he wrote one against Adimantus, a disciple of Manichaeus — who had put out a destructive volume against the ancient testament, setting forth in it, by antithesis, many testimonies from both testaments as though contrary to one another; wishing, namely, by this craft to persuade that the whole Old Testament fights hostilely with the New, and is therefore to be cast away by Christians. This machination Augustine overthrew in this book, the passages of both scriptures which seemed to disagree among themselves being reduced to true concord. The work begins, Concerning that which is written.

Then, having been made a bishop, he published thirty-three books of Disputations against Faustus, bishop of the Manichees[5] — who, having published an impious volume against all the divine letters, strove above all to demonstrate two things: first, that the whole Old Testament was framed, for the deception of the human race, by the worst demon, and afterwards augmented by the Jews themselves with obscene and impious narrations; then, that all the scriptures of the New Instrument had been falsified by certain Semi-Jews, who — in order to win credit for the Old Testament — deceitfully inserted the testimonies of Moses and the prophets into the Evangelical books. These impious blasphemies Augustine most strongly confuted in these thirty-three books. Their beginning is, There was a certain Faustus.

The same [Augustine], in his episcopate, composed the remaining two books of Disputations, against a certain unnamed Manichee who had put out a book against the Law and the Prophets. And since he did not know his name, he entitled the work Against an Adversary of the Law and the Prophets. Its beginning is, The book which you sent. He wrote likewise on [→ p225: Gene(sis)…]

[1] Augustine advanced by writing. [2] Augustine was, to Jerome, the most obscure expositor of the scriptures. [3] A distinguished saying of St. Augustine. [4] St. Augustine used the Italic translation of the Scriptures. [5] St. Augustine refuted the blasphemies of Faustus the Manichee.

Book IV, catalog letter A: the Aurelius Augustine entry continues — his Books of Questions on both Testaments, the Mirror of the Scriptures*, the (disputed)* On the Marvels of Sacred Scripture*; then his works on particular parts: the* Locutions and Questions on the Heptateuch, and the great cluster on Genesis (the fifteen books of continuous exposition — against the Manichees, the unfinished On Genesis according to the Letter*, and the twelve-book* On Genesis according to the Letter*; Confessions 11–13; the dialogue of 75 Questions; and 21 Genesis sermons). Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)*

…the kind of Questions.

Upon both Testaments, here and there, six books; namely, from the whole Old Testament, two scattered books, of which the first begins, What is God?, and the second thus, Against those who deny. Upon the whole New Testament, two books, of which the former begins, God certainly is perfect, and the other, Why [things were] done and said. Likewise, from both testaments mixedly, 2 books; of these, one begins, You have heard what he attests, and the other, What is [made] to the image. To these books a seventh also can be added, which is entitled Of Eighty-three Questions, thus beginning, Every truth.

He collected also, upon both testaments, a volume which he entitled the Mirror of the Scriptures [Speculum Scripturarum], gathering into it, according to the order of the divine books, all things that are found in the sacred letters for the forming of morals. The opening of the work runs thus, Who is ignorant. There are also carried about, under the title of Augustine, upon the whole Scripture, three books On the Marvels of Sacred Scripture [De mirabilibus sacrae Scripturae], embracing the individual wondrous events narrated in both testaments, with brief elucidations according to the letter occasionally added, and little questions — yet resolved by no fixed determination. These Thomas Aquinas, in the 43rd question of the third part, denies to be a work of Augustine's;[1] which indeed begins thus, Since, of Almighty God. And these are the works of Augustine which pertain to the whole body of holy scripture. But those which regard the particular parts of divine scripture, now receive.

Upon the Heptateuch, after receiving the episcopate, he wrote seven books of Annotations, which he marked beforehand with the title Of Expressions [Locutionum], for this reason: that in them he had annotated the expressions, idioms, and phrases of the Greek and Hebrew scripture which occur here and there in the first seven books of the old testament. The work begins, The expressions of the scriptures. The same [work] he wrote, having been raised to the episcopate.

Upon the Heptateuch, seven books of Questions: in which, passing over the first three chapters of Genesis (elsewhere most copiously expounded by himself), he discoursed various questions upon the remaining chapters of the seven volumes, more with the zeal of inquiring than with the mind of deciding. The work begins, Since with the scriptures, etc.

He labored also upon the first three chapters of Genesis — that is, from the beginning of the book up to the ejection of the first parents from Paradise — [producing] fifteen books of continuous exposition. Namely: when he was in Africa, shortly after receiving the sacrament of baptism, [he wrote] on Genesis according to allegory, against the Manichees (assailants of the Mosaic history), two books; in which, since he did not yet dare to explain the secrets of natural and divine things, hidden in the Mosaic words, according to the letter and the propriety of history, he followed the allegorical sense, as being then easier for him. The work begins, If the Manichees should choose.

Then, having been made a presbyter, he composed On Genesis according to the Letter, unfinished, one book — wishing to try how much he could avail by his genius in the historical kind of explaining, the most difficult of all.[2] But when, scarcely and with difficulty, he had reached, by historical explanation, that sentence, Let us make man, he sank under so great a mass of the burden, and rested from the labor which he could not sustain, abandoning the book unfinished: whose opening is, On the obscure [matters] of natural things.

At last, after his elevation to the episcopate, being made bolder, he wrote upon the first three chapters of Genesis, On Genesis according to the Letter, twelve books. In which, although he himself confesses that more things were sought by him than found, and of those found fewer confirmed, and [many] left, as it were, still to be more diligently investigated, in the open: yet there is in them so great a treasure of all the arts, disciplines, and sciences, that it easily appears that nothing more erudite or more sublime, in the exposition of these three chapters, has come forth either before or after Augustine's times — nor perhaps will come forth hereafter, in future times. But it pleased Augustine to determine nothing in this work about natural things with fixed assertion, lest he should give occasion to the pagan wise men of mocking the sacred letters, and should shut the way of believing to the unbelievers — who, when they saw some of our enarrators of Genesis gravely erring in these works of nature (which had already been shown, by the most learned men, with most certain experience and demonstration), and, what is more shameful, confirming their errors with the testimonies of divine Scripture, used to deride our Writers and Scriptures as unlearned, absurd, and false, judging also that the rest, which are contained in them concerning the Incarnation, Death, and Resurrection of the Son of God, had been written with a like vanity. Therefore, lest Augustine should be a ruin to those men, he preferred to weave the present work by prudently inquiring rather than by rashly defining. Its beginning is, All divine Scripture.

The same [Augustine], as he himself recounts in the second book of the Retractations, wrote again upon the first chapter of Genesis, three Books — which he inserted into the Books of Confessions published by him; and among them [the Confessions] they are the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth.

There is also carried about a book, or dialogue, Of 75 Questions, under the title of Augustine, in which, Orosius and Augustine conversing, various passages from the first twelve chapters of Genesis are explained. Besides these there are extant:

Upon various passages of Genesis, homilies, or tractates, or sermons — 21, namely:

On Genesis chapter one, six Tractates or Sermons, cited by Trithemius, but not yet seen by me. Likewise, on the beginning of the first chapter, one sermon, which is among the sermons On the Season [de tempore], no. 133. On Genesis 2, on the tree of knowledge, one tractate, which begins, We read in Genesis. On Genesis 6, on the Cataclysm [the Flood], one sermon, which is On the Season, no. 69. On Genesis 12, on Abraham, one sermon, which is On the Season, no. 51. On Genesis 15, on the three-year-old heifer, sermon 1, On the Season, no. 54. On Genesis 18, on the three men seen by Abraham, sermon 1, On the Season, no. 70.

On Genesis 19, on Lot and his daughters, homily 1, which is [of … — a word left blank in the print], no. 5. On Genesis 19, on the things which are figured in Lot and his wife, sermon 1, which is To the Hermits, no. 34. On Genesis 22, on the temptation of Abraham, sermon 1, de tempore [On the Season], no. 72. On Genesis 22, on the immolation of Isaac, two sermons, which are de tempore, nos. 71 and 73. On Genesis 25, on the conception of Rebecca, sermon 1, de tempore, no. 68. On Genesis 28, on Jacob's ladder, sermon 1, de tempore, no. 79. On Genesis 37, on the dream of Joseph, sermon 1, de tempore, no. 81. On Genesis 39, on Joseph and his mistress, sermon 1, de tempore, no. 83. On Genesis 42, on Jacob — from whom it was hidden that Joseph was in Egypt — sermon 1, de tempore, no. 82.

There remains, finally, upon Genesis 49, a small little commentary on the blessings of the patriarchs, published in dialogue, under the title of Augustine, which begins, How is it to be understood. It is thought to have been collected by some studious person out of the book of Jerome's Questions on Genesis. After these are held [these]:

Upon Exodus, eleven sermons, namely: On the first chapter, on the death of Joseph and the multiplication of the sons of Israel, one sermon, de tempore, no. 84. On the same chapter, on the straw of the Egyptians, sermon 1, de tempore, no. 85. On Exodus 2, on the nativity of Moses, sermon 1, de tempore, no. 86. On Exodus 3, on the appearance of the Lord in the bush, sermon 1, which is from those added to the tenth tome, no. 18. On the same, on the words of God, I am who I am, tractate 1, which is held in tome 9. On Exodus 4, on the hardening of Pharaoh, sermon 1, de tempore, no. 88. On Exodus 7, on the ten plagues of Egypt, sermon 1, de tempore, no. 87. On Exodus 14, on Pharaoh, sermon 1, de tempore, no. 89. On Exodus 15, on the journey of three days, sermon 1, de tempore, no. 90. On the same, on the bitter water and the manna, sermon 1, de tempore, no. 91. On Exodus 31, on the sons of Israel, sermon 1, de tempore, no. 97.

Upon Numbers, six sermons, namely: On chapter 13, on the spies and the cluster [of grapes], sermon 1, de tempore, no. 100. On Numbers 14, on the people that died in the desert, sermon 1, de tempore, no. 102. On Numbers 16, on the censers, sermon 1, de tempore, no. 98. On Numbers 17, on the rod of Aaron, sermon 1, de tempore, no. 99. On Numbers 21, on the bronze serpent, one sermon, de tempore, no. 101. On Numbers 22, on Balaam, sermon 1, de tempore, no. 103.

Upon Joshua, the first chapter: That, by the just judgment of God, the sons of Israel received the land of promise, sermon 1, de tempore, no. 105. On Joshua 6, on Rahab and the overthrow of Jericho, sermon 1, de tempore, no. 106.

Upon the book of Judges, chapter six, on Gideon, two sermons: one, which is de tempore, no. 108; the other among the homilies …. [a reference left blank in the print]. On Judges 14, on Samson, sermon 1, de tempore, no. 107.

Upon [the books of] Kings, Augustine attempted a volume of Questions, after the likeness of those which he had written on the Heptateuch; but, not having advanced much further in the work — since he was called to other matters that pressed more urgently — he broke off the labor. The second book of the Retractations makes mention of this work, which is now wanting.

He wrote also another book, to Simplicianus, bishop of Milan, On the Solution of Five Questions from the Books of Kings, namely: On the 1st book of Kings, chapter 10, on the spirit of the Lord leaping upon Saul, question 1. On 1 Kings 15, on the repentance of God, that he had made Saul king, question 1. On 1 Kings 28, on Samuel called back from the dead through the Pythoness [the witch of Endor], question 1. On 2 Kings 7, on David entering and sitting before the Lord, question 1. On 3 Kings 17, on Elijah expostulating with God, that he had slain the widow's son, question 1.

Likewise, upon various passages of Kings, 10 sermons, that is: On 1 Kings 17, on David and Goliath, sermon 1, de tempore, no. 196. On the same, on David's single combat, sermon 1, which is in book 50, homily one. On 3 Kings 3, on Solomon's judgment concerning the two harlots, one sermon, de tempore, no. 200. On 3 Kings 19, on Elijah, sermon 1, de tempore, no. 201. On 4 Kings 2, on Elisha mocked by the boys, two sermons, which are de tempore, nos. 204 and 206. On 4 Kings 5, on Naaman the Syrian, sermon 1, de tempore, no. 207. On the same, on Elisha and Gehazi, sermon 1, de tempore, no. 208. On 4 Kings 6, on Elisha and the axe fallen into the stream, sermon 1, de tempore, no. 210. On the same, on the famine of Samaria, sermon 1, de tempore, no. 211.

Upon Tobit, sermon 1, de tempore, no. 226. Upon Judith, two sermons, which are de tempore, nos. 228 and 229.

Upon Job, when he was a bishop, he collected a volume of Annotations; concerning which he himself, in the second book of the Retractations, speaks thus:

> A book, whose title is Annotations on Job — whether it is to be reckoned mine, or rather theirs who, as they were able or willing, reduced them (written on the margins of the codex) into one body, I could not easily say. For they are agreeable to very few who understand them, while it is inevitable that many, not understanding, are offended: because not even the very words which are expounded are, in many places, so written out that it may appear what is being expounded. Then, upon the brevity of the sentences there followed so great an obscurity that the reader can scarcely bear it — one who must needs pass over very many things not understood. Finally, I found the work itself so full of errors in our codices that I could not correct it; nor would I wish it to be said to have been published by me — except that I know the brethren have it, by whose zeal it cannot be denied [to others].

The work begins, And great works.

Upon the Psalter, Tractates (or Enarrations) of continuous and entire exposition, 205,[1] [→ p227: which…]

[1] The Enarrations of St. Augustine on the Psalms are 205 [in number].

(Rich PDF p. 227 [printed folio 208]. Book IV, catalog letter A: the Aurelius Augustine entry continues — the character of the Enarrations on the Psalms (and Jerome's censure of them); a catalog of nineteen further sermons on Psalm verses; sermons on Proverbs, Wisdom, Isaiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel; then, with the Old Testament done, the New: On the Harmony of the Evangelists, and the threefold treatment of Matthew (the Sermon on the Mount, the Evangelical Questions, and the homilies). Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

…which — partly as a presbyter, partly as a bishop, up to the end of his life — he enarrated before the assembly, no order being kept, treating now this psalm, now that.[1] These tractates, pious and benevolent hearers, collected from his mouth, digested into a whole and ordered body, such as we now have. The kind of exposition is everywhere allegorical and moral, touching but little on the literal understanding: stricter and more accurate in the first several psalms, in the later ones more diffuse, and running out into long digressions. Jerome, in his epistles to Augustine, seems to censure these commentaries as too obscure,[2] and in some places also as differing from the right line, and from his own [Jerome's] mind, and from that of all the Greek expositors. I suspect that Jerome missed, in these enarrations, an explication of the Psalms according to the purity of the Hebrew truth and the opinion of the Greek expositors. But since Augustine was ignorant of the Hebrew tongue,[3] and was not so instructed in Greek letters that he could unroll the Greek commentaries with a free hand, it was necessary that he often — out of a poverty of literal understanding — bend aside, from the true and proper sense of the letter, to wrested allegories. The work begins, All scripture.

Besides these Tractates, there are extant also another nineteen sermons upon various verses of the Psalms, of which the catalog is this: On the first Psalm entire, one sermon, which is held in the book of Questions on the Old Testament, question 110. On Psalm 9, upon To thee is the poor man left, sermon 1, de tempore, no. 110. On Psalm 16 [read 26], upon Wait for the Lord, do manfully, one sermon, among the 50 homilies, no. 11. On the whole of Psalm 21, an epistle to Honoratus, which is no. 120. On the whole of Psalm 23, one sermon, held in the book of Questions on the Old Testament, question 111. On Psalm 33, upon Who is the man that desireth life?, one sermon, which is of the 50 homilies, the first. On Psalm 40, on the beginning of the same psalm, one sermon, which is among the 50 homilies the thirty-ninth. On Psalm 45, upon Be still and see that I am God, one sermon, de tempore, no. 251. On Psalm 49, upon God shall come manifestly, two sermons: one de tempore, no. 220; the other, no. 28, in the book of 50 homilies. Likewise on Psalm 49, upon Sitting, thou didst speak against thy brother, one sermon, which is among the 50 homilies the second. On Psalm 50, one sermon, held in the book of Questions on the Old Testament, question 112. On Psalm 67, upon As smoke faileth, sermon 1, de tempore, no. 109. On Psalm 83, upon My heart and my flesh, one sermon, among the 50 homilies the thirty-third. On Psalm 94, upon Come, let us adore, sermon 1, which is On the Words of the Apostle, no. 11. On Psalm 97, upon Sing and make melody on the harp, sermon 1, de tempore, no. 221. On Psalm 117, on the first verse of the psalm, sermon 1, among the 50 homilies, no. 36. On Isaiah 58, upon Break thy bread to the hungry, sermon 1, among the 50 homilies, no. 17. On Ezekiel chapter 34, two books: one on the shepherds, in which the former part of this chapter is expounded; the other on the sheep, in which the latter part is explained. The work begins, Our hope. On Daniel 3, on the three boys, sermon 1, de tempore, no. 240. On Daniel 13, on Susanna, two sermons, which are de tempore, nos. 118 and 242.

Thus far reach the things which Augustine wrote upon the Old Testament; now follow those which he composed upon the New.

Upon the four Gospels: On the Harmony of the Evangelists, four books — which, having been made a Bishop, he wrote against certain rash calumniators who accused the writers of the four Gospels with the mark of ignorance and of falsehood, [charging] that they had said many things dissonant among themselves, conflicting, and destructive of one another; but he showed that the Evangelists were in nothing discordant, neither among themselves, nor with their own selves. The work begins, Among all.

Upon Matthew, he brought a threefold kind of exposition, that is, the Questionary, the Continuous, and the Homiletic.

In the Continuous kind, while he was still a presbyter, he wrote On the Lord's Sermon on the Mount, upon the fifth, sixth, and seventh chapters, two books — showing that in that same sermon are contained all the precepts which pertain to the forming of the Christian man's life. The work begins, The sermon which.

In the Questionary kind, being now a bishop, he collected one book of Evangelical Questions, not according to the order of the evangelical chapters, but according to the occasions of those who consulted him with such questions; which afterward, when he was revising the book, he reduced into order, numbers being added, lest the reader should be offended by the tedium of a disturbed order. But the carelessness of the copyists again confused the order, the former part of the book being torn away and cast to the end of the volume of Questions from the gospel according to Luke. The work begins, It is not so written.

In the Homiletic kind, he left homilies, or sermons delivered to the people, 43, namely: On Matthew chapter 2, on the coming of the Magi, sermon, which is On the Saints, the ninth. On the same [→ p228…]

[1] [These enarrations were] collected by his own hearers, as he was making [these] words to the people. [2] Jerome censures St. Augustine's Enarrations on the Psalms as too obscure. [3] Augustine was ignorant of the Hebrew tongue.

[Aurelius Augustine, continued from p228 — the Tractates on John:]

…■tes, 124, written down from the mouth of the speaker by notaries, of a continuous exposition — from the beginning of the Gospel, namely, up to the end. Of this work no mention is made in the books of the Retractations, because it is of the number of the Spoken works,[1] as are also the enarrations on the psalms. Its beginning is, Divine scripture, to all. He had also, besides these tractates, upon the same gospel, 42 sermons, namely:

On John chapter 1, upon In the beginning was the Word, two sermons, which are de tempore, no. 134, and de verbis Domini, no. 38. On the same, upon He was in the world, sermon 1, de verbis Domini, no. 39. On the same, upon When thou wast under the fig tree, sermon 1, de verbis Domini, no. 40. On John 2, on the water changed into wine, two sermons, which are de verbis Domini, no. 41, and de tempore, no. 41. On John 5, on the sick man, sermon 1, de verbis Domini, no. 42. On the same, upon If I bear witness of myself, sermon 1, de verbis Domini, no. 43. On the same, upon As the Father raiseth up the dead, two sermons, de verbis Domini, no. 44, and of the 50 homilies, no. 22. On the same, upon Search the scriptures, sermon 1, de verbis Domini, no. 45. On the same, upon The Son of man cannot do anything of himself, sermon 1, of the 50 homilies, no. 32. On the same, upon The hour cometh, and now is, when the dead, sermon 1, de verbis Domini, no. 64. On the same, upon He that eateth my flesh, sermon 1, de verbis Domini, no. 46. On John 8, on the adulteress, sermon 1, de verbis Domini, no. 47. On the same, upon If you continue in my word, sermon 1, de verbis Domini, no. 48. On John 9, on the man born blind, sermon 1, of the 50 homilies, no. 43. On John 10, on the shepherd, and the hireling, and the thief, sermon 1, de verbis Domini, no. 49. On the same, on the Good Shepherd, one sermon, de verbis Domini, no. 50. On the same, upon I and the Father are one, sermon 1, de verbis Domini, no. 51. On John 11, on Lazarus, two sermons, de verbis Domini, no. 51, and de tempore, no. 104. On the same, upon He that believeth in me, believeth in him that sent me, sermon 1. On John 12, upon He that loveth his life, sermon 1, of the 50 homilies, no. 37. On John 13, on the Lord's Supper, sermon 1, To the Hermits, no. 28. On John 14, upon I am the way, three sermons, de verbis Domini, nos. 54 and 55, and of the 50 homilies, no. 34. On the same, upon The things which I speak, I speak not of myself, sermon 1, de verbis Domini, no. 56. On the same, upon My peace I give unto you, two sermons, de verbis Domini, no. 57, and from those added to the tenth tome, the last. On the same, upon Let not your heart be troubled, sermon 1, de verbis Domini, no. 58. On John 15, upon You are my friends, two sermons. On the same, upon He riseth from supper [John 13:4], sermon 1, de tempore, no. 127. On the same, upon I am the vine, sermon 1, de verbis Domini, no. 59. On John 16, upon It is expedient for you that I go, sermon 1, de verbis Domini, no. 60. On the same, upon He shall convince the world of sin, sermon 1, de verbis Domini, no. 61. On John 19, on Joseph asking Pilate [for the body], sermon 1, de tempore, no. 132. On the same, on the sepulchre of the Lord, sermon 1, de tempore, no. 133. On John 20, on Magdalene weeping at the monument, sermon 1, de tempore, no. 152. On John 21, on the manifestation of Christ at the sea of Tiberias, sermon 1, de tempore, no. 148. On the same, upon Peter, lovest thou me, sermon 1, de verbis Domini, no. 62. On the same, upon Lovest thou me more than these, sermon 1, de sanctis, no. 24.

Upon the Acts of the Apostles, he brought forth four sermons, namely: On Acts 3, on the going up of Peter and John into the temple, sermon 1, On the Words of the Apostle, no. 29. On Acts 4, upon No one possessed anything of his own, sermon 1, On the Words of the Apostle, no. 27. On Acts 9, on the conversion of Paul, sermon 1, de sanctis, no. 14. On Acts 10, on the ecstasy of mind in Peter, sermon 1, de sanctis, no. 45.

Upon the Epistle to the Romans, he dictated two books: one of an interpolated exposition upon various passages of that epistle here and there — while he was still a presbyter at Carthage, where, when the epistle was being read among his intimates, and he himself, being questioned by them, answered, this book was taken down by the questioners out of responses of that kind; which begins, These are the senses. But the other book he undertook as of a continuous exposition; yet, when he had consumed one whole book upon the salutation of the epistle alone,[2] deterred by the magnitude and labor of the work to come, he desisted from what he had begun, and left only this book — which he had made the first of the whole work — under the title Of the Begun [Unfinished] Exposition [Inchoatae expositionis]. Its beginning is, In the epistle which, etc.

To these he added, upon various sentences of the same epistle, ten sermons, namely: On Romans 7, upon When we were in the flesh, sermon 1, On the Words of the Apostle, no. 4. On the same, upon The law worketh sin, sermon 1, On the Words of the Apostle, no. 5. On the same, upon Therefore I myself serve, sermon 1, On the Words of the Apostle, no. 6. On the same, upon Not the good that I will, two sermons, de tempore, nos. 43 and 45. On the same, upon I am delighted with the law of God, sermon 1, de tempore, no. 47. On Romans 8, upon If God be for us, who is against us?, sermon 1, On the Words of the Apostle, no. 16. On the same, upon I speak a human thing because of the infirmity, sermon 1, On the Words of the Apostle, no. 17. On the same, upon By hope we are saved, sermon 1, On the Words of the Apostle, no. 25. On Romans 9, upon I will have mercy on whom I will, sermon 1, On the Words of the Apostle, no. 22.

On the same, upon On whom he will, he hath mercy, one book On Predestination and Grace, beginning, Since in the sacred [scriptures]. On the same, upon For Rebecca also, up to that, Unless the Lord of Sabaoth, one Question, On the Cause of Election and Reprobation, to Simplicianus.

[1] Why Augustine, in the books of the Retractations, made no mention of the Tractates on the Gospel of John [namely, because they are reckoned among his "Spoken" works]. [2] St. Augustine wrote one book upon the salutation alone of the Epistle to the Romans.

(Rich PDF p. 230 [printed folio 211]. Book IV, catalog letter A: the close of the vast Aurelius Augustine entry — his works on the Pauline epistles (Corinthians through Timothy), the Catholic epistles (James, Peter, John) and the Apocalypse; then the concluding note on those who anthologized him (Peter of Tripoli, Bede, Bartholomew of Urbino), his biographers, and his death at Hippo under the Vandal siege (AD 430). The entry for Aurelius Cassiodorus then opens. Running head: LIBER QVARTVS.)

Upon the first epistle to the Corinthians, chapter 6, upon Know you not that your bodies, sermon 1, On the Words of the Apostle, no. 18. On 1 Corinthians 7, upon that, To them that are married, not I, but the Lord, command, two books, to Pollentius, showing that those who have made a divorce ought to remain unmarried; the work begins, The first question. On 1 Corinthians 9, upon So I fight, not as one beating the air, sermon 1, which is On the Words of the Apostle, no. 21. On 1 Corinthians 10, upon Let no temptation take hold of you but such as is human, sermon 1. On 1 Corinthians 12, how we ought to love one another by the example of the members, sermon 1, of the 50 homilies, no. 15. On 2 Corinthians 3, upon The letter killeth, the spirit quickeneth, [there is] On the Spirit and the Letter, to Marcellinus, one book, beginning, The little works being read. On 2 Corinthians 5, upon All must be made manifest before the tribunal of God, two sermons, which are On the Words of the Apostle, nos. 19 and 20. On the same, upon We are ambassadors for Christ, sermon 1, which is of the 50 homilies, no. 49.

Upon the epistle to the Galatians, while he was still a presbyter, he composed one book of a continuous and succinct exposition, beginning, The cause for which. On the 2nd chapter to the Galatians, when he was a bishop, he wrote — on Peter being reprehended by Paul — two epistles to Jerome, of which one begins, Never equally, the other, I give thanks. On Galatians 3, upon If a law had been given which could justify, sermon 1, which is On the Words of the Apostle, no. 13. On Galatians 5, upon Walk in the spirit, sermon 1, which is On the Words of the Apostle, no. 3. On Galatians 6, upon Bear ye one another's burdens, two sermons, which are On the Words of the Apostle, nos. 23 and 24. On the same, upon God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross, sermon 1, which is from those added to the tenth tome, no. 15.

Upon the epistle to the Ephesians, chapter 3, upon That you may be able to comprehend what is the breadth, sermon 1, which is of the 50 homilies, no. 3. On the same, upon I ask that I be not weakened, sermon 1, which is On the Words of the Apostle, no. 7. On Ephesians 4, upon Putting away malice, sermon 1, which is de tempore, no. 221. On Ephesians 5, upon See how you walk circumspectly, sermon 1, which is On the Words of the Apostle, no. 26. On Ephesians 6, upon Peace to the brethren, and charity, sermon 1, which is of the 50 homilies, no. 17.

Upon the epistle to the Philippians, chapter three, upon We are not circumcised, sermon 1, which is On the Words of the Apostle, no. 5. On the same, upon According to the justice which is of the law, sermon 1, which is de tempore, no. 221.

Upon the first [read: second] epistle to the Thessalonians, [chapter] 3, upon He that will not work, let him not eat [2 Thessalonians 3:10], [there is] On the Work of Monks, to Aurelius, bishop of Carthage, one book, in which it is discussed whether monks who neglect Paul's precept ought to be compelled to labor; its beginning is, At thy command, holy brother Aurelius. On 1 Thessalonians 4, upon I would not have you sorrow concerning them that sleep, sermon 1, which is On the Words of the Lord, no. 34.

Upon the first epistle to Timothy, [chapter] 1, upon A faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, three sermons, which are On the Words of the Apostle, nos. 8, 9, and 10. On 1 Timothy 6, [upon] That the root of all evils is covetousness, one sermon, which is of the 50 homilies, no. 8. On the 2nd epistle to Timothy, [chapter] 3, upon All that will live godly in Christ, [there is] On the Conflict of the Vices, one book — in which it is shown that, without the persecution of the vices, no one can be saved; and it begins, The apostolic voice. Some think it is not Augustine's. On 2 Timothy 4, upon Preach the word, be instant in season, sermon 1, which is of the 50 homilies, no. 5.

Upon the epistle of James, being a bishop, he dictated one book of Annotations, collected by the diligence of his hearers, which begins, To the twelve tribes. On James 2, upon Whosoever shall offend in one [point], [there is] one epistle to Jerome, which is among his epistles no. 29. On James 5, upon Swear not, sermon 1, On the Words of the Apostle, no. 30. On the same, upon Confess [your sins] one to another, sermon 1, of the 50 homilies, no. 12.

Upon the epistle of 1 Peter, chapter two, upon Laying aside all malice, sermon 1, of the 50 homilies, no. 20. On 1 Peter 3, on Christ preaching to the spirits that were in prison, [there is] one epistle to Evodius, which is [epistle] no. 99. On 2 Peter 1, on the voice brought from heaven, sermon 1, On the Words of the Apostle, no. 29.

Upon the epistle of 1 John, from the beginning — namely, up to the middle of the last chapter — 10 tractates, published to the people during the eight days of the paschal feast. The work begins, Your sanctity remembers. On 1 John 1, upon If we say that we have no sin, sermon 1, On the Words of the Apostle, no. 31. On 1 John 4, on not believing every spirit, sermon 1, On the Words of the Apostle, no. 32.

Upon the Apocalypse, being a bishop, he wrote one book of Annotations according to the anagogical [sense]; which someone (I know not who) cut up into eighteen homilies, with some words added before and after — in which homilies are wont to begin and end — perhaps that he might, thus divided, present them the more conveniently to be read in church on certain days of the year. But it is not likely that Augustine spoke to the people so briefly about matters so obscure. The work begins, In the reading of the Revelation.

Thus far the exegetical writings of Augustine; out of which — and out of other exoteric works of the same author — various authors collected diverse volumes of explanations upon the divine scriptures.[1] Of whose number is Peter of Tripoli, who (as Cassiodorus testifies) collected expositions upon all the epistles of Paul. Bede also, after him, did the same upon the whole of Paul, and upon the first epistle of John. Lastly, Bartholomew of Urbino, an Augustinian, gathered — upon the whole body of the Bible — two Tomes of explanations out of the sayings of Augustine. Concerning his life and writings there wrote Posidonius, bishop of Calama, and Jacobus, archbishop of Genoa. Blessed Augustine dies in the city of Hippo, while it was being besieged by the Vandals, in the times of Theodosius the Younger, in the year of the Lord 430.[2]

…when — having left the world — he had been made a monk, and abbot of the monastery at Ravenna, turning all the secular disciplines, and especially eloquence, to the service of Christ, he interpreted many things concerning the divine scriptures. But among the rest, far more excellent is the book of the Psalms, in the explanation of which he compressed, with a compendious and elegant brevity, whatever St. Augustine had poured forth in his tractates on the Psalms with a most copious enarration — interspersing also, of his own, not-to-be-despised annotations, definitions, propositions, and several axioms from grammar, dialectic, rhetoric, music, geometry, astronomy, arithmetic, and other disciplines; with which, as with stars and gems, he adorns the bright texture of his work: brief little prefaces being fitted, in rhetorical manner, to each psalm, in which — setting forth the argument, and the division of the psalm into its parts — he briefly explains what is contained in each part of the psalm. Then, in the enarration itself, artfully connecting together the words and verses of the psalm with a certain necessary sequence of order, he applies himself chiefly to the anagogical explanation, referring all things to Christ, the end of all. Finally, at the end of each psalm, he appends a brief epilogue of the things said by him; in which, mingling something ethical with the anagogy, he inflames the mind of the reader. The work begins, Once driven back in the city of Ravenna.

He wrote likewise On the Institution of Divine Readings, two books, most useful to those approaching the sacred studies; whose beginning is, Since the studies of secular [men].

Likewise, a compendium of the whole of divine scripture, which he entitled the Memorial of the Scriptures.

Upon the Song of Songs, commentaries, beginning, Solomon, inspired.

Upon the Acts of the Apostles, a succinct exposition.

Upon all the Catholic epistles, Annotations.

Upon the Apocalypse, a commentary, to which he gave the title Complexions on the Apocalypse.

He also delineated a shadow-drawing [sciography] of the Mosaic tabernacle, according to the exemplar described by Moses in the 26th chapter of Exodus; whose picture Bede testifies that he saw, in the 2nd book On the Tabernacle of Moses. He flourished under the Justins, the elder and the younger, and dies in the 97th year of his age, in the year of the Lord 576.

Aurelius Prudentius Clemens, a man of consular rank, by nation a Spaniard, a Palatine soldier from the city of Caesaraugusta [Zaragoza], and Consul of Massilia [Marseilles], the most celebrated poet of his time, and adorned with the variety of all the disciplines. When for fifty-seven years he had served worldly vanities, at last, leaving these in his old age, he dedicated himself wholly to the study of the divine scriptures — in which he wrote many things in verse; but among the rest a volume of hexameter verse, entitled Dittochaeon (ΔΙΤΤΟΧΑΙΟΝ) for this reason: that in it, out of all the histories of the Old and New Testament, he had prepared as it were a twofold food (for διττός [dittos] means "twofold," and ὀχή [och■] "food"). I have read a certain fragment of his work, whose beginning is, Eve was a dove. He published also, after the manner of the Greeks, upon the first three chapters of Genesis — that is, from the beginning of the book, up to the prevarication of Adam and his expulsion from paradise — commentaries famous as much for their style as for their sense. He flourished under Gratian Augustus, in the year of the Lord 380; whose life Aldus Manutius briefly collected out of his works.

Basil, bishop of Caesarea of the Cappadocians, by fact and by surname the Great — whom the common consent of the Greek fathers affirms never to have erred in any sentence or in any word[1] — sprung from Helenopontus, a town of Pontus, of noble parents, Basil a priest and Emmelia; brother of two bishops, that is, of Gregory of Nyssa and of Peter of Sebaste;[2] joined in the closest intimacy with Gregory of Nazianzus and John Chrysostom. This man, in expounding the divine Scriptures, just as he supremely loved lucid interpretations of the historical sense — interspersed with certain moral, and likewise ardent, little exhortations — so was he vehemently delighted to adorn his expositions with all the ornaments of secular literature; which he displayed especially in those nine most celebrated homilies on the Hexaemeron. These he illustrated with so admirable a care of elaborate diction, and with such majesty of oration, that the most eloquent and most learned Gregory the Theologian not undeservedly said[3] that Basil's oration surpasses all the discourses of men as much as the divine voice surpasses human voices. With such riches also of all the disciplines and of the good arts — drawn chiefly from the midst of the Peripatetic philosophy — he enriched those homilies, as also his other explanations, so that he was rightly called the philosopher of the Christians, and the most Christian of philosophers.[4] But how much the venerable antiquity of the fathers esteemed this divine work, the Hexaemeron, is shown, among others, by Gregory of Nazianzus (surnamed the Theologian), Gregory of Nyssa, and Ambrose — most learned and most holy men — of whom the first, in his Monody [funeral oration], speaks thus:

> The great Basil — than whom no one has expounded the sacred volumes more eloquently, more truly, or more richly — wrote a Hexaemeron, in which he discourses divinely on the beginning of things; which, as often as I read it, I so confirm myself in the love, the charity, and the knowledge of the Creator, that by nothing am I more moved or delighted.

Subscribing to whom, Gregory, bishop of Nyssa, in the preface of the Hexaemeron published by himself, speaks thus:

> Those who have read that divine commentary of our father Basil upon the great Moses admire it no less than the things which were written by Moses himself — and rightly, in my opinion. For what relation the ear of corn has with the grain (which both comes forth from it, and is [that grain] — or rather, since that very grain is contained in it, yet the ear differs from it in magnitude, and in beauty, and in form of variety) — the same relation you may say [Basil's commentary] has with the discourse of the great [→ p232: Moses…]

[1] Basil, of the Greek fathers, never erred in any sentence or word. [2] Basil's brothers were Gregory of Nyssa and Peter of Sebaste, bishops. [3] Gregory of Nazianzus's judgment concerning Basil. [4] Basil is rightly called the philosopher of the Christians, and the most Christian of philosophers.

> …the discourse of the great Moses, which were elaborated by the great Basil with a more accurate zeal. For the things which Moses embraced in few words, our doctor [Basil] so augmented and heaped up with sublime philosophy that he made, not an ear of corn, but a tree — after the likeness of the grain of mustard seed, which is compared to the kingdom of heaven.

Thus far Gregory. And Ambrose held this same work in so great esteem that he translated that [Hexaemeron], turned from the Greek — the whole, and with the same sentences and words — into a Hexaemeron composed by himself.[1] A certain Eustathius — eloquent and learned in both [tongues], as Junilius the African, or Bede, testifies in the preface of his commentaries on Genesis — first made this work Latin for Syncletia, his own sister; which begins thus in Greek: Πρέπουσα ἀρχὴ ᾧ περὶ τῆς τοῦ κόσμου συστάσεως — that is, A fitting beginning for him who is about to speak of the constitution of the world.

He wrote also, after the Hexaemeron, very many homilies upon the whole Psalter, of which there now survive only seventeen, delivered upon sixteen Psalms, that is: On Psalm 1, 7, 14, 28, 29, 32, 33, 37, 44, 45, 48, 49, 59, 61, 114, and 115.

He wrote likewise on Paradise, on the 3rd chapter of Genesis, one homily. Likewise, On the Restraining of the Thoughts of the Mind, one homily upon that which is read among us at Deuteronomy 15, Beware lest perhaps [a wicked thought] creep in, etc.; and according to the edition of the Seventy it has πρόσεχε σεαυτῷ, that is, Take heed to thyself. This homily some, led by a false opinion, attribute to Zeno, bishop of Verona, and write it among his sermons.

On the beginning of Proverbs, one homily.

He published also, upon the whole of Isaiah, according to the literal sense, an enarration of most succinct brevity, clear and elegant; which I hear was lately turned into Latin by I know not whom. I myself have read it only in Greek, and it begins thus: Εὔξασθε μὴ γενέσθαι τὴν φυγὴν ὑμῶν χειμῶνος ἢ σαββάτῳ — that is, Pray that your flight be not in winter, or on the Sabbath. Testimonies from this work are cited by John Damascene, in the third book against the Iconomachs [Iconoclasts], and by Oecumenius, in his commentary on the first [epistle] to the Corinthians, chapter 3.

He had also, upon that passage of Luke 12, on the rich man whose field brought forth abundant fruits, one homily. Likewise, on that of Luke 18, Sell all that thou hast, to the rich, one homily. Likewise, on the beginning of the Gospel of John, one homily. Again, on the Samaritan woman, on John 4, to Flavian, one book. On that passage of 1 Thessalonians 5, Rejoice always, one homily.

Basil dies in the times of the emperors Valens and Valentinian, in the year of the Lord 380, when he had presided over his church for eight years; and he was borne to the sepulchre of his ancestors, where his grandfather (a martyr) and his father (a priest) had been buried under the Emperor Maximian.[2] Four divine Bishops wrote his life in a most eloquent style: Gregory, prelate of the church of Nyssa; Amphilochius of Iconium; Gregory, prelate of the church of Nazianzus; and Helladius, bishop of Caesarea, Basil's disciple and successor in the episcopate. Of these, Gregory of Nyssa added two sermons to Basil's Hexaemeron, to supply those things which Basil, prevented by death, could not complete concerning the formation of man. These [two sermons] Dionysius Exiguus, an ancient Roman author, made Latin, beginning thus, By the paying-off of an old debt.

Bartholomew of Bologna [Barptolemaeus Bononiensis], of the Order of Preachers, imbued with Scholastic Theology, wrote a Postil on the Gospel of Luke, which begins, Thou shalt make four circles. Likewise, upon all the Canonical Epistles, a Postil, beginning, In the sixth [chapter] of Joshua the Lord commanded.

Bartholomew the Little [Barptolemaeus Parvus], of the Order of Preachers, applied a postil upon Luke, whose beginning is, The oblation of the just fattens the altar.

Bartholomew of Urbino [Barptolemaeus], Bishop and citizen of Urbino, by profession a Hermit [of St. Augustine], a man plainly learned and of singular memory, holding in memory almost all the volumes of St. Augustine, wove together — out of various sentences and passages of the divine Augustine — a huge work, divided into two Tomes, in the explanation of the whole of divine scripture. Which work a certain John Gast lately usurped to himself impudently enough, the name of the true author being deleted, and, in its place, his own name being set on the front of the volume; and — what is more grievous — with certain passages of the same work transposed, truncated, and wrested toward the heresy of the Lutherans, he contaminated the most useful and most pious labor of the Catholic author, and branded it with the suspicion of heresy.[3] He flourished under Rupert, King of the Romans, in the year of the Lord 1410; dear above all to Pope Clement V.

Bede the Venerable, presbyter and monk, by nation a Briton, by race an Anglo-Saxon, by fatherland a Cantabrigian; when he was still a little boy, and had not yet completed the seventh year of his tender age, he entered the monastery of the blessed Apostles Peter and Paul — which is situated in England, at the mouth of the river Wear, in the place called Ingirium [Jarrow] — in which, under the care first of Benedict [Biscop], and afterward of Ceolfrid, abbots of that monastery, being imbued with the monastic institutions, and instructed in the erudition of the sciences of every kind, in a very short time — and, what is more wonderful, amid the constant exercises of monastic discipline, and a continual care of praying, singing psalms, and reading in the temple day and night — he so profited that he came forth a grammarian no less skilled in Greek than in Latin, a poet, rhetorician, historian, astronomer, arithmetician, chronographer, cosmographer, Philosopher, and Theologian: so admirable in those times that among the more learned of that age a proverb was said of him — that a man, born in the farthest corner of the world, had encompassed the whole world with his genius.

He, therefore, in the thirtieth year of his age, having been ordained presbyter by Bishop John, at the exhortation of Acca, bishop of York, and of many brethren, undertook to write — upon the whole sacrosanct Scripture — diverse volumes of explanations, distinguished into four orders,[4] namely into Rhapsodies, Questions, Homilies, and Commentaries. In the Rhapsodies (or Stromata, or Collectanea) he gathered together expositions more mystical than historical, out of the most approved sentences of the Doctors of the Church, [→ p233: the sayings…]

[1] Ambrose translated St. Basil's work on the Hexaemeron into the Latin tongue. [2] St. Basil's grandfather was a martyr, and his father was a priest. [3] The impudent deed of Gast the heretic. [4] Bede's writings on the sacred Scriptures are distinguished into four orders.

Book IV, letter B: the Bede the Venerable entry continues — his method in the Rhapsodies, his temperate style, why he is called "Venerable," his death (AD 734, on Ascension day), and then the catalog of his exegetical works from Genesis through Proverbs (each with its incipit). Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)*

…and the sayings [of the Doctors], collected here and there interruptedly and interpolatedly, with some things also inserted of his own after the imitation of their sense, where it was opportune — so that the various sermons and periods of the Fathers might either cohere more fitly among themselves, or be rendered briefer and more illustrious. And, lest he should seem to steal the sayings of his elders and to compose them as if his own, he had resolved to interpose the names of the Doctors throughout each passage, and to show by name what was said by which Author; but, since this appeared to him too laborious, he set only the first syllables of the names in the margins, over against each sentence — which afterward, through the ignorance or the carelessness of the copyists, perished from all the exemplars.

In the Commentaries, Questions, and Homilies — in which he more frequently uses both his own speech and his own sense — he has a style neither wholly inelegant, nor curious of affected elegance, but temperate;[1] which neither by a multitude of words breeds distaste, nor by a scarcity begets obscurity, but runs with a brief facility most agreeably.

His works, while he was yet living and always writing new ones, were held in so great esteem that, by the ordinance of the Bishops of Britain, they were read publicly in the churches. And since, in the reading of his Homilies, they prefixed his name after the manner of the author — [namely] "of the venerable Bede the presbyter" — not being able, while he lived, to proclaim him otherwise, the title once attributed from the beginning has held even to the present day: so that Bede is rather called "Venerable" than "Saint."[2] For to call him, while living, otherwise — although he was illustrious for holiness of life — was not lawful. This holy man dies under the Emperor Leo, in the sixty-second year of his age, that is, in the year 734 from the birth of Christ, on the day on which the memory of the Lord's Ascension is celebrated.

The number and the arguments of Bede's exegetical works — of which he himself reviewed a part at the end of his English history — is this:

Upon the first three chapters of Genesis (that is, from the beginning up to the ejection of the first parents from paradise), two books of Collectanea out of Basil, Ambrose, and Augustine, addressed to Acca the Bishop; of which the former begins, On the beginning of the book of Genesis. These certain printers have wrongly ascribed to Junilius the African. — Upon the same first three chapters again, one book of Collectanea, beginning, That chapter. — Upon the first twenty-four chapters of Genesis, four books, beginning: The head of all the books is. — Upon the whole book of Genesis, one book of Collectanea, whose beginning is, In the beginning indeed of time. — Upon Genesis, one book of Questions: First of all, my teacher, it is necessary for me to inquire.

Upon Exodus, one book of Collectanea: By this sentence Esdras… — Upon Exodus, from the twenty-fourth chapter up to the thirtieth, On the Tabernacle, and its vessels, and the vestments of the priests, three books; whose opening is, About to speak, with the Lord's help. — Upon Exodus, one book of Questions: Certain mysteries.

Upon Leviticus, one book of Collectanea: He is wont to be questioned by some. — Upon Leviticus, one book of Questions: In the opening of Leviticus, four kinds.

Upon Numbers, one book of Collectanea: In the opening of Numbers. — Upon Numbers, one book of Questions: The first question arises for us.

Upon Deuteronomy, one book of Collectanea: It is indeed to be known. — Upon Deuteronomy, one book of Questions: Deuteronomy according to the faith.

Upon Joshua [Jesus Nave], one book of Questions: After the death, therefore, of Moses.

Upon Judges, one book of Questions: The history of the Judges.

Upon Ruth, one book of Questions: Let us now see concerning Ruth.

Upon Samuel, four books of Commentaries of allegorical explanation, addressed to Acca: Whatsoever things are written.

Upon the fifth and sixth chapter of the third book of Kings, On the Temple of Solomon, one book: The way of election exhorts us. — Upon the four books of Kings, four books of Questions: After the book of Judges. — Upon the four books of Kings again, one book of thirty Questions, addressed to Nothelm: What concerning the book of Kings.

Upon Paralipomenon [Chronicles], two books, cited by Trithemius.

Upon Esdras, three books of allegorical exposition, addressed to Acca: An excellent interpreter of the sacred things.

Upon Tobit, one book of allegorical explanation: The book of the holy shepherd Tobias.

Upon Job, addressed to Nectarius the bishop, three books of commentaries. — Upon Job he is reported to have applied exegeses, of which, however, Trithemius nowhere makes mention in his Catalogue. John Herwagen the printer inserted, in place of these, among Bede's works, three books of explanations on Job, addressed to Nectarius, beginning, At thy exhortation. But Bede himself, in his little book On the reckoning of ounces, confesses these to be the work of Philip the presbyter.

Upon the Psalter, a most copious volume of commentaries, whose beginning is, Since, by the help of Him without whom every action is nothing. — Upon Psalm 52, a broader commentary, beginning, When several clerics. — Upon the Psalter, from the Hebrew verity, one book of Meditations, in which are excerpted all the verses and sentences pertaining to prayer, with some little prayers inserted, so that the mind of the one praying, aroused and instructed by David's words, may the more easily and ardently be raised up to God.

Upon the Proverbs of Solomon, three books of explanation, both historical and allegorical; which certain persons, inserting into the works of Jerome, marked beforehand with the false title of Jerome — although they [→ p234: them…]

[Bede the Venerable, continued from p233 — the Proverbs commentary:]

…them it plainly appears to be Bede the presbyter's, and collected by him out of the commentaries of the ancient fathers — of which, in the explanation of the 21st chapter, are cited by name: Gregory, in his evangelical homilies, and in the exposition of the sixth and 21st chapter; [and] Augustine, in the exposition of the 30th chapter; [and] Jerome. The beginning of these is, The Greek parable.

Upon Ecclesiastes, one book, cited by Trithemius.

Upon the Song of Songs, seven books of mystical explanation; in the first of which are refuted the errors of Julian [of Eclanum], bishop in Campania — a man indeed most eloquent, and next to the eloquence of Cicero, but an asserter of the Pelagian doctrine, who had put out most eloquent commentaries on this book, in which, disputing against the grace of God, he taught that we can, by the choice of free will, do the good things which we will (although by the help of God's grace we may accomplish them more easily) — just as travelers are able to make the journey, and indeed on foot, but, without doubt, with less labor when the horses on which they may be carried are present. In the five following books the exposition of the whole Canticle is completed. In the seventh and last book is gathered a brief explanation of the Canticle out of those things which St. Gregory, throughout all his little works, discoursed here and there concerning this volume — which the author himself, leaving untouched in the preceding six books, had reserved for the last, as it were for the crown of the whole work. The work begins, About to write, grace helping.

Upon all the Prophets, both greater and lesser, 18 books; that is, on Isaiah two books, on Jeremiah two books, on Ezekiel one book, on Daniel one book, on the twelve Minor Prophets twelve books.

Upon the Gospel of Matthew, four books of Annotations: For it is the custom of the Scriptures. — Upon the Gospel of Mark, literally and mystically, addressed to Acca the Bishop, four books, which begin: In the exposition of the Gospel according to Mark. — Upon the Gospel of Luke, according to the literal and allegorical sense, commentaries addressed to Acca the Bishop, six books: It is wonderfully true, and truly wonderful. — Upon the Gospel of John, one book of Annotations: This is John the Evangelist.

Upon the Acts of the Apostles, historically and mystically, addressed to Acca the Bishop, one book: I have received very frequent [letters]. — Upon the Acts of the Apostles, one book of Retractations: We know [him to be] an excellent doctor. — Upon the Acts of the Apostles, one book of six Questions: What does that indicate.

Upon all the Epistles of Paul, 14 books of Collectanea, which he collected out of all the works of St. Augustine, the same sentences and words being heaped together into one; their beginning is, Paul the Apostle, who [was] with [the name] Saul. — There are those who think that these collectanea (which are now carried about under the name of Bede, in a rather confused order and with an ill-adapted exposition) are not those which Bede himself put together, but those which a certain Bartholomew of Urbino, an Augustinian, author of the work called the Milleloquium of Augustine, somehow patched together. And there are those who attribute the work itself to Florus the Monk.

Upon all the Catholic Epistles, 7 books; of which the fourth, which is on the epistle of John, addressed to Acca the Bishop, was excerpted from the homilies of Augustine upon the same epistle. The beginning of the whole work is, Paul said of this to James.

Upon the Apocalypse of John, addressed to Eusebius, three books of mystical explanation, excerpted from the commentaries which Tyconius the African, a most learned man, had published on that book: To my most beloved brother Eusebius.

On the Interpretation of both the Hebrew and the Greek words which are contained in both Testaments, one book, digested in alphabetical order: Is he apprehending… — On the Schemes and Tropes of Sacred Scripture, one book, necessary for understanding the phrases of the celestial tongue, which begins, It is sometimes wont in the Scriptures. In it, against the Greeks — who glory that they were the inventors of the tropes — he shows that no such tropes, schemes, and figures are found in the writings of the Greeks which had not, long before, been in use in the sacred letters.[1]

On the Places of the Holy Land which are contained in the divine letters, one book, abridged from the work of Adamnan the presbyter: The site of the city of Jerusalem. — On the Times, one book, most useful for understanding the computation of the times of divine scripture: On the nature of things, and of the times.

Upon the Lections which are read from both testaments throughout the circle of the year, ninety-eight sermons: namely, seventy de tempore [On the Season], and forty-eight de sanctis [On the Saints]. Yet you should know that very many of these are not homilies or sermons, but shreds of expositions, torn by an uncertain author out of Bede's commentaries, and placed in a volume of sermons.

Hector Boece, in the 9th book of the History of the Scots, writes that Italy contends with Albion [Britain] concerning Bede's cradle — the Italians asserting that he was born and died at Genoa, and that his sepulchre is held in honor in that same city. But from Bede's own writings, says Boece, it is established that he lived as a youth in Italy, but as an old man in Northumbria, and chiefly in the monastery called Melrose, which is in Scotland.

Bellator, presbyter of an uncertain church, illustrious in the erudition of secular literature and of the sacred volumes, is said to have written many commentaries upon the holy scriptures; of which the most praised are seven books upon the Wisdom of Solomon. He lived in the times of the Emperor Louis, in the year of the Lord 840.

Benedict Arias Montanus of Seville [Hispalensis] wrote commentaries on the twelve Minor Prophets; likewise elucidations on the four Gospels and on the Acts of the Apostles. He also presided over the edition of the Bibles which were printed at Antwerp at the expense of Philip, the Catholic King; and in the last tome, in the Sacred Apparatus, he added seven books: On the Hebrew Idioms, On the Secret Speech, On the Action or Vesture, On the Sacred Weights and Measures, On the Sacred Structures, On the Ages and Times, [and] the Psalter of David in Latin ver■ [→ p235: -verse…]

[1] No tropes are in the writings of the Greeks that are not found first in the sacred letters.

[Benedict Arias Montanus, continued from p234:]

…rendered [the Psalter of David] in Latin verse.

Benedict Pereira [Pererius] of Valencia, of the Society of Jesus, a man of distinguished erudition and learning, taught for many years in the Roman College of the Society of Jesus, first philosophy, then Theology. In the year 1589 from the birth of the Lord — but in the 53rd year of the age of Benedict himself — he published seven books of Commentaries on Genesis; having, three years before, put forth sixteen [books] on Daniel the Prophet, and thirteen years before, 15 books on Philosophy. He lives (praise be to God) and teaches Theology at Rome. Him I had at Rome as my teacher in Scholastic Theology, in the year of the Lord 1568 and 1569. [Later-edition addition: Pereira's seven-book Genesis commentary appeared in 1589, twenty years after Sixtus's death in 1569, so a later editor expanded this entry — although the first-person note about studying under Pereira at Rome in 1568–69 is Sixtus's own.]

Benedict Stendal [Stendel], a German, wrote upon Genesis one book, upon Numbers one book, upon Deuteronomy one book.

Benedict Stendal, a German, from Halle, a town of Saxony, most learned in the divine scriptures, and nobly instructed in secular philosophy, who taught Theology for many years with the highest praise in the gymnasium of Erfurt, illustrious in life and doctrine, published certain little works of no contemptible reading; of which there are extant, upon the five books of Moses, five books of Scholastic Explanations. He flourished under the Emperor Frederick III, in the year 1470.

Bernard, first Abbot of the monastery of Clairvaux in the diocese of Langres, of the Cistercian order, by nation a Burgundian, by fatherland of Fontaines; most excellent in holiness of life and in distinguished erudition — so from infancy did he drink in the sacred letters, and retained them in memory throughout his whole age, that as often as he attempted either to speak or to write anything, so often was he compelled to burst forth into the words and sentences of the holy scriptures. Whence also all his writings — which can be called nothing else than centos of the divine volumes[1] — are on every side interwoven with the sentences of the Old and New Testament, as with gem-like emblems, and these so conveniently and aptly inserted that they might be believed to have been born there. His manner of teaching is almost always occupied in investigating the mystical senses, and in forming morals. His speech, everywhere sweet and ardent, so delights and ardently enflames, that from his most delightful tongue milk and honey of words seem to flow, and from his most ardent breast the burnings of fiery affections seem to break forth. His exegetical monuments upon the divine letters are these:

Upon the first chapter of Genesis, on the sleep of Adam, one sermon. On 1 Kings 17, on David's single combat, sermon 1. On 3 Kings 19, on the flight of Elijah, sermon 1. On 4 Kings 5, on Naaman the Syrian, sermon 1. On the beginning of Psalm 183 [so printed; there is no such psalm], sermon 1. On Psalm 84, two sermons. On Psalm 90, seventeen sermons. On Psalm 132, sermon 1. On the Song of Songs, from various passages, 8 sermons. On Isaiah chapter 6, on the vision of him sitting upon the throne, 5 sermons. On Isaiah 7, on the words of Isaiah to Ahaz, sermon 1. On Isaiah 9, on the wonderful name of the child, sermon 1. On Isaiah 12, sermon 1. On Matthew 5, on the seven beatitudes, sermon 1. On Matthew 6, on the Lord's Prayer, two sermons. On Matthew 15, on the seven loaves, sermon 1. On Mark chapter 16, two sermons. On Luke 1, on the Lord's Annunciation, 4 sermons. On the Angelic Salutation, from the same chapter, two sermons. On Luke chapter 10, on Martha and Magdalene, sermon 1. On the steward of iniquity, on Luke chapter 16, one tractate — which some believe to be of another author. On Luke 24, on the two disciples going to Emmaus, sermon 1. On that of John 10 [read 8], He that is of God heareth the words of God, sermon 1. On 2 Thessalonians 5 [so printed; 2 Thessalonians has only three chapters], on prayer, petition, supplication, and thanksgiving, sermon 1. On Apocalypse 7, on the seven seals, sermon 1. On Apocalypse 12, on the woman clothed with the sun, sermon 1.

There is extant, besides these, a distinguished work of this Author, which all the learned prefer to his other labors — that is, upon the first three chapters of the Song of Songs, of mystical and continuous explanation, eighty-six sermons, which, in the last year of his life, he poured forth before his monks, for the solace of their daily labor, with living voice and from the depth of his heart; in which he expressed with such eloquence the power and sublimity of divine charity, that it appears he felt in himself all the affections, motions, and even the goads of heavenly love, by the living experience of his own spirit. And since, prevented by death, he could not explain the remaining chapters of this book, Gilbert of Holland [Hoyland], a Cistercian, an imitator of Bernard's style and spirit, attempted to complete it — publishing, from that place of the third chapter, In my bed by night I sought [Song 3:1], where the Author himself had ended, up to that place of the fifth chapter, My beloved is white and ruddy [Song 5:10], forty-eight sermons. But as he was attempting to advance further in explaining, death took him from among men — as if indignant that he should dare to continue again, and bring to an end, the labor of Bernard interrupted by himself. Bernard dies in the 63rd year of his age, and in the year 1153 from the birth of our Savior. His life William, Abbot of St. Thierry, began to write; but Arnold, abbot of Bonneval, completed it, and digested it into four books.

Bernard de Trilia [de Trylia], a Spaniard, a Dominican, wrote Postils upon Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Psalms; and Questions on the Song of Songs, on the Gospel of John, and on the Apocalypse.

Bernard of Amboise [de Ambasia], Provincial of the Carmelites of Toulouse, wrote on the epistle of St. James, one book, and on the Canonical epistle of John, one book. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1364.

Bernardino Gadolo [Galdolus] of Brescia, a Camaldolese abbot, a man exceedingly learned in good letters, in Philosophy, and in Canon Law, wrote upon all the books of the Bible a distinguished work of annotations. He flourished under Maximilian I, Emperor, in the year of the Lord 1496.

…of the most observant congregation, wrote — in the Scholastic manner, but in a speech more open and simple — one book upon the Apocalypse, whose beginning is, Blessed is he that readeth the words of this book. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1440.

Bertrand of Milan, a Carmelite Minorite, wrote one book of Sermons on the gospels. He flourished in the year 1325.

Bertrand Parayte of Toulouse, an Augustinian, wrote on the Acts of the Apostles, one book; on the Canonical epistles, 14 books; on the Apocalypse, one book. He lived in 1370.

Bertrand de la Tour [de Turro], a nobleman, composed Lenten sermons; likewise, three volumes of expositions and sermons upon the epistles and the Prophecies throughout the whole year.

Bessarion, Patriarch of Constantinople, by nation a Greek, a most eminent Cardinal of the Roman Church, surnamed the Nicene, a man in every respect most learned, a Philosopher, and a most excellent orator in Greek and Latin, among his many distinguished works left, upon that passage from the 21st chapter of John, So I will have him to remain, one book. He dies on an embassy to France, in the year of the Lord 1473.

Bonaventure, who was also called by the Greek word Eutychius, Bishop of Albano, by nation a Tuscan, from the town of Bagnoregio, the eighth Minister General of the Order of Minors; on account of his exceptional erudition in divine things taken by Gregory X, Supreme Pontiff, into the college of cardinals; he so joined a holiness of life and integrity of morals with the highest knowledge of Scholastic Theology and Philosophy, that that most excellent man Alexander of Hales, his teacher, was wont often to say of him[1] that it seemed to him that Adam had not sinned in Bonaventure. This man, among many most pious little works — which, kindled with divine love, he composed with most ardent words and most lofty senses, for the illuminating of minds and the enflaming of the wills of readers — dictated also a noble work upon the Hexaemeron, in the scholastic kind of diction; to which the title is On the Luminaries of the Church, or On the Illuminations, or On the Five Visions — for this reason, because in it are especially expounded those five visions of God, comprehended in that sentence of Moses, God saw that it was good, etc.,[2] repeated five times in the beginning of Genesis. The beginning of the work is, In the midst of the church he opened his mouth, etc. And the whole work is divided into twenty-three sermons, most full of tropological senses, ardent sentences, and abstruse mysteries of Scholastic and mystical Theology.

He wrote likewise a Scholastic Postil on the one hundred and eighteenth Psalm, beginning, Alleluia, praise, glory. — Upon the Gospel of Luke, a Scholastic Postil, which begins, The spirit of the Lord. — Upon John, a Postil, which begins, In the beginning.

He published also one book of Meditations on the Life of Christ; in which, with a style indeed rude and unpolished, but effective and most penetrating to the heart, he reduced the four gospels into one history, with some meditations of his own inserted — in which, for arousing and enflaming the affections of the reader, he narrates the deeds of Christ according to certain imaginary representations, not only as the things themselves happened, but as they could also have happened, or have come to pass. Wherefore, when in the course of this work it is read, "Thus the Lord Jesus said" or "did" — if that cannot be proved from the evangelical narrative itself, it is to be understood no otherwise than devout meditation requires; that is, just as if it were said, "Meditate with pious mind that Jesus either said and did these things, or could have said and done them." The work begins, Among other proclamations of the virtues and praises.

There is also carried about a little book of the same author, introductory to the reading of the Bibles, marked with the title The Beginning of Sacred Scripture, whose opening is, The Lord showed me a great river. — He left likewise a metrical scholastic compendium of both Testaments, in iambic dimeter verses, by the free and loosened law of the syllables; which he so arranged that each quatrain contains the sum of one chapter. Its beginning is, The world is made in the beginning.

He dies, the empire being vacant, under Gregory X, in the Council of Lyons, in the year of the Lord 1283 [read 1274]; buried in the church of the Minorites at Lyons, and reckoned among the saints by Sixtus IV, Supreme Pontiff. His life was copiously described by Octavianus Martinianus of Suessa, advocate of the most sacred consistory.

Bonaventure of Padua, Prior General of the Hermits, presbyter cardinal of the title of St. Cecilia, published a scholastic Sermon-book on the Gospels of the whole year, which begins, The desired of all nations shall come. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1320.

Bonino Mombrizio [Boninus Mombritius] of Milan gathered from the four Evangelists, in hexameter verse, [the history] of the Lord's Passion, [dedicated] to Sixtus IV, Supreme Pontiff — six books, whose beginning is, I who too youthfully consumed my first years.

Bruno, first founder and institutor of the Carthusian order, by nation a German, from Cologne, once a Canon of the church of Reims, and in the University of Paris a public master and distinguished doctor. By a certain marvelous event of a dead man — who, amid his funeral obsequies, three times cried out with a loud voice that he had been condemned by the just judgment of God — being converted to penance, he left the world and withdrew into the desert of the Chartreuse [Cartusia Celesiensis; near Grenoble], and there established an exceedingly arduous purpose of monastic discipline, giving himself to continual prayers and to assiduous studies of the divine scriptures; in which he also left many books of no contemptible exposition, but especially pious and brief commentaries on the Psalter, written in a bare and simple speech, of which such is the opening, The Psalter is a certain musical instrument. Likewise, upon all the epistles of Paul, 14 books, whose beginning is, Paul had not yet come to Rome. He flourished in the year of our salvation 1081.

Bruno, Archbishop of Cologne, published on the four gospels commentaries not to be neglected, whose beginning is, After the Pentateuch of Moses, that we might join new things to the old. They are extant in the Library of the Preachers at Bologna. The same author also testifies that he wrote upon the Pentateuch. [→ p237: Bruno…]

[Letter B, continued from p236:]

Bruno of Würzburg [Herbipolensis], Bishop of Eastern Franconia, by nation a German, cousin of Conrad Augustus the Second of that name, most celebrated for holiness and erudition, gathered — out of the explanations of the orthodox fathers — a concise and elegant commentary upon all the Psalms, whose beginning is, We forge no new things, but renew the old. He dies under the Emperor Henry II [read III], in the year of the Lord 1045.

Bruno, Archbishop of the Ruthenians, a monk of Cassino, born and educated in Italy, of singular doctrine and renowned for the glory of martyrdom, left some immortal monuments of his noble genius; of which there are extant two books of commentaries on Genesis. This man, when he was preaching the gospel in Prussia with the highest ardor of faith, was crowned with martyrdom by the Prussians, and fell, in the year of the Lord 1010.

Bruno, Bishop of Siena in Tuscany, wrote upon the Apocalypse, with an explanation not to be despised, which begins, The Apocalypse of John has as many sacraments [as it has words]. In these few words, blessed Jerome.

Burchard [Burgardus], of the Order of Preachers, left a book On the Site of the Holy Land, useful for the topography of the sacred volumes.

Gaius Marius Victorinus [Caius Marius Victorinus], an African, the most excellent rhetorician of his time, and, on account of the excellence of his art, deserving a statue in the forum of Trajan; besides those three books which he wrote against Arius in the dialectical manner — very obscure, and scarcely accessible to the most learned — he published commentaries on the Apostle [Paul]; but, since he was occupied in the erudition of secular letters, he was ignorant of the holy scriptures. Whence he could not, however eloquent, discourse well of things which he did not know; but he also sang, in hexameter verse, the combat of the Maccabean mother and of her seven sons, whose beginning is, Antiochus of old was king, the richest of Syria. Much concerning his laudable conversion to Christ Augustine relates in the eighth book of the Confessions, chapter 2. He flourished at Rome under the emperor Constantius, teaching Rhetoric, around the year of the Lord 360.

Callistus of Piacenza [Placentinus], a Lateran canon of St. Augustine, a learned and pious man, and in his time among the foremost of the Italian preachers, published commentaries on the Prophet Haggai, explained by himself before the assembly; likewise commentaries on John, and Lenten enarrations on the Gospels; to which he added a small volume on the places of Palestine which the divine letters contain, with a geographical map added, so that it might represent to the eyes a picture of the whole work, described by himself. He published also a chronicon-work upon the four gospels, after the manner of a diary [ephemeris], in which he gathered a diligent computation of the times and days in which the Lord Jesus journeyed in the world — noting the years and days on which each of the things were done which Christ did and spoke, and especially from the baptism up to the ascension. The work begins thus, Since to the Christian profession.… He flourished in the year of the Lord 1540.

Candidus, in the reigns of the Emperors Commodus and Severus, around the two-hundredth year of our salvation, published most beautiful tractates on the Hexaemeron.

Charles de Bovelles [Carolus Bovillus], of Beauvais [Beromandius], of Amiens [Samarobrinus], a theologian, mathematician, and distinguished philosopher, wrote on the one hundred and sixteenth Psalm, On the Praise of the Nations, one book; likewise on the one hundred and seventeenth Psalm, On the Praise of Jerusalem, one book. He wrote also on Psalm 79 and 147, and on the Lord's Prayer, in the year of the Lord 1520.

Catena — a Greek [chain] of explanations upon the whole book of Job, without the author's name, written by hand on parchments and arranged in a most becoming order, extant at Genoa in the Sauli Library, collected out of nineteen orthodox Greek fathers, whose names are these:

> Alexander of Cappadocia, Apollinaris, Athanasius, Basil, Chrysostom, Cyril, Didymus, Dionysius, Ephrem, Evagrius, Gregory the Theologian, Julius, Julian, Isidore, Methodius, Nilus, Olympiodorus, Polychronius, Severus, Severianus.

The beginning of its work has these words: Ὑπόθεσις μὲν ἡμῖν καὶ σκοπὸς τοῦ ἔργου, ἡ τῆς βίβλου τοῦ πολυάθλου Ἰὼβ ἀνάπτυξις — that is, Our proposal indeed, and the scope of the present work, is to unfold the book of the excellent warrior [much-contending] Job.

Catena — a Greek [chain] upon the whole body of the Gospels, is held at Genoa in the Library of Angelo Giustiniani the Minorite, written on most ancient parchments, and collected by an uncertain author out of divers Greek fathers, whose names are these:

> Origen, Victor the Presbyter, Isidore of Pelusium, Eusebius of Caesarea, Titus of Bostra, Basil, Chrysostom, Severus, Cyril.

And the openings of the exposition upon each Evangelist are these:

Upon Matthew: Εὐαγγέλιόν ἐστι λόγος περιέχων ἀγαθῶν ἀγγελίαν πραγμάτων, κατὰ τὸ εὔλογον — that is, The Gospel is a discourse containing the announcement of good things, according to that which is consonant with reason.

Upon Mark: Πολλῶν εἰς τὸ κατὰ Ματθαῖον, καὶ εἰς τὸ κατὰ Ἰωάννην συνταξάντων — that is, Since many have composed commentaries upon the Gospel according to Matthew, and according to John.

Upon Luke: Ὥσπερ γὰρ ἐν τῷ παλαιῷ πολ■ [→ p238: -λοί (many)…] — that is, For just as in the old [Testament] many…

Upon John: Οὗτος ὁ εὐαγγελιστὴς πατρίδος μὲν ἦν — that is, This Evangelist was indeed of a fatherland, etc.

Catena — of Explanations upon all the epistles of Paul, without the author's name, lately found, is preserved in the illustrious Academy of the Venetians.

Catina the Syrian [Catina Syrus], surnamed λεπτός — that is, Acute and ingenious — published a brief disputation on the first chapter of Ezekiel; whom Jerome mentions in the first book of his commentary on Ezekiel, relating summarily his exposition upon the vision of the wheels and of the living creatures.

Caesarius, a Cistercian monk, wrote sermons on the festal gospels: [incipit] A cluster of Cyprus, beloved. In the year of the Lord 1220.

Coelius Pannonius [Coelius of Pannonia], a student of the sacred volumes, wrote Collectanea upon the Apocalypse not to be repented of, whose beginning is, In many, and by no doubtful, ways of old. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1540.

Coelius Sedulius, a presbyter, by nation a Scot [Irish], from his early youth a disciple of Hildebert, Archbishop of the Scots; who — like another Apollonius of Tyana, searching out fleeing wisdom throughout the whole world — traversed Britain, Spain, Gaul, Italy, Greece, and Asia with a wonderful ardor of learning; and at last, illustrious at Rome in divine and human doctrines, flourished under Theodosius Augustus, excelling in verse and in prose. He wrote four books Of Divine Marvels [the Carmen Paschale], in which he briefly compressed, in hexameter verse, all the miracles of both testaments. The beginning of the work is, While the gentiles study the figments of their own poet. He left also commentaries — or, if you prefer, annotations — upon all the epistles of Paul, in prose, 14 books, collected out of Origen, Ambrose, Jerome, and Augustine, cited by name; whose beginning is, It is to be known that, in this proem. He dies under Theodosius the Younger, in the year of the Lord 450.

Caedmon [Cedmonus], a simple monk, a poet by no means to be despised, around the year of the Lord six hundred and seventy, published poems upon almost all the histories of the Bible.

Claudius of Auxerre [Altisiodorensis], most skilled in scholastic Theology, wrote commentaries on the Epistles of Paul, which it has not befallen me to read.

Claudius, Abbot of the city of Classe [near Ravenna], a disciple of St. Gregory the Pope, gathered many things — on the Heptateuch, on the books of Kings, on Proverbs, on the Song of Songs, and on the Prophets, from Pope Gregory discoursing (though not in the same sense) — and reduced them into commentaries; which St. Gregory mentions in his epistle to John, subdeacon of Ravenna. He flourished in the year of the Lord 600.

Claudius Espencaeus [Claude d'Espence], a Frenchman, Doctor of Paris, wrote a Commentary on the First epistle to Timothy, and on the epistle to Titus. He died in the reign of Charles IX, King of France. [Later-edition addition: Espence died in 1571, after Sixtus's death in 1569, so the notice of his death was added by a later editor.]

Claudius Guilliaud [Claude Guilliaud], by fatherland of Beauvais, provost at the distinguished church of the Aedui [Autun], and canon-preacher, a man most studious of the divine scriptures, wrote, upon all the Epistles of St. Paul, commentaries which he called Collations — a work indeed erudite, brief, elegant, and very necessary; in which he touched, with a lucid and open brevity, the explanations of almost all the best and most select doctors, both ancient and more recent, in this order: First, he diligently explains the individual sentences of each chapter of the epistle; which done, immediately (before he approaches the following chapter) he recalls to concord the passages of the preceding chapter which seem in appearance to conflict. Finally, he explains certain words and obscurer phrases of the chapter already expounded, his own definitions being applied. He wrote also, by the same method of explanation, commentaries on the Gospel of John, whose beginning is, John, about to speak; and likewise, upon all the Catholic Epistles, commentaries, which begin, The state of the epistle. He flourished under Charles V, in the year of the Lord 1540. The work begins, Among all the epistles.

Claudius, by nation a Scot, a Benedictine monk, a disciple of Bede the Venerable, a colleague of Albinus [Alcuin] the Levite, most studious of the divine scripture, and not ignorant of secular learning, conspicuous as much in prose speech as in verse, published, in a succinct and simple style: Upon the Pentateuch of Moses, five books of commentaries. Upon Joshua, one book. Upon Judges, one book. Upon Ruth, one book. Upon Matthew, one book. He flourished under Charlemagne Augustus, in the year of the Lord 800.

Claudius de Monte Martyrum, a Frenchman, a Carmelite doctor, a Theologian of Paris, published succinct enarrations on the Apocalypse, addressed to John, Cardinal du Bellay. Of these, this is the beginning, The Apocalypse — [it] is to be understood, this is. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1550.

Claudius Seyssel [Seisellus], a Savoyard, Bishop of Marseilles, and afterward Archbishop of Turin, wrote in an elegant style, upon the first three chapters of Luke, On the Threefold State of the Wayfarer, addressed to Leo X — a huge volume, divided into many tractates; in which, following especially the moral explanation, in the first chapter of the Gospel he describes the state of the penitents under the person of Elizabeth and Zechariah; in the second, under the birth of the forerunner, the state of those perfecting their life toward the type of the Redeemer; in the third, he treats allegorically and mystically of the state of the perfect. The work begins, A great and memorable thing. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1490.

There was also another Claudius, bishop of Turin, condemned by the church, who wrote against the cult of sacred images.

Christopher Clavius of Bamberg [Bambergensis], of the Society of Jesus, a man exceedingly well-deserving of the Mathematical sciences, was of great help in restoring the Gregorian Calendar — which he afterward strenuously vindicated from the cavils of a certain German Heretic. He lives at Rome, and has already written many things in Mathematics, and (as we hope) has recalled that most noble discipline, [long] neglected, to its former splendor. He was formerly my teacher in this study. [Later-edition addition: the Gregorian Calendar reform (1582) and its defense postdate Sixtus's death in 1569; this entry, with its first-person "my teacher," was supplied by a later editor.] [→ p239: Clement…]

[Letter C, continued from p238:]

Clement, by forename Titus Flavius, presbyter of the church of Alexandria, disciple of Pantaenus the Stoic philosopher and martyr, and after his death his successor in the school, teacher of Origen Adamantius,[1] wrote distinguished volumes full of erudition and eloquence, as much on secular literature as on the sacred scriptures; among which, besides the rest, is reported [the work] Ὑποτυπώσεων — that is, eight books Of Outlines [Informations] — in which, as Eusebius writes in the 6th book of the Ecclesiastical History, he explained the whole of divine Scripture alike with compendious dissertations, not even passing over those [books] which by some are called Apocrypha. The same Clement, in the first book of his Stromata, promised that he would write on Genesis; which he is affirmed by some afterward to have performed, brilliantly and completely, upon the whole book — to which [affirmation] I neither add my credence nor rashly break it. He flourished in the times of Severus and of Antoninus his son, in the year of the Lord 200.

Clement Araneus [of Ragusa], of the Order of Preachers, a nursling and inhabitant of the province of Dalmatia, a Theologian not ignoble in scholastic exercise, and most eloquent in his own tongue in declamations, published — after the manner of a scholastic lecture — an exposition on the epistle of Paul to the Romans, with various questions inserted, and their solutions, together with some disputations, by which he most powerfully confuted especially the Lutheran heretics. The beginning of the work is, Paul the Apostle. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1546.

Clement, Bishop at Rome after Peter and Linus, wrote upon the sacrosanct Scriptures of both Testaments a work worthy of all veneration, On the words of the Lord which seem to be contrary to themselves, and are not, and what is the resolution of these. Of which labor Clement himself makes mention in the third volume of the Recognitions. See above, in the second book, under Clement.

Columbanus, first founder and Abbot of the monastery of Luxeuil, by nation a Scot [Irish], a man of exceptional sanctity, merit, and doctrine, father of many thousands of monks, and founder of several monasteries, a distinguished sower of the divine word; coming out of Ireland, in the times of the Emperor Maurice, into Gaul and Germany — like of old a prince of the Druids — he propagated the divine worship far and wide, and increased the multitude of monasteries. This man, while he was still younger, expended great zeal as much on profane as on sacred letters, and wrote many things in an elegant style; but especially one book of commentaries upon the whole Psalter. He dies under the Emperor Maurice, in the year of the Lord 598.

Conrad of Halberstadt [Halberstadius], by nation a German, of the Order of Preachers, a public professor of Theology, and so exercised and worn in the divine scriptures that he held the whole Old and New Testament in memory, composed — in imitation of Hugh [of St. Cher], Cardinal of the title of St. Sabina, and with a like labor — Concordances of the whole Bible; in which he added, according to the order of the alphabet, not only the declinable words (which Hugh had done before), but also all the indeclinable parts of speech; the passages being marked not only by the books, and by the chapters of the books, but also by the lines of the chapters, so that any word sought whatsoever might most easily and suddenly be found. We once gave to this work, at the request of friends, a brief little commentary, entitled On the Use and Utility of the Concordances of the sacred Bible, demonstrating in it by what wit a prudent declaimer may avail, from this single work — even without any commentaries of the sacred expositors — to open and explain to himself, no less easily than copiously, the phrases, senses, and manifold understandings of almost any passage of the scriptures set before him; and likewise by what way he may be able, in the many themes of declamations, to procure the divisions of the things to be narrated, the definitions, causes, parts, effects, like and unlike passages, the reconciliations of unlike and seemingly-conflicting passages, and, finally, the most abundant furniture of an entire sermon. The same Conrad wrote also on Job a scholastic Postil, which begins, Even unto the time I have endured. He flourished under Adolph the Emperor, in the year of the Lord 1290.

Constantine, a presbyter of Antioch, a disciple of St. John Chrysostom — for whose sake also he suffered many persecutions from Porphyry, a presbyter of the church of Antioch — collected out of the works of the same Chrysostom an exposition on the epistle to the Hebrews, digested into 33 homilies; of which the first, which is more the argument of the work than a homily, begins, Writing to the Romans, etc.

Cornelius Magnanus, born under a happy star for the singing of sacred poems, read to me three volumes of heroic verse, most gracefully elaborated by himself: The First, on the life of Joseph, from the beginning of the 37th chapter of Genesis up to the fiftieth, digested in two books; whose opening is, Again we dip our lips in the ethereal fountains of the muses. The Second, on David's single combat, in chapter 17 of the first book of Kings; whose beginning is, The invincible strength of the boy, increased by heavenly commands. The Third, whose title is Juditha, explaining the history of Judith the widow; which begins, Let others sing of arrayed battle-lines of arms, and the horrid wars of Mars. He still lives, in the year of the Lord 1566, at Genoa, with the most distinguished man Battista Grimaldi, renowned for nobility, riches, and virtues.

Cornelius Musso [Cornelio Musso], Bishop of Bitonto, by fatherland of Piacenza, of the Order of Minors, a man endowed with an incomparable felicity of genius, excelling in all disciplines both divine and human, illustrious for the probity of his life and morals, was so begotten by nature herself for the exercising of the powers of eloquence that, from his very first boyhood — that is, from the twelfth year of his age — he undertook the public office of sacred declamations, with so great admiration, applause, and desire of hearing of all the cities of Italy, that to the boy's sermons — as to unaccustomed spectacles of miracles — innumerable throngs of the peoples would gather. Then, as his age increased, being augmented with happier increments of eloquence, erudition, and grace, and raised through the various grades of honors to the dignity of the Episcopate, he transmitted to posterity many immortal monuments of his labors; of which there are extant most brilliant Sermons, published in the Tuscan tongue, [→ p240…] published[1] in the Tuscan tongue, [worthy] to be compared with the sermons of Gregory the Great, Basil the Great, Chrysostom, and the rest of the Fathers of Greece for their majesty of doctrine and eloquence. But among these that one most excels which is titled On the Benefit [De beneficio], upon that sentence from the Gospel of John, So God loved the world, that he gave his only-begotten Son [John 3:16]; in which he so poured out all the powers of his genius, erudition, and eloquence, that nothing more learned, nor more eloquent, could either be said or thought up in that kind. He had also in the Council of Trent an eloquent sermon in the Tuscan tongue, On the persecutions and victories of the Church, upon the forty-fifth Psalm, for the expedition of Charles V the Emperor against the Lutheran heretics — whom Caesar himself routed at the Elbe, a river of Germany, in a marvelous battle, in the year of the Lord 1546.

He flourished, illustrious, in the Council of Trent, and still lives up to the present year 1566. His erudition and eloquence Bernardino Tomitano, philosopher of the Academy of Padua, celebrated with an illustrious panegyric — though some learned men, notwithstanding, marked his sermons with the fault of a disordered composition, of a tiresome prolixity, of a juvenile affectation, and of vain ostentation: among these Girolamo [Hieronymus], Bishop of Verona, a declaimer famous in our age and of a more compressed and sinewy eloquence, had been accustomed to compare the author of them to a peddler of trifling wares, displaying the whole furniture of all his merchandise set out for show at the fairs. [Later-edition addition — not in our 1586 primary:] In the year of the Lord 1588, there were printed at Venice commentaries of the same Cornelius on the epistle of St. Paul to the Romans.

Cosmas Indicopleustes [Cosmas Indicoplensis] composed prolegomena, or Greek prefaces, on the Psalter, which are kept at Rome in the Vatican.

Christian, who is also [called] Druthmar, by nation an Aquitanian, presbyter of Corbie and monk of St. Benedict, learned in Greek and Latin and most learned in the sacred scriptures, published — for the monks of the monasteries of Stavelot and Malmedy, which lie under one abbot in the diocese of Liège — brief commentaries on the Gospel of Matthew, written in an open and simple style; in whose preface he promised that he would write also upon the other Evangelists, which he is said also to have done. The beginning of the work is, This title the Evangelist did not make. He is said to have flourished in the year of the Lord 850.

Christian Ischyrius, of Jülich [Iuliacensis], composed an ecphrasis [paraphrase] on the seven penitential Psalms, and likewise on all the Psalms which are read through the Canonical Hours in praise of Mary, and also on those Psalms which the Roman church chants in the vigils of the dead. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1536.

Christopher Marcellus, a Venetian, Archbishop of Corfu [Corcyra], left upon Psalm 13, How long, O Lord, wilt thou forget me [Ps 13:1], a commentary worthy of a pastor of the church, which begins, David the great Prophet. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1520.

Christopher of Nolham [Nolhamensis], a Dominican, wrote four books of Postils on the Gospels; on all the epistles of Paul, 14 books; and on the Canonical [catholic] epistles, 7 books.

Chromatius, Bishop of Aquileia, Roman by fatherland, a man most illustrious in piety and erudition — whom Jerome, in the preface to Paralipomenon [Chronicles], calls the holiest and most learned of the bishops of his time (which is rarely found) — published commentaries on Matthew notable for erudition and piety; out of which I have read the following fragments, namely:

On Matthew chapter 3, upon that text, Suffer it to be so now: for thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness [Matt 3:15], which begins, Wherefore the Lord answering.

On the fifth chapter of Matthew entire, and a fragment on part of the sixth chapter: whose beginning is, But seeing, he says [Matt 5:1].

Likewise, on the eight beatitudes in the fifth chapter of Matthew, an elegant homily, whose beginning is, The gathering gives us, brethren. He flourished in the year of the Lord 410, under Theodosius.

Constantine, a doctor of Theology, wrote in Spanish an exposition on the first Psalm, distributed into six sermons, printed at Antwerp in the year 1556.

Constantine Fontius [Ponce de la Fuente], a Canon in the cathedral church of Seville, wrote 6 sermons on Psalm 1, and commentaries on Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, the Song of Songs, and on the book of Job.

Cornelius Jansenius [Jansen], first Bishop of Ghent, wrote commentaries on Ecclesiasticus; a book On the Harmony of the Evangelists; commentaries on his own Harmony and on the whole Gospel history; Paraphrases on all the Psalms, with their arguments and annotations; likewise Paraphrases on those Canticles of the Old Testament which ecclesiastical use observes on the several weekdays; and likewise commentaries on the Proverbs of Solomon. Him I heard at Louvain, in the year of the Lord 1565, in the Schools of the Theologians, expounding the Proverbs of Solomon.

Cyprian, Bishop of Carthage, African by nation, before he received the faith taught rhetoric gloriously; but, at the persuasion of the presbyter Caecilius (from whom also he got his surname), being converted to Christ, he distributed all his substance to the poor, and after no long time, being elected to the presbyterate and then to the Bishopric of Carthage, wrote many most pious little works, of a most elegant phrasing and next neighbor to Ciceronian brilliance, for the edification of the church. In which — as Jerome says, writing to Paulinus — he moved along gentle and placid, after the manner of a most pure fountain. Of their number is reported an explanation, of holy and graceful brevity, on the Lord's Prayer [the Dominical Prayer], whose beginning is, The Gospel precepts. From which St. Augustine brought forth testimonies concerning original sin against Pelagius, in book 4 to Boniface, against the two epistles of the Pelagians chapter 9, and in book 2 against Julian chapter 1. Lactantius, in the 5th book of the Divine Institutes, describing Cyprian's eloquence,[2] uses these words: One therefore stood forth as chief and renowned, Cyprian, who had sought for himself great glory from the profession of the oratorical art, and wrote very many things wonderful in their kind. For he was of a genius facile, copious, sweet, and — which is the greatest virtue of speech — clear: so that you could not discern whether he were more ornate in speaking, or readier in explaining, or [→ p241]

Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)*

[Letter C, continued from p240:]

...or whether any man was more powerful in persuading. He flourished in the year of the Lord 240.

Cyprian, a Cistercian monk, left commentaries on Matthew, on Job, and on Psalms 51 and 79.

Cyril, Bishop of the Church of Alexandria, nephew (by a brother) of Theophilus, Bishop of the same city, renowned for sharpness of genius, subtlety of judgment, variety of erudition, ease of teaching, and abundance of discourse, and conspicuous for sincere piety, left upon the divine letters various and almost innumerable labors of the interpretive kind — that is, homilies exceedingly elegant (which formerly, as Gennadius reports, the Bishops of Greece used to commit to memory for declaiming) — likewise epistles, commentaries, and disputations. Of all these, only the below-written have come to my knowledge, namely:

An Allegorical work on the Pentateuch, whose title and argument is, That throughout all the scripture of Moses the mystery of Christ is signified. But the sermons — or booklets, or distinctions, or rather the titles, by which the whole work is divided — are these:

• That in all the scripture of Moses a mystery concerning Christ is found — the Preface, beginning Ἐρευνᾶτε τὰς γραφάς, that is, Search the scriptures [John 5:39].

• On the first chapter of Genesis, On the formation of Adam, sermon 1, beginning, That most sacred Paul.

• On Genesis 6, On Noah and the Ark, sermon 2.

• On Genesis 9, On the nakedness of Noah, sermon 3.

• On Genesis 11, On the tower and its building, sermon 4.

• On Genesis 14, On Abraham and Melchizedek, sermon 3 [read 5].

• On Genesis 15, On Abraham and the promise made to him in Isaac, sermon 6.

• On Genesis 22, On the sacrifice of Abraham and Isaac, sermon 7.

• On Genesis 24, On Isaac and Rebecca, sermon 8.

• On Genesis 25, On Esau and Jacob, prefiguring the two peoples, sermon 9.

• On Genesis 27 up to 35, On the persecution of Esau, sermon 10.

• On Genesis 30 and 31, On the things done between Jacob and Laban, sermon 11.

• On Genesis 32, On Jacob sending messengers to Esau, sermon 12.

• On Genesis 32, On the nocturnal wrestling of Jacob, sermon 13.

• On Genesis 39 [read 37], On Joseph feeding his father's sheep with his brethren, sermon 14.

• On Genesis 38, On Judah and Tamar, sermon 15.

• On Genesis 39 [read 37], On Joseph sold to the Ishmaelites, sermon 16.

• On Genesis 48, On the blessing of the sons of Joseph, sermon 17.

• On Genesis 49, On the blessings of the Patriarchs, sermon 18.

These sermons, written in Greek, Ambrose of Milan showed to us — a monk of Monte Cassino, a man most skilled in both tongues, who is shortly to publish them, turned into Latin by himself. But the sermons subjoined, on the remaining volumes of the Pentateuch, we saw written in a most ancient Greek codex, which was supplied to us by Angelo Giustiniani the Chian [of Chios], a Minorite, a distinguished Theologian, who lately, out of the ruins of Greece, gathered together — with much money and labor — a Library furnished with the monuments of the most ancient fathers of the Eastern Church, and brought it with him into Italy, as a certain sacred treasure. The titles of the sermons run thus:

• On Exodus chapter 4, On the three signs shown to Moses by God, sermon 19.

• On Exodus 12, On the sacrifice of the lamb, sermon 20.

• On Exodus 13, On the consecration of the firstborn, sermon 21.

• On Exodus 25 [read 15], On the water of Marah, sermon 22.

• On Exodus 16, On the Manna and the quails, sermon 23.

• On Exodus 17, On the rock struck in Rephidim, sermon 24.

• On Exodus 19, On the inaccessible mountain, and Israel encamped beside it, sermon 25.

• On Exodus 24, On the ascent of Moses, Aaron, Nadab, and Abihu, sermon 26.

• On Exodus 32, On the making of the calf, sermon 27.

• On Exodus 34, On the veil upon the face of Moses, sermon 28.

• On Leviticus 1, That the passion of Christ is salutary, sermon 29.

• On the same [Leviticus 1], That we shall be everywhere partakers of the mystical benediction, holy and sacred, sermon 30.

• On Leviticus 14, On the cleansing of leprosy, sermon 31.

• On Leviticus 16, On the synagogue of the Jews, which fell through unbelief, sermon 32.

• On the same [Leviticus 16], That Aaron does not always enter into the Holy of Holies, sermon 33.

• On the book of Numbers chapter 13, On the spies of the land of promise, sermon 34.

• On Numbers 14, On Christ, and the synagogue of the Jews, and the murmuring of the people, sermon 35.

• On Numbers 15, That Christ became for us the bread of life, and on the firstfruits, sermon 36.

• On Numbers 19, On the red heifer, sermon 37.

• On Numbers 21, On the bronze serpent, sermon 39.

• On Deuteronomy chapter 20, On those sent to war, sermon 38. [The sermon numbers 38 and 39 stand thus in the print, transposed — the serpent (Num 21) numbered 39, and those sent to war (Deut 20) numbered 38.]

• On Deuteronomy 21, On the captive woman whose nails are to be pared, sermon 40.

• On Deuteronomy 22, On the ox fallen into a pit, sermon 41.

• On Deuteronomy 27, On the stones to be set up across the Jordan, sermon 42.

• On Deuteronomy 31, On the appointment and election of Joshua, sermon 43.

He also wrote, upon the sixteenth chapter of Leviticus, concerning the Apopompaeus — that is, the scapegoat [the emissary goat] — one Epistle to Bishop Acacius, which begins, Having read the things which by your holiness [were sent].

There are also carried about under Cyril's name sixteen books of commentaries on Leviticus, printed too impudently by the printers of our times; since they are neither commentaries, nor Cyril's work, but sixteen extemporary homilies of Origen, delivered to the people — in which Origen often excuses himself that, constrained by shortness of time, he cannot dwell upon the explanation of individual words, after the manner of those who write commentaries at leisure, and that he therefore touches on very few things, aiming more at the edification of his hearers than at the exposition of the scriptures. And it appears that these homilies are Origen's, as much from the likeness of the style as of the doctrines.

He likewise composed on Isaiah five [→ p242]

[Letter C, continued from p241:]

...he likewise composed on Isaiah five books, divided in the same order into various sermons, or sections, whose beginning is, Obscure always is the speech of the holy Prophets.

He also dictated on Daniel, on Hosea, and on Habakkuk very many homilies, which are kept in the Vatican Library.

He wrote besides, on the whole Gospel of Matthew, several books, or volumes, of an entire and continuous explanation; out of whose eleventh and twelfth volumes testimonies are cited in the sixth synod of Constantinople, and in the second synod of Nicaea.

There are extant, in the Golden Chain [Catena Aurea] of St. Thomas on Luke, very many fragments of explanations on that same Gospel, marked under the name of Cyril; in which the repetitions, transitions, connexions, epilogues, and other things of that kind seem to indicate that Cyril wrote either commentaries or homilies on Luke.

Likewise, on the Gospel of John, twelve books, with many disputations against the Arians and other heretics inserted throughout the whole work here and there. Of these books the four middle ones — namely the fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth — being lost through the injury of the times, Josse Clichtove [Iudocus Clictoveus] supplied, gathered out of Chrysostom and other fathers.

After these he published also commentaries on the epistle to the Hebrews: of which I have found great and prolix fragments, marked under Cyril's name — partly in Theodoret, in the dialogue which is entitled INCONFVSVS [The Unconfounded], partly in Theodore the Greek Monk, in the book whose title is ὅτι ὁ πατὴρ ἀεὶ γεννᾷ, that is, That the Father always begets.

He wrote, finally, for the defense of both Testaments, ten books of disputations against the Emperor Julian, who, in seven published volumes, had assailed the sacrosanct scriptures.

Cyril flourished [was illustrious] in the Council of Ephesus, over which, by the command of Pope Celestine, he presided in the year of the Lord 432.

Cyril, Bishop of Jerusalem, a most illustrious asserter and champion of Catholic and Apostolic doctrine, wrote upon various passages of the divine scripture very many homilies and sermons; of which there now survive eighteen catechetical orations to the illuminati [the newly-enlightened], which Jerome asserts were composed by the author in his youth. The preface of these begins thus: Already there is the odor of blessedness in you. There survive likewise, of the same [Cyril], upon some sentences of scripture, five Mystagogic sermons, in which he discourses clearly on Baptism, Chrism, and the Eucharist. These, with the foregoing, John Grodecius turned from Greek into Latin. He flourished under the emperor Theodosius, in whose time he held his Bishopric — from which he had often been driven — unshaken for eight years. He dies about the year of the Lord 380.

Damiano Maraffi [Damianus Maraffus], a Florentine, compiled two books, in which he set forth the chief histories of the Old and New Testament with most elegant pictures, drawn by the hand of Albrecht Dürer, a German, a most excellent painter; with Tuscan octastichs [eight-line stanzas] added to each, explaining the meaning of every picture. He flourished in the year of the saving incarnation of our Lord Jesus Christ 1554.

Defensor, a learned, pious, and ancient Theologian, for the gratification of his fosterer Ursinus, culled out of all sacred scripture certain common passages [commonplaces] of various moral arguments, adding also the sentences of the most ancient fathers, which he found to be conformable to the aforesaid passages of the scriptures. And he entitled his work The Sparks of Holy Scripture [Scintillae Scripturae Sanctae], whose beginning is, Reader, whoever you are. At what time he flourished is uncertain.

Didymus of Alexandria [Didymus the Blind], an admirable man, flourishing in erudition of every kind. When he was quite young, and had learned the first elements of grammar, he fell into a disease of the eyes, by which he was so badly affected that he lost the keenness of sight. But God furnished him, in place of bodily eyes, with spiritual ones: for even blind he grasped Rhetoric, and, advancing to Philosophical studies, learned Dialectic in a certain astonishing manner, and stored up in his mind Arithmetic, Geometry, Music, and the rest of the disciplines of the philosophers. Nay more, he held most exactly the divine oracles of the Old and New Testament, and expounded Origen's Periarchon [On First Principles], and published commentaries upon it, in which he contended that the things which are in it are well written. To him Antony the Great, the monk, having met with him at Alexandria, said: Let nothing, O Didymus, trouble you at the loss of your bodily eyes: for you are deprived of such eyes as even flies and gnats can see with; but rejoice that you have eyes with which the angels see, and God is contemplated, and His light is apprehended.

Alluding to which saying, St. Jerome — Didymus's disciple in the sacred letters — in the epistle to Paulinus [says]: My Didymus, having the eyes of the bride from the Song of Songs, and those lights which Jesus commanded to be lifted up upon the whitening cornfields [John 4:35], looks far higher, and restores to us the ancient custom, so that, being a seer, he is also called a Prophet. Surely, he who reads him will recognize the thefts of the Latins, and will despise the rivulets when he has begun to draw from the fountains. He is unskilled in speech, but not in knowledge, expressing an Apostolic man by his very style, as much by the light of the sense as by the simplicity of the words.

This man, therefore, dictated many and noble commentaries through notaries [shorthand-writers]: whose whole ἐξήγησις [exegesis], to use Jerome's word, was allegorical, and scarcely touching a few points of the history [the literal narrative]. Of which number the most notable are:

- Of commentaries on Job, three books.
- On the Psalter, one book.
- On Isaiah, from the beginning of the 40th chapter to the end, eighteen volumes.
- To Jerome the Presbyter, on Hosea, three books.
- To the same, on Zechariah, five books.
- On Matthew, one book.
- On John, one book.
- On the epistles of Paul, fourteen books.
- On the Catholic epistles, seven books.

He flourished under Theodosius the Great, in the year of the Lord 390.

[Letter D, continued from p242:]

Diego de Deza [Diegus Deza], Archbishop of Seville, born at Toro, a noble town of Castile in Spain, of the Order of Preachers, in all Spain the supreme censor in matters of faith [Inquisitor General], who built at Seville the notable college of the Dominicans; among the other monuments of his genius, he left a Gospel Monotessaron [gospel-harmony], illustrated with most beautiful commentaries, which is now kept in the Library of the same college, in a great volume, written in elegant characters. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1500.

Diodorus, Bishop of Tarsus, the teacher of John Chrysostom in the sacred letters, formerly a presbyter of the church of Antioch, illustrious no less for sanctity than for knowledge of the sacred letters; having attained the meaning of Eusebius of Emesa and the understanding of the scriptures, which he had taken to himself as a model — yet he could not imitate his eloquence, on account of his ignorance of secular literature. He therefore, as Suidas relates on the authority of Theodore the historian, wrote upon the divine scriptures the below-written volumes:

- On the Pentateuch, five books.
- On the books of Kings, on Paralipomenon [Chronicles], on the Psalter, on Proverbs, on Ecclesiastes, on the Song of Songs, on the Prophets — commentaries greatly to be approved.
- Likewise on the four Gospels, on Paul, on the Acts of the Apostles, and on the Epistle of John the Evangelist, noble commentaries.
- Likewise, on the distinction between Theory [Theoria] and Allegory in the holy Scriptures, one book.

Theodoret, in book 6 of the Ecclesiastical History, chapter 3, making mention of him, writes thus: Diodorus, Bishop of Tarsus, wrote many books; and because he was intent upon the bare letter of the divine scriptures, he overturned their higher meanings. And this same thing Sozomen attributes to him, in book 8 of the Ecclesiastical History, chapter 2, saying: I have heard that Diodorus, Bishop of Tarsus, left behind him many books of his commentaries, and that he expounded the sacred scriptures according to the letter, the theoria being neglected. Nicephorus also, in the 13th volume of his History, adds these things:[1] Diodorus, Bishop of Tarsus, left many books of his writings on both Testaments: in which he was occupied only with the exposition of the letter itself, declining the more abstruse and sublime sense of Scripture and the speculations of contemplations; in which matter also his disciple John Chrysostom especially followed him. He flourished in the year of the Lord 360.

Dionysius, the 13th Bishop of the city of Alexandria, once a hearer of Origen, imbued with all the disciplines, sacred as well as profane; while he was still a presbyter, he held the public school under Heraclas, and acquired great glory for his learning — although he consented to the doctrine of Cyprian and of the African synod concerning the rebaptizing of heretics. This man, then, wrote learned commentaries on Ecclesiastes; of which Procopius of Gaza makes mention in his explanation of the third chapter of Genesis. He wrote likewise a narration upon the first [epistle] to the Corinthians, which Jerome mentions in the epistle to Pammachius. Likewise, against Nepos, a Chiliast Bishop, who from the Apocalypse of John falsely maintained a reign of a thousand years, two books, in which he disputed most diligently and most piously concerning all these things which are contained in the revelation of John. He wrote likewise against Irenaeus, Bishop of Lyons, who expounded the Apocalypse of John carnally, one book:[2] which Jerome mentions in the preface to the 18th book of his commentaries on Isaiah. He dies in the twelfth year of Gallienus, that is, about the year of the Lord 270.

Dionysius Leuwis [Denis the Carthusian, of Rijkel], a German, from the town of Rijkel, of the Carthusian institute, professor in the noble monastery of Roermond, a man of the highest erudition and sanctity, so fervently and so assiduously devoted in spirit to contemplation and prayer that it is a marvel that a man, abstracted by continual meditation on divine things, could write so great and various a number of volumes as we now have in print. This man illustrated all the books of both Testaments with most pious and most clear commentaries, and, according to the threefold sense of divine scripture — and especially the literal — explained them briefly and most openly, following the custom of the scholastic expositors, yet in a somewhat more polished style, and midway between the ancient fathers and the more recent followers of the schools. He cites by name not only the ancient authors, but also the scholastics themselves — Hugh [of St. Cher], Bonaventure, Thomas [Aquinas], Lyra [Nicholas of Lyra], and others of the same profession — out of whose rhapsodies he gathered his own explanations, omitting their tiresome divisions and subdivisions. But the number of his commentaries, together with their openings (beginning, in the scholastic manner, from various sentences of the scriptures), you have in Trithemius. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1472.

Dominic Buchi [Buchius] of Kotor [Catharensis], of the Order of Preachers, a scholastic Theologian, published an exposition on the seven penitential Psalms, with pious little prayers added to each, which he entitled A most elegant Etymum upon the seven Psalms. The work begins, Heavenly Manna. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1530.

Dominic Grenier [Greniae] of Toulouse, a Dominican, Bishop of Pamiers [Appaniensis], wrote on the Pentateuch, 5 books, and on the historical books of the Bibles, 6 books.

Dominic Leoni [Leonus], a Venetian, a scholastic by profession, whose many volumes are kept in manuscript in the Dominican Library of Bologna, wrote a Postil on Luke, which begins, Of the super-ineffable Prince. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1368.

Dominic Mancini [Mancinus], a not ignoble poet, put forth in Hexameter verses one book, On the Passion of the Lord, gathered from the four Gospels, which begins, Not the praises of men, nor, etc. In the year of the Lord 1494.

Dominic Nani Mirabelli [Nanus Mirabellius], a citizen of Alba, doctor of arts, whose work is extant, entitled POLYANTHEA, in the year 1470, compiled a Monotessaron of the gospels, or a Harmony from the four Gospels; in which work, together with the gospel sentences, he wove in all the authorities and sentences of the gentile philosophers, poets, and orators which seemed to agree with the several passages of the Gospels, the names of the authors whose sentences they were being appended. ...kept at Genoa, in the Library of the Preachers' monastery of the Castle. And the names of the authors from which he wove the Harmony are these — the Seven Sages of Greece, [and]:

Seneca, Ovid, the oracles of the Sibyls, Hermes Trismegistus, Pythagoras, Anaxagoras, Empedocles, Zeno, Plato, Aristotle, Aesop, Apuleius, Muhammad, Isocrates, Cicero [Tullius]; Homer, Terence, Virgil, Horace, Plautus, Juvenal, Persius, Claudian, Lucan, Lucretius, Pliny, Aulus Gellius, Macrobius, Valerius Maximus; [and] the author of the work himself.

Dominic Soto [Dominicus Soto], a Spaniard, of Segovia by fatherland, of the Order of Preachers, confessor to the Imperial Majesty, a supreme Theologian, Philosopher, and orator, wrote, in the year of the Lord 1548, commentaries on the Epistle to the Romans, greatly to be approved for erudition, style, and especially method: in which he first most clearly elucidates the literal senses; then, having briefly proposed and resolved all the controversies of both the ancients and the more recent [writers] upon this epistle, he applies himself, with all the efficacy of speech he can, to affecting and stirring up souls. The opening of the work is, I can by no means further deny [dissemble].

Dorotheus, Bishop of Tyre, who under Julian Augustus, the deserter of the Christian religion, suffered martyrdom, compiled a Synopsis of all holy scripture — that is, a Conspectus [Contuitus] — in which he embraced most briefly the arguments of all the books of both Testaments. He flourished in the year of the Dracontius, a presbyter, a Spaniard, wrote an exposition on the Hexaemeron of the creation of the world in heroic verses: of which Honorius of Autun [Augustodunensis] makes mention in his catalogue.

E

Eckhart [Eccardus], a German, a Dominican, in Peripatetic Philosophy the chief of all the learned men of his age, and most excellent in the knowledge of divine things, of a sharp and subtle genius — some of whose scholastic propositions, on account of the obscurity, ambiguity, and novelty of the terms, were hissed out [rejected] by the Academies of the Theologians — wrote, in the scholastic manner, on Genesis, on Exodus, on the Song of Songs, on the Wisdom of Solomon, on John, on the Lord's Prayer, [and] on the festal Gospels of the whole year. He flourished under Henry VII the Emperor, in the year of the Lord 1310.

Eckbert [Eckebertus], a Benedictine, the second Abbot of the monastery of St. Florinus, German by nation, brother of Blessed Elisabeth the virgin, abbess of Schönau, wrote little works of not-to-be-despised reading, of which I saw, at the beginning [of the volume], a pious book on the Gospel of John, which begins, The mysteries of the divine discourse.

Edward Lee [Edvardus Leus], an Englishman, wrote annotations against the annotations of Erasmus on the New Testament, which were printed at Mainz in the year of the Lord 1520.

Hegesippus [Egesippus], a Jew by race, simple in life and speech, reduced to the form of a Greek History, in a brief and simple style, all the deeds of the kingdom of Jerusalem contained in the four books of Kings, up to the captivity of the Jews; and the destruction of the wall, and the triumphs of Babylon. Of which labor he himself makes mention in the preface to his five books, On the Destruction of the City of Jerusalem, which are now extant. He flourished near the Apostolic times, and reached down to Antoninus Pius, in the year of the Lord 160.

Einhard [Einardus, who is also called Eginardus], German by nation, master of the epistles [secretary] of Charlemagne Augustus, afterward a Benedictine monk, admirable for his studies of the disciplines and for most holy morals; imitating Bede, with a like zeal he too abridged the Gallican Psalter, gathering out of it meditations, prayers, and thanksgivings, by which the pious petitioner may pour out his heart before God. He flourished under Charles [Charlemagne] and Louis his son, in the year of the Lord 860.

Epiphanius, bishop of Salamis in Cyprus (which afterward, as Jerome testifies, was called Constantia) — or first of Salamis, and afterward of Constantia, as Suidas holds — bishop of various cities of Cyprus, formerly a hermit and a monk of the solitude of Egypt, a man notable for erudition, and, on account of his skill in five languages, called Πεντάγλωττος [Five-tongued] by Jerome; illustrious for sanctity and miracles; a most keen enemy of the heretics, against whom he also published a notable work, called Panarium — that is, The Medicine-Chest. He wrote a most useful book for the understanding of many words and characters [signs] which are found both in the Scriptures and in the ancient editions of the interpreters: in which he treats of the weights and measures used in the divine Letters, of the parts of divine Scripture, of its interpreters, and of the accent-marks and characters which are found here and there among the ancient interpreters of sacred scripture. Whose beginning is, If anyone shall wish to know.

He wrote likewise περὶ λίθων, that is, On Stones [Gems] — especially indeed of those which are mentioned in the sacred Letters — one book, from which Arethas, bishop of Cappadocia, in his Commentaries on the Apocalypse, and Jerome, in his commentaries on the 35th chapter of Isaiah, bring forth testimonies.

He published also On the Life and Death of all the Prophets, from Nathan the prophet down to John the Baptist, one book, not useless for understanding the titles, occasions, and arguments of the prophetic volumes. Whose beginning is, Nathan, about the same times.

He composed also, on the Gospel of Luke, one little book, entitled Of the Pavement [Pavimentum]: in which he confuted all the passages of that gospel corrupted and falsified by Marcion, teaching at the same time certain rules, by whose help, in the sacred volumes, [the passages] of the sincere and catholic Scri[pture] [→ p245]

[Letter E, continued from p244:]

...the [passages] of the sincere and catholic Scripture may be detected and distinguished from the adulterated scriptures of the heretics, and confuted. And this Pavement he inserted into the first book of his Panarium, in heresy 42. He flourished under Theodosius Augustus, in the year of the Lord 390.

Epiphanius, surnamed Scholasticus, Greek by nation and language (by whose help Cassiodorus, a Roman consul and a monk, put together the Tripartite History out of Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret, the Greek authors), collected into one chain [catena] of explanations the more notable expositions of the most excellent fathers pertaining to the Psalter: whose beginning is ΕΥΣΕΒΙΟΥ ΚΑΙΣΑΡΕΙΑΣ, Μακαριότητες μὲν κατὰ φύσιν ἅπαντες ὀρεγόμεθα — "OF EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA: We all indeed by nature desire states of blessedness." And the names of the authors, whose expositions are contained in this work, are these: Origen, Athanasius, Eusebius of Caesarea, Basil of Cappadocia, Asterius of Scythopolis, Theodore of Antioch; Theodore of Antioch, Didymus, Apollinaris, Theodoret, Cyril, Hesychius. [Theodore of Antioch stands both at the foot of the first column and at the head of the second — so printed.] He flourished in the year of our Lord Jesus Christ 150.

Ephrem the Syrian [Ephrem Syrus], deacon and monk, published very many sermons — first in the Syriac, and then in the Greek language — upon various passages of divine scripture; of which I have read, on Matthew 17, one homily On the Transfiguration of the Lord, beginning, The joys of the regions of the harvest.

Erhard [Erhardus], a Benedictine monk, a man (so far as appears from his fragments, which are read in the compendium of allegories of Tilmann) piously learned, of subtle genius, and pleasing in eloquence, wrote on the Pentateuch of Moses five books of commentaries of not-to-be-despised reading. He lived in the year of the Lord 1050.

Isaiah of Padua [Esaias Patauinus], an Augustinian canon, brought up in the monastery of the Charity at Venice, composed commentaries in the Italian tongue on the Song of Songs of Solomon, in the year of the Lord 1480.

Evagrius, bishop of Antioch, formerly a monk and disciple of Blessed Macarius the Egyptian, a man skilled in Greek and Latin eloquence, so preserved in his Episcopate the abstinence and austerity of his former life that he was held for a miracle: this man first committed to writing the lives of the holy fathers,[1] and wrote various things also upon the sacred letters — of which number are most beautiful commentaries on the Proverbs of Solomon. He flourished under Gratian Augustus, in the year of the Lord 380.

Eucherius, bishop of the church of Lyons, Gaul by nation, a man notable among those who flourished in the glory of piety, erudition, and eloquence, left many monuments of his illustrious genius upon the sacred letters, written in the Latin tongue and most flourishingly adorned with elegant words and pointed sentences; of which Gennadius reviewed a little work, On various and obscure chapters of divine Scripture, to Salonius and Veranius (brothers, and afterward Bishops), divided into two little books. To which Isidore added, on Genesis, and on the books of Kings — [dedicated] to the same Salonius and Veranius, now bishops — a prolix and most learned volume. For which works, indeed, there came out formerly from the Froben press, and lately from the Roman printing-house of Paulus Manutius, under Eucherius's name: on Genesis, three books of a discontinuous and interrupted exposition of commentaries; on the four books of Kings, four books of an explanation of the same kind; and one book of Spiritual Formulae, useful for understanding the holy scriptures.

Although I confess these to be learned and most worthy to be read, yet I would not dare to affirm that they are Eucherius's, but rather of some uncertain and more recent compiler, who gathered the work here and there, after the manner of centos, out of the sayings of the Latin fathers — especially from whole sentences of Gregory, Isidore, Bede, and other authors, whom Eucherius preceded by almost two hundred years. For he lived — as he testifies in the epistle to Valerianus — contemporary with Petronius, bishop of Bologna, in the year from the founding of the City 1185, that is, in the year 427 from the redemption of the world.

But if, in so great a crowd of writers, one may divine who heaped this medley of explanations into a pile, I suspect that he was an Englishman, and perhaps even Bede himself, whose especial zeal it was to gather collectanea out of the writings of the ancient teachers — but most of all of Gregory the Pope, whose name is found cited more than once in this work; as, for example, in the first book of the exposition on the book of Kings, toward whose end the reader is referred to the reading of the Morals of Blessed Pope Gregory; and in the third volume of the same explanation, at the twenty-second chapter — in which place, indeed, the author in a way hints that he lived in Britain not long after the times of Gregory, writing thus: In our recent times, Blessed Pope Gregory, strengthened with evangelical eloquence, ruled the Roman church; and the most reverend fathers Augustine, Paulinus, and the rest of their companions, at his bidding, came into Britain, etc. To this conjecture another is added: that a great part of those things which are contained in these commentaries on Kings is read in the same words in the volume of Bede's Questions upon the books of Kings. I could also, for the surer confirmation of this our judgment, subjoin here an index of the innumerable passages which — both in these [commentaries] of the Spiritual Formulae, and in the commentaries on Genesis and Kings — have been transferred out of Bede and Gregory: but these, consulting brevity, I pass over, thinking I have done enough if I have pointed out to my readers that these things are so.

Eucherius also published, upon various passages of divine scripture, most celebrated sermons; from which the most learned man Claudianus [Mamertus], bishop of Vienne, his contemporary, taking testimony in his books On the State of the Soul, briefly embraced his praise in these words: By no means would I pass over Eucherius, known to me now living by his doctrine and by present disputations face to face — [a man] who, namely, of green age yet mature in mind, spurning the earth, longing for heaven, humble in spirit, ardent in merit, and likewise most subtle of genius, full of knowledge, flowing in eloquence, by far the greatest of the great Pontiffs of his age, having published, for the benefit of the fai[th] [→ p246]

Running head: LIBER QVARTVS.)*

[Letter E, continued from p245:]

...of the faith, many continuous volumes of various works; and he also preached to the people many noble sermons upon the state of the soul.

Eudocia, a most illustrious woman, daughter of Leo [Leontius] the Athenian philosopher,[1] wife of Theodosius the Younger Augustus, notable for the exceptional endowments of body and mind, a perpetual cultivator of the Christian religion, zealous of the sacred volumes, and, in the glory of the poetic art, foremost among all the poets of her time, gathered — briefly and summarily, in imitation of Proba, that illustrious woman — out of the Greek verses of Homer, with admirable industry, very many histories of the Old and New Testament, preserving the measure of the feet and the majesty of the Homeric verse: which work, reduced into a compendium, she entitled Ὁμηρόκεντρα, that is, HOMEROCENTONES [Homeric centos].

Yet John Zonaras, a Greek author, asserts that a certain learned patrician man first compiled this work, and afterward left it imperfect and undigested; but that Eudocia at last completed it and reduced it into order — as the Greek inscription, prefixed to the work in heroic verses, declares.

The same author also relates that Eudocia, when at first — on account of her singular chastity and excellent beauty — she was most dear to her husband, fell innocently into his bitter hatred for such a cause as this. An apple, offered to him of unusual size, the Emperor, wondering at it, sent to his wife; she gave it to Paulinus, a learned man, and for that reason familiar to her. He, ignorant of the matter, offers it to the Emperor as a marvelous thing; whereupon he, having recognized it and hidden it, asks his wife where the apple sent to her may be. She, fearing lest her husband suspect that which he already suspected, answered that she had eaten it. But when he pressed more sharply, she affirms with an oath that she had already eaten it. Then the Emperor, moved with anger, produces the apple: thus she, caught in a manifest lie, the husband's suspicion is confirmed. But Paulinus, though innocent, is put to death. Eudocia, when she perceived that she was hated, asks leave to depart to Jerusalem. Having set out thither with great wealth, she both built churches and gave much to the monasteries of the poor of that place. Returning thence after her husband's death, she went back there again; and there she died, not without a great reputation for sanctity, in the reign of Marcian Augustus, in the year of our salvation 460.

St. Jerome, in a certain epistle to Paulinus, writes that he had read Homerocentones and Virgiliocentones, but whose, he does not himself indicate. Isidore of Seville reports that a certain Pomponius, a noble poet, with a like zeal, put together many things out of Virgilian verses. Aldus Manutius printed a very ancient volume of Ὁμηρόκεντρα, without the author's name: whose beginning is Κέκλυτε μυρία φῦλα περικτιόνων ἀνθρώπων, that is, Hear, ye countless tribes of the men dwelling round about.

Eulalius, bishop of Cynopolis, a man nobly learned in the sacred eloquences, and — according to the interpretation of his name — speaking excellently, no less excelling in prose than in verse, wrote on the Song of Songs a prose-verse exposition — that is, composed with verses mingled with loose [prose] speech — whose beginning is:

Ὃς μόνος εἰς αἰῶνα καὶ ἐξ αἰῶνος ἐτέχθης, Χριστέ, that is, O Christ, who alone both ever art and ever hast been. He flourished in the Council of Constantinople, in the year of the Lord 670.

Eusebius, Bishop of Caesarea in Palestine (which was formerly called the Tower of Strato), surnamed Pamphilus himself, on account of his most close intimacy with Pamphilus the martyr; a disciple of Dorotheus the Eunuch, a most learned man; and, together with Pamphilus, a most diligent investigator of the divine Library; so illustrious among all the bishops of his age for his skill in the secular disciplines and his exercise in the divine Letters, that he deserved to be celebrated by the most noble elogium of the Emperor Constantine.[2] For he was often accustomed to say of him: that Eusebius was happy, who was worthy of the Episcopate not of one city, but of almost the whole world.

Yet there were not lacking those who wrote that he was an asserter of the Arian heresy and a corrupter of the Nicene synod — whether deceived by the similarity of the name and dignity, which he had in common with [the other] Eusebius, bishop first of Berytus in Palestine, and afterward of Nicomedia in Bithynia, the standard-bearer of the Arians; or led to believe it because Eusebius of Caesarea, in the Council of Nicaea, was unwilling to assent to the word Ὁμοούσιος [Homoousios, "consubstantial"] proposed [by the fathers], except after a long inquiry and examination of the term. Which was done by him not maliciously, but rather out of a sincere zeal for piety. For since many of the bishops wished the word Homoousios to be received, as excluding the multitude of gods which Arius had introduced, but very many bishops sharply turned away from that same word, as introducing the dogma of Sabellius (who held that there was one person of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit) — and since, on account of this diversity of opinions, Eusebius long hesitated to which party he should join himself: Eustathius, bishop of Antioch (who afterward, being accused by Cyrus, bishop of Beroea, was deposed), tore him with revilings as though a favorer of Arius and a defiler of the Nicene faith. Eusebius, on the contrary, [maintained] that he neither favored Arius nor corrupted the Nicene faith, but that Eustathius was introducing the perfidy of Sabellius. At last, when it had been declared by the fathers that by this word Homoousios the distinction of the persons — which were of the same nature and essence — was not taken away, he subscribed to the decree of the Homoousians, and, by the command of the fathers, drew up the Symbol of the Nicene faith, which is now chanted in the Church; and, since he was most zealous of the divine Books, he composed many volumes toward their elucidation, following in these Origen, whose admirer and diligent imitator he was. Of these, the ones which pertain to the understanding of the whole divine scripture are these:

A translation into the Greek language of all the books of the Old Testament which are in the Canon of the Hebrews: which Socrates mentions in book 1 of his History, and Sozomen in book 2.

Of the Topography of the Holy Land [ΤΟΠΟΓΡΑΦΙΑ τῆς ἁγίας γῆς], that is, A Description of the Places of the Holy Land, one book: in which he depicted, in a geographical map, the division of the twelve tribes with their several towns, and the whole structure of the city of Jerusalem and of its Temple, with a brief explanation added, which set forth the several parts of the whole picture. Jerome mentions this work in the aforesaid preface.

On the Doctrine of the Ancient Men, one book: in which he interpreted innumerable things concerning the life, fortitude, piety, and prudence of the ancient Patriarchs — partly historically, partly allegorically, and tropologically. He himself mentions this work in the seventh book of the Preparation of the Gospel, chapter 3.

Of Eclogae [Selections], or Collectanea of divine Scripture, one book: in which, at the command of Constantine Augustus (who supplied all the costs), he gathered out of the sacred letters especially those passages and sentences which he thought most suited to the edification and use of the Church, and had them multiplied in fifty copies, of the best parchments, by craftsmen skilled in most elegant writing. Theodoret makes mention of these codices in book 1 of the Ecclesiastical History, chapter 16; and Eusebius himself in book 4 of the Life of Constantine.

On the whole Psalter, most learned commentaries according to the literal and mystical understanding, and especially the meanings of Origen: which Eusebius Sardus [the Sardinian], bishop of Vercelli, having cut out some things which seemed insufficiently sound, presented in Latin for the Western Church to read.

On Isaiah the prophet, books of commentaries according to the historical explanation — as Jerome notes in the preface to his first commentary on Isaiah — fifteen; or, as the same reckons in the book On Illustrious Men, twenty books. Concerning which the same Jerome, in the preface to the fifth commentary on Isaiah, says: Eusebius, promising by his title a historical exposition, sometimes forgets his purpose, and cuts down the allegorical sowings of Origen; and again, in chapter 18 of the same commentary, he adds these words: Eusebius, promising by his title a historical interpretation, wanders off into various senses: when I read his books, I found something far other than what he promised in his index. For wherever the history failed him, he passed over to allegory; and so he joins together things separate, that I marvel at him — joining, by a new fabric of speech, stone and iron into one body.

On both Testaments, assailed by Porphyry in fifteen books, thirty volumes: out of which he wrote three books — namely the eighteenth, nineteenth, and twentieth — for the defense of the whole prophecy of Daniel; against which Porphyry had dictated his twelfth, of the fifteen books which he had put forth against the divine scriptures. Jerome [mentions this] in the preface to his commentary on Daniel.

Of the Evangelical Preparation, fifteen books: in which, although he brings no exposition of the divine volumes, yet he instructs and forms the Gentiles who were to read the evangelical writings, as it were with certain first rudiments.

Of the Evangelical Demonstration, twenty books: in which, chiefly for the sake of the Jews, he demonstrated that nothing is written in the gospel which was not, in the law and the prophets, foretold many ages before. On which occasion he clearly expounds all the scriptures which, in the whole Old Testament, speak of Christ.

Περὶ τῆς τῶν εὐαγγελίων διαφωνίας, that is, On the Dissonance of the Gospels, one book: in which he brought all the passages of the Gospels which seem to conflict in appearance to a stable concord. A fragment of this work — On the controversy over the time of the Lord's resurrection, between Matthew and Mark — Ambrose of Milan, a monk of Cassino, lately translated into Latin.

Of the Evangelical Canons, one book:[1] in which, provoked by the zeal of Ammonius of Alexandria (who had gathered one [gospel] out of the four gospels), he wrote — of a like subject, but by a different method — to Carpianus, ten Canons, for knowing wherein the Evangelists have said either things similar among themselves, or each severally his own proper things. Which work Jerome made into Latin. Its beginning is, Eusebius to Carpianus his brother.

On the first Epistle to the Corinthians, commentaries: which Jerome mentions in the epistle to Pammachius, which begins, Of Christian modesty.

He flourished under Constantine the Great and Constantius, about the year of the Lord 320. His life was committed to writing by Acacius, his successor in the episcopate, and by Eusebius, bishop of Emesa. And Socrates, in book 2 of his History, wove an apology for his doctrine out of his own works.

Eusebius, bishop of Emesa, surnamed the Philosopher, sprung of noble parents at Edessa in Mesopotamia, and from his youth imbued with the sacred letters, then instructed also in the Greek disciplines at Edessa, afterward withdrew to Antioch, to Euphronius, bishop of the same city: by whom, when he was being urged to the priesthood, he fled to Alexandria, and there learned philosophy. Returning thence to Antioch, he remained with Placitus [Flacillus] the bishop, the successor of Euphronius, until, by Eusebius bishop of Constantinople, he was ordained bishop of Alexandria in the place of Athanasius, still living and in exile; which dignity, when he had refused it (fearing the hatred of the Alexandrians, by whom Athanasius was singularly loved), he was sent to the bishopric of the Emesenes. And when they disagreed at his ordination, accusing him that he had practiced mathematics [astrology], he took to flight, and went off to Laodicea, to Gregory, the bishop of that city: who restored him at Antioch, and again had him conducted to Emesa by Placitus and Narcissus. There, being again accused that he held with Sabellius, a little after he was restored as innocent; but at last, when the Emperor Constantine [read Constantius] set out against the barbarians, he was taken along, and there, among the Persians, miracles were done by his hands.

[Letter E, continued from p247:]

This man, therefore, when he had diligently and accurately searched the divine Books — with Eusebius of Caesarea and Patrophilus, bishop of Scythopolis, as his guides — published many commentaries upon them according to the sense of the letter, but especially on Genesis; in which he discussed not only the translations of Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion, but also the Syriac edition. There still survive, in the Greek Catena, fragments of these commentaries, of which Jerome also makes mention in the Hebrew Questions, censuring their author because, in expounding that [text] from the 22nd chapter of Genesis, There was a ram in the thicket Sabech [Gen 22:13], he interpreted by "Sabech" the he-goat, which, with horns erect, is raised aloft to crop the foliage.

He wrote also, on the Epistle to the Galatians, ten books of commentaries, and on the Gospels homilies — brief indeed, but very many. His style, so far as we can conjecture from the fragments which survive in the Catenae of the Greek explanations, and in the Dialogues of Theodoret, displays the same elegance which Jerome attributes to him, writing thus in the book On Illustrious Men: Eusebius, bishop of Emesa, of an elegant and rhetorical genius, composed innumerable books, and such as pertain to the applause of the people; and, having followed rather the history, he is most zealously read by those who wish to declaim.

There came out in recent years, under the name of Eusebius of Emesa, Homilies on the Gospels of the whole year, printed at Paris: yet it appears that these are rhapsodies, [made] by a Latin writer and patched together out of the Latin fathers. The style smacks either of Bede, or of Rabanus [Maurus], or of some other not unlike them both. He dies under Constantius Augustus, buried at Antioch, in the year of the Lord 350.

Eusebius, bishop of Vercelli, a Sardinian by nation, formerly a lector of the city of Rome. When he wished to free his son Dionysius (who afterward was illustrious by martyrdom) from the hands of the Arians — who had so deceived his simplicity that they even retained the pledge of his subscription — he feigned himself to be an Arian. And when they demanded from him a written bond, as it were a hostage of his faith, he, having received the book in which the names of the Arians were written, promptly ascribed his own name; and, immediately turning to them, said that this pleased him which pleased them, but that he was gravely moved because they had set his son Dionysius before himself in the subscribing. "For you," he said, "who say that the Son of God cannot be equal to God the Father, why have you preferred [my] son to me?" Moved by which reasoning, they immediately erased Dionysius's autograph, granting the prior place of subscription to Eusebius. But he, chiding and mocking them, said: "Neither do I pollute myself with your crimes, nor do I permit my son to share [them] with you." And saying this, at the same time he drew his son away by the hand and led him off with him.

For which cause he was banished by the Emperor Constantius, a favorer of the Arians, to Scythopolis, and thence to Cappadocia; and at last, under the Emperor Julian, he returned to his own Church: and there he published commentaries on the whole Psalter, which he gathered from the commentaries of Eusebius, bishop of Caesarea (translated by himself into Latin), passing over many things which seemed to incline to the Arian heresy. He died under Valens and Valentinian, the Augusti, crowned with martyrdom, in the year of the Lord 380. St. Ambrose wrote his encomium in two sermons.

Eustachius, or Eustathius, bishop of Antioch, illustrious in the great Nicene synod, who fought vehemently against Eusebius, bishop of Caesarea, for the word Homoousios, and, being accused by Cyrus, bishop of Beroea, was a little after deposed from the episcopate; he wrote most learned commentaries on the Psalter, out of which Theodoret, in the dialogues Immutable and Impassible, cites testimonies against the heretics from the exposition of Psalm 15 and 92. He wrote also, on that [text] from the 8th chapter of Proverbs, The Lord possessed me, etc. [Prov 8:22], one book, cited by Theodoret in the aforesaid dialogues. He flourished in the year of the Lord 340.

Euthalius, a deacon of an uncertain church, Greek by nation, a pious and learned man, described in the Greek tongue a very brief compendium: in which he most strictly compressed the life and martyrdom, and especially the journeying of Paul, and the places and cities which that most illustrious Apostle of Christ traversed. Which is most conducive to the understanding of the book of the Acts of the Apostles. The work begins, Paul the Apostle.

Euthalius of Rhodes, a monk of St. Basil, compiled in the Greek tongue a work of Concordances of the whole Bible, in imitation of Hugh [of St. Cher, "Eugo Carensis"], in the year of the Lord 1300.

Euthymius Zigabenus, a monk of St. Basil, a diligent expositor of the scriptures, gathered — out of the writings of the ancient Fathers, and especially of Chrysostom, whom he often cites by name — elegant, succinct, and openly learned Commentaries: in which, according to the various editions, he followed the fourfold sense, and among these especially the literal, the most difficult of all. The beginning of the work is [in Greek], that is, The author of this present book, indeed... These commentaries the excellent and most learned man Philip Sauli, bishop of Brugnato, first of all made into Latin.

He is also believed to be the author of the Greek Catena which, written, is kept in the Vatican library: in which, from the sayings of the holy Greek fathers arranged alternately, the five books of Moses are most fully explained. By whose help Aloysius [Luigi] Lippomano, bishop of Verona, made use [of it] in the text of his own Catena on Genesis and Exodus. And the names of the Authors, from whose sentences the work was collected, are these:

Philo Judaeus, Origen, Hippolytus, Basil, Gregory the Theologian [Nazianzen], Eusebius of Emesa, Isidore of Pelusium, Eustathius, Gennadius, Theophilus, Serapion, Diodorus Charterius [of Tarsus]; Apollinaris, Acacius, Didymus, Chrysostom, Theodoret, Cyril, Severian, Ephrem, Gregory of Nyssa, Justin Martyr, Irenaeus, [and] Philo the bishop [of Carpasia].

The beginning of the [catena] work is: Θεοδωρήτου εἰς τὰ ἄπορα τῆς θείας γραφῆς, that is, Theodoret, on the difficulties [ambiguous places] of the divi[ne scripture] [→ p249]

...of the divine scripture. He flourished under Alexius the Emperor, in the year of the Lord 1180.

The commentaries of Euthymius on the Epistles of St. Paul, John Henten of Nechlin [Hentenius] turned into the Latin tongue — who from a Hieronymite became a Dominican. The same Euthymius wrote on the Evangelists and on all the Psalms.

Ezekiel, a poet of Jewish tragedies, wrote a dramatic work in Greek verses, entitled Ἐξαγωγή, that is, THE LEADING-OUT: in which he elegantly sang the upbringing of Moses, and the leading-out of the people from Egypt accomplished by his power. Clement of Alexandria mentions this work in the first [book] of the Stromata, citing from it nearly fifty verses. He flourished in the year 40 before Christ.

F

Flavian, bishop of Constantinople, to whom blessed Pope Leo wrote many epistles, a man indeed learned, and a strenuous champion of catholic truth, who excommunicated Eutyches — a presbyter and archimandrite, holding impiously concerning the humanity of Christ — and suffered many injuries from the heretics; he wrote in the Greek tongue commentaries on the Gospel of John, whose authority is cited by Theodore, a Greek monk, in the book whose title is, That the Father always begets, and the Son indeed is always begotten. He wrote also, on various passages of the Gospels, very many homilies, some of which are cited by Theodoret in the Polymorphus [the Multiform]. He flourished under Marcian Augustus, in the year of the Lord 454.

Felix (or, as others write, Felix), a Tuscan by nation, of Prato by fatherland [Felix Pratensis], of the Order of Preachers, notable for his study and solid erudition of the three tongues, translated the Psalter from the Hebrew truth into Latin in the year of the Lord 1520. Matthew Aurogallus mentions this translation in his book On Hebrew Names.

Fortunatianus, an African by nation, bishop of Aquileia, whom Jerome reckons in the catalogue of illustrious men, in the reign of Constantine [read Constantius] wrote — with the titles arranged — brief commentaries on the Gospels, in a rustic style; and in this he is held detestable, that he was the first to solicit Liberius, bishop of the city of Rome, as he was going into exile for the faith, and broke him, and compelled him to the subscription of heresy, in the year of the Lord 330.

Francis Bonade [Bonadus], a presbyter of Angély [Angeria], of Saintes, an Aquitanian, expounded the Psalter in an elegiac paraphrase. Pursuing also the epistles of Paul with a like zeal, he thus began: Paul, by the love of Christ, the holy Apostle of the fostering world.

[Later-edition addition — not in Sixtus's 1566/1586 text: Francis Feuardent's commentary on Ruth appeared in 1582, after Sixtus's death (1569).] Francis Feuardent [Feuardentius], of the Order of Minors, a Parisian Theologian, wrote a Commentary on the book of Ruth.

Francis Foreiro [Forerius], of the Order of Preachers, a Portuguese by nation, of Lisbon by fatherland, a Theologian and philosopher, notable for the highest erudition, preacher to the king of Portugal, most skilled in the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew tongues, and plainly worthy — whom, on account of his manifold knowledge of all things, the sacrosanct Council of Trent, together with very many most learned men, chose for the review of the whole Christian library. He translated again, word for word, out of the Hebrew truth the books of Job, of David, of Solomon, and of all the prophets, with this aim: that he might confirm the authority of the Vulgate edition, and show that its author had most aptly expressed sense from sense. Then indeed he explained the same books with most lucid commentaries: in which, opening the true and genuine sense of the letter, he unfolds with the highest zeal and most exact diligence the several particles, words, and vowel-points of the Hebrew scripture, and so elucidated the peculiar idioms of the holy tongue, and so illustrated the most obscure passages of the prophets, that no work in this kind of writing has ever come to light which could more justly be called a Cornucopia [Horn of Plenty]. He still lives, up to the year of human salvation 1566, celebrated for doctrine and integrity of morals, and perseveres day and night in the holy explanation of the divine volumes.

Francis Giorgio [Georgius], a Venetian, of the Order of Minors of the regular observance, whose notable work On the Harmony of the World is extant — a man devoted to Platonic philosophy, most zealous of the sacred letters, and imbued with the various reading of many Authors — published, on certain more select Places of the whole divine Scripture, eight books of Problems, learned indeed, but, on account of certain Platonic and Talmudic opinions with which they are here and there besprinkled, worthy of grave and diligent censure. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1510.

Francis Gothus [the Goth], of the Order of Minors, professor of Theology, compiled a Biblical compendium, touching each chapter of the divine books with four iambic dimeters apiece, the measure of feet and syllables being nevertheless neglected: which thus begins —

GENESIS, CHAPTER 1.

Before aught is made, light is brought forth;

Dividing the waters, He gathers them;

Adornment is added by [His] deeds;

Adam brought forth, He subjects [all to him].

[Later-edition addition — not in Sixtus's 1566/1586 text: Francis Lucas of Bruges published his Notationes in sacra Biblia in 1580, after Sixtus's death.] Francis Lucas of Bruges [Lucas Brugensis], Licentiate of Sacred Theology, wrote annotations on the sacred Bible.

Francis Maronis [of Meyronnes], a Minorite, a disciple of John Duns Scotus, most excellent in scholastic erudition, and in the divine scriptures most illustrious in his time, among the other works of his doctrine published Postils of annotations on the whole sacred Scripture, worthy of memory. He flourished under Louis IV the Bavarian, Emperor, in the year of the Lord 1320.

Francis of Osuna [ab Obsunna], a Baetican [Andalusian], of the Order of Minors, wrote upon Missus est [the Annunciation, Luke 1:26] one book, and sermons on the gospels of the whole year. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1530.

Francis Ortiz [Ortizius], of the Order of Minors, a Spaniard, wrote a most praised exposition of the fiftieth Psalm, in the year of the Lord 1540.

Francis Petrarch [Petrarcha], a Tuscan by nation, a man most learned on every side, the first restorer of the Latin tongue (already for many ages extinct),[1] the father of Tuscan poetry, and without any controversy its chief; among the Latins too [→ p250]

[→ p250: "quoque…"]

[1] Petrarch was the restorer of the Latin tongue.

[Letter F, continued from p249:]

...among the Latin poets too a not ignoble one, and, for the excellence of his Latin verse, on the Roman Capitol he obtained the laurel crown by the public favor of all Italy: among many other monuments of his most noble genius, he left on the seven penitential Psalms very brief paraphrases, most aptly composed after the manner of prayers, whose beginning is, Lord God, Father of mercies. He dies under Charles IV, Emperor, in the year of the Lord 1374.

Francis Puteanus [del Pozzo], the thirty-third Prior of the Charterhouse, a most excellent doctor of both laws, and exercised in the sacred Scriptures, composed — in imitation of St. Thomas Aquinas — a Golden Chain [Aurea Catena] upon the psalms: in which he gathered, with the greatest diligence and marvelous art, the explanations of the fathers of the Latin church on the Psalter, with their names also added. The beginning of the work is, Lyra. This psalm is composed. He flourished under Charles V Augustus, in the year of the Lord 1534.

Francis Miletanus, professor of Theology, wrote a commentary on Psalm 18, beginning Of this psalm, in the year of the Lord 1500.

Francis Ruiz [Ruizius], a Spaniard, from Valladolid [Vallis Oletana], of the Benedictine order, Abbot of San Facundo [Sahagún], gathered 334 rules — which contribute very much to the understanding of the whole divine scripture — out of all the fathers, both Greek and Latin, the sentences and words of those fathers being nothing changed; and he illustrated them with brief explanations, culled here and there out of the same fathers, in the year of the Lord 1546.

Francis Titelmans of Hasselt [Hassellensis], the illustrious moderator of the Academy of the philosophers at Louvain, having left the world, betook himself to the institute of St. Francis: in which, assiduously attending to the divine Scriptures, he elaborated very many most pious and most learned treatises on the divine scriptures — of which there are extant, in paraphrastic form, elucidations on Job, on the Psalter, on the Canticles, on Matthew, on John, on all the epistles of Paul, and on all the Catholic epistles, together with Annotations on the more difficult passages of those books annexed. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1530. He died a Capuchin.

[Later-edition addition — not in Sixtus's 1566 text: this entry describes works and events after Sixtus's death (1569) — Toledo's John commentary (1588), his more than twenty years as papal preacher (to c. 1590), and Pius V named "of good memory" (Pius V died 1572).] Francis Toledo [Toletus] of Cordoba, of the Society of Jesus, a most noble Theologian; after he had, for many years and with great praise, taught Philosophy and Theology in the Roman College of the same Society, being chosen by Pius V of good memory, Supreme Pontiff, for the office of preacher in the pontifical palace, he bore this burden for more than twenty years with great fruit to his hearers: he published most excellent commentaries on the Gospel of John, and, as we hope, will shortly publish many other things. At Rome I gave him my attention for some years in Scholastic Theology.

Francis Visdomini [Visdominus] of Ferrara, of the Order of Minors, moderator of the most celebrated Academy of Bologna among the Franciscans, a man of most upright life, of sublime genius, of the highest erudition and eloquence, a declaimer of sacred sermons famous throughout all Italy, and, like a second Demosthenes, made a most excellent orator against and quite in spite of nature. For, since his tongue and voice were so interrupted by a certain natural and perpetual impediment, and stopped him as he spoke, that in private conversations he was compelled, gasping, to repeat over and over the first syllables of words — yet nevertheless he tames and overcomes the malignity of his reluctant nature by the strongest vigor of his lungs and by the most powerful effort of all his spirits, so that it is a miracle how a man (stammering in tongue, and in familiar meeting scarcely uttering words in a lowered voice) could, in public declamations, speak with a most ready voice and a most fluent tongue, most exactly and most gracefully; and — what is more marvelous — run on, in a most rapid course of speech, from the exordium to the end of the sermon with an unfaltering tongue, always with the same impetus of action and ardor of spirit, and always with the same greatness and strength of voice, snatching and rolling along with him the minds of his hearers, like a most rapid torrent swollen with the winter snows.

This man, therefore, was the first among the Italians to recall to light that ancient manner of preaching, once used in the Church of God by Basil the Great, Gregory the Great, and Chrysostom, and the rest of the most eloquent fathers, and afterward for many ages extinct: having published, in the Latin and Tuscan tongue, on almost all the books of divine scripture, sermons most learned and most eloquent, according to the literal and tropological understanding. He flourished under Charles V Augustus, in the Council of Trent, illustrious for many disputations against the heretics: and he still lives at Rome, up to the present year 1566, daily declaiming, reading, and writing, with the greatest fruit and admiration of the Roman people, being fifty-six years old.

Francis Ximénez, of Cisneros [Francisco Jiménez de Cisneros], a Spaniard by nation, of the Order of Minors, cardinal-presbyter of the Holy Roman Church of the title of St. Balbina, Archbishop of Toledo, Arch-chancellor of the Spains, published — dedicated to Pope Leo X — the whole Old and New Testament in manifold tongues, that is, Hebrew, Chaldaic, Greek, and Latin, printed at immense cost, labor, and vigils, with the greatest diligence, by the University of Alcalá [Complutum] in Spain — men most learned in the knowledge of the tongues having been summoned to this work from every part of the world, and the most corrected and most ancient copies procured (taken from the Vatican and Medicean libraries, or transmitted by the senate of the Venetians, or sought out from elsewhere), no reckoning being had of costs or labors. The arrangement of this so great work is as follows:

The Pentateuch has a threefold edition, namely the Hebrew, the Chaldaic, and the Greek of the LXX interpreters. To which are joined three Latin editions, namely: the Latin of Jerome, answering to the Hebrew truth; another Latin answers to the Chaldaic, word for word, elaborated by men most skilled in that tongue; and to the Greek of the LXX interpreters corresponds an interlinear Latin translation. The Hagiographa and the prophetic books were printed in a double tongue, Hebrew and Greek, with two other Latin translations corresponding to them. But the Chaldaic was rightly omitted, because in the other books — except in the Pentateuch — it is corrupted in some places, and [full] of mere fables and Thal[mudic matter] [→ p251]

[→ p251: "Thal…" — completing Thalmudicis, "Talmudic [matters]"]

[Letter F, continued from p250:]

...the trifles of the Talmudists, and altogether unworthy to be inserted among the sacred codices. But the books which are outside the canon of the Hebrews, which the church reads for edification, have only the Greek text, but with a double translation — namely, that of Jerome, and another, interlinear, word for word.

But the New Testament has the Greek text with Jerome's version, written only in bare letters, without any marks of tones [accents] or breathings, in imitation of the most ancient Greeks:[1] whom the most ancient poems of Callimachus and the Sibylline verses, and the most ancient fragments of marbles [inscriptions], show to have written without these accents and apices of the letters. For, since the whole New Testament was written in Greek, the author wished to retain in it the ancient antiquity and majesty of that tongue untouched, and to publish it after the image of the ancient scriptures: lest to the authority of so holy a thing, and to its venerable majesty, any detriment should seem to be brought by added and novel matters. But, lest any doubt should be able to occur to anyone — namely, on which syllable the accent ought to be placed — he added only a simple apex in the polysyllabic words; and this indeed not as a Greek accent, but as a little note and sign, by which the reader might be guided, lest he should sometimes slip in the pronunciation or modulation of the words.

He added, in the last place, at the end of the whole work, a most copious dictionary of Hebrew, Chaldaic, and Greek words: in which not only are contained the simple interpretations of words, both primitive and derivative; but — what was the most laborious thing of all — there is continuously subjoined, with very many concordances added, in how many places in the Old Testament each Hebrew word, on account of the fecundity of that tongue, multiplies its significations.

These most noble copies, which are commonly called the Complutensian, were completed under Leo X, Supreme Pontiff, and published throughout the whole Christian world with the highest praise: and from their authority many codices afterward — both Hebrew and Greek and Latin — were restored to soundness. He [Cisneros] flourished under Maximilian the Emperor, in the year of our salvation 1510.

Francis of Zamora, a Spaniard, Minister General of the whole Order of Minors, wrote on each verse of Psalm 50 one apiece of most beautiful homilies, 25 in number.

Francis Zichem [Zichenius], a Franciscan, Guardian of the monastery at Mechelen, wrote on the seven words which Christ uttered from the cross a brief and pious explanation, delivered as a sermon. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1556.

Friedrich Nausea [Blancicampianus], bishop of Vienna in Austria, an excellent doctor of sacred Theology and of both laws, preacher and counselor of Ferdinand, king of the Romans, wrote on the 20th chapter of Exodus, concerning the Decalogue, one book; also on Tobit two books of commentaries — brief, elegant, and exceedingly useful for the instruction of morals — the first of which begins, Who [dwells] not in houses in one part. Likewise he composed a paraphrase on Matthew and John, and homilies on the Gospels of the whole year. He flourished under Charles V, in the year of the Lord 1540.

Friedrich the Venetian [Fridericus Venetus] gave commentaries on the Apocalypse, written in the Italian tongue, in the year of the Lord 1500.

Fulgentius of Ruspe, a bishop in Africa, of Carthage by fatherland, an emulator of the erudition and style of Augustine, wrote on various Places of divine Scripture a notable volume of sermons, of which two are found in the Homiliary of Albinus [Alcuin]. He dies on the island of Circina [Kerkennah], worn out with many cares, in the year of the Lord 500, in the times of the Emperor Anastasius — having previously endured exile, and many other most grievous hardships, from the Vandals, who upheld the heresy of the Arians.

G

Gabriel Bruno [Brunus], a Venetian, professor of the Franciscan family, minister of the province of the Holy Land, arranged an Alphabetical Table out of the several books and chapters of both the New and the Old Testament: in which, with the greatest care and diligence, he indicated in what book and chapter all the histories and sentences may be found. Which table — augmented with new additions many years afterward by Conrad Pellican and Robert Stephanus [Estienne] — they published as great and most copious indices of the Bible, likely to bring great convenience to the students of the divine volumes, had they not inserted into them many and various testimonies of the scriptures, maliciously and violently wrested to the defense of their own heresies. He flourished under Pope Alexander VI, in the year of the Lord 1496.

Gabriel Brebia of Milan, a monk, wrote — to Gregory of Milan, a monk of St. Peter in Gessate — a little commentary, or rather an epitome of annotations, which he gathered according to the letter out of Jerome and Lyra [Nicholas of Lyra]: with pious prayers to God added at the foot of each psalm, accommodated to the sense and scope of the several psalms to which they are prefixed. He flourished in the year 1490.

Geoffrey of Clairvaux [Galfridus Clarevallensis], of the Cistercian order, wrote upon the Song of Songs one book.

Walter Disse [Galterus Disseus], an Englishman by nation, a Carmelite, a man of sincere piety and doctrine, and also an illustrious preacher, wrote on some of the first psalms of the Psalter, 1 book. He flourished under Wenceslaus the Emperor, in the year of the Lord 1390.

Walter of Maguelone [Galterius, Magolensis Episcopus], from Lille [Insulae], a town of Flanders, a man learned by long exercise in the divine Letters, and not wholly without the secular disciplines, wrote — at the request of the clerics of his Church — one book of a scholastic exposition on the whole Psalter. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1230.

Geoffrey of Auxerre [Ganfredus Antisiodorensis], a Cistercian monk, formerly a hearer of Peter Abelard; but, lest he should also become an imitator of his error, he betook himself to the teaching of St. Bernard of Clairvaux: trained under whose discipline, [he wrote works] of not to be de-[spised] [→ p252]

[Letter G, continued from p251:]

...published little works of not to be despised reading: of which one book on the Apocalypse of John is reported. He flourished under Frederick I the Emperor, in the year of the Lord 1160.

Garicus, a doctor of the Paris school, wrote a scholastic Postil on Ecclesiastes: from which Vincent Bandelli, in his book On the Conception, brings forth testimonies.

George of Trebizond [Trapezuntius], Greek by nation, a most learned man, wrote — to Sixtus [Xystus IV], Supreme Pontiff — a brief little commentary on the exposition of that text of the Gospel of John, chapter 21, So I will that he remain, until I come [John 21:22]: in which he shows that blessed John the Evangelist is not yet dead. Its beginning is, Lately, most beloved Father. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1470.

George Witzel [Wicelius], German by nation, a man of various erudition, most skilled in the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin tongue, of excellent genius, and eloquent in speech, wrote very many things, both in Latin and in his own German idiom. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1540.

Gennadius, pontiff of the church of Constantinople, a man polished in tongue and sharp in genius, and excellent in declaiming homilies, was so rich from the reading of the ancients that he expounded the prophet Daniel entire, commenting word for word. He dies, while Leo the elder held the empire, in the year of the Lord 460.

Gennadius, a presbyter of the church of Marseilles, exercised in both tongues, whose catalogue On Ecclesiastical Writers is extant, wrote a treatise on the heresy of the thousand years [millenarianism] upon the book of the Apocalypse: which Honorius mentions in his catalogue. He flourished in the year of the Lord 490.

George Eder [Ederus], doctor of both laws, counselor of the Emperors Ferdinand and Maximilian II, wrote an Oeconomia of the Bible, or of Theological Partitions, 5 books.

Gerard of Briançon [Briansonis], a Minorite of Toulouse, wrote on the seven penitential Psalms, 1 book.

Gerhard Lorich [Lorichius] composed, out of the four evangelists, a Monotessaron of the Passion of Christ, beginning, The Passion of our Savior.

Gerard Mathisius of Guelders [Geldriensis] wrote commentaries on the Epistle of St. Paul to the Romans.

Gerard [Sanonensis], of the Order of the Hermits of St. Augustine, of Bergamo by fatherland, formerly a public professor of Theology in the University of Paris, marvelously instructed in the knowledge of pontifical law, acute in genius, scholastic in speech, wrote on the Canticles one book, whose beginning is, The two wings of the Cherubim; and on the epistle to the Hebrews, one book. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1340.

Gerard Morinck [Moringus], a doctor of theology, in the year of the Lord 1533 published, in a cultivated and lucid style, commentaries on Ecclesiastes — partly paraphrastic, partly with a fuller explanation — in which, perpetually abstaining from allegories, he was so engaged in explaining the literal sense that he not unhappily supplies many things which are wanting in the other expositors of this book. The beginning of the volume has these words, The cause which [moved] the author to this work, etc.

Gerard of Streda [Stredanus], a Carthusian, German by nation, Prior of the House of the Apostles near Liège, venerable for the conversation of his life and his pious erudition, put forth on the Decalogue one book of explanation. He dies in the year of the Lord 443 [so printed; but the Carthusian order dates only from 1084, so likely a misprint for 1443].

Germanus Brixius [of Auxerre], a canon of Paris, a man learned in both tongues, and piously erudite in Theology, in the year of the Lord 1446 wrote on the epistle of Paul to the Romans most brilliant and learned homilies, 8 in number.

[Later-edition addition — not in Sixtus's 1566 text: this entry names the year 1590 and Génébrard as still living, decades after Sixtus's death (1569).] Gilbert Génébrard [Genebrardus], a Parisian Theologian, wrote commentaries on the Psalms; this year, 1590, he is still living; he has written many other things, and, as we hope, will write more.

Gilbert de la Porrée [Porretanus], bishop of Poitiers, Gaul by nation, a man learned in every kind of erudition, both in Greek and in Latin, the author of the work On the Six Principles [Liber sex principiorum], which is circulated in Latin and Greek as a supplement to Aristotle's Categories; of a sharp and vehement genius, but obscure in speech on account of the unusual novelty of his terms, and for that reason also noted in certain points of heresy, and reproved by St. Bernard; at the Council of Reims, under Pope Eugenius, he renounced his error.[1] He wrote on the divine scriptures many learned little works, among which not the lowest place is held by his commentaries on the Psalter, on John, and on all the epistles of Paul. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1140.

Gilbert of Paris [Parisiensis], a doctor of the Sorbonne, composed a scholastic Postil on Proverbs, of which Vincent Bandelli makes mention in his treatise On the Conception.

Gilbert [of Hoyland], a monk of the Cistercian order, and abbot of a certain monastery in England, piously learned and sweet in eloquence, in style and spirit so like to Bernard that he seemed to speak with the very same mouth and tongue, wrote on three chapters of the Canticles forty-eight most sweet and most elegant sermons, beginning where Bernard, prevented by death, had ended — that is, from that place of the third chapter, In my little bed by night I sought [Song 3:1], up to that place of the fifth chapter, My beloved is white and ruddy, chosen out of thousands, etc. [Song 5:10] — to which, when he had arrived by expounding, death forbade him to go further, which took him from among men in the year of the Lord 1200. The work begins, Various are the affections of lovers.

Giselbert the Englishman [Anglus] wrote commentaries on Isaiah and on the Song of Songs. He lived in the year 1110.

Gymnasius, an ancient author, wrote commentaries on Exodus, which are cited by Albert the Great in his Summa.

Gilbert [Crispin], provost of the monastery of Westminster in England, of the Order of St. Benedict, a hearer of Anselm of Canterbury, erudite in divine and human letters, and not meanly learned in secular philosophy, in a sufficiently polished style, expounded the book of Canticles with several homilies, and wrote a commentary on Isaiah, dedicated to Blessed Anselm the bishop. He flourished under Henry IV the Emperor, in the year of the Lord 1090.

Godfrey Tilmann [Tilmannus], a monk of the Paris Charterhouse, a most diligent investigator of ancient volumes, published in the year of the Lord 1550, out of the ancient monuments of the Carthusian library, a truly golden volume — worthy to be received by all students with great veneration, but without the name of its author or compiler — in which are Alle-[gories] [→ p253]

[→ p253: "goriae…" — completing Allegoriae, "Allegories"]

[Letter G, continued from p252:]

...[Alle]gories together, and Tropologies, on the passages of both testaments — the more select ones gathered with the best judgment, and drawn forth with more devoted study, and arranged in the order of the divine volumes — out of the monuments of thirty-one Authors, whose names and surnames, collected in alphabetical order, are these:

Adam of Perseigne [Adam de Persenia], Aelred [Ailredus], Aithardus, Baldwin [Balduinus], Bernard [Bernardus], Bruno, Cassian [Cassianus], a Canticles-commentary without a title [Cantica sine titulo], Drogo, Ernald [Ernaldus], Geoffrey [Galfridus], Gilbert [Gillebertus], Gregory [Gregorius], William of Cailloc [Guilielmus de Cailloc], William of St. Thierry [Gulielmus de S. Theodoro], Hildebert [Hidelbertus]; Hugh of St. Victor [Hugo Victorinus], Hugh of Fouilloy [Hugo de Foilleto], Isaac, Odo of Morimond [Odo de Morim], Odo of Tusculum [Odo Tusculanus], Ottmar Luscinius [Othomarus Luscinius], Peter of Ravenna [Petrus Rauennas], Peter Damian [Petrus Damianus], Peter Lombard [Petrus Lombardus], Peter the Chanter [Petrus Cantor], Radulf [Radulfius], Richard of St. Victor [Richardus Victorinus], Sello, Stephen of Canterbury [Stephanus Cantuariensis], Werricus [Verricus], [and] Richard of St. Victor [Richardus de S. Victore]. The beginning of the work is, How the first creation of the world is morally enacted in us.

Godfrey of Viterbo [Godefridus], a presbyter, Italian by nation, of Viterbo by fatherland, a scholastic by profession, wrote — to Pope Gregory VIII — on both Testaments a Prose-Verse work, that is, interwoven with prose and Leonine verse and rhythm according to the custom of the scholastics, whose title is PANTHEON: in which, together with the things contained in the sacred Bibles, he embraced also the foreign histories of the gentiles, beginning the volume in this manner:

> O you literate men who read me,
> called as judges over this volume.

He flourished in the year of the Lord 1185.

Godelbert [Godelbertus], a presbyter, illustrious no less for the sanctity of his life than for knowledge, strong in prose and verse, wrote in heroic verses a most delightful poem: in which he most elegantly sang the histories and allegories from the beginning of the world up to the childbearing of the Virgin. The title of the poem is, ALLEGORIES OF THE SCRIPTURES, 4 books. He flourished under Anastasius the Emperor, in the year of the Lord 500.

Gottschalk Hollen [Holem], German by nation, of the Order of the Hermits [Augustinian], a Scholastic by profession, composed on the Decalogue a huge volume of exposition, which is entitled PRAECEPTORIVM of the Divine Law: whose beginning is, If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments [Matt 19:17].

Gregory of Rimini [Ariminensis], Prior General of the Hermits of St. Augustine, the subtlest of the scholastics of his order, most celebrated for life and erudition, wrote — in scholastic method and style, following the mind and sense of his father Augustine — on the epistles of Paul, fourteen books, in the year of the Lord 1350.[1]

Gregory, bishop of Corinth, wrote on John chapter 21 [read 20], concerning Thomas touching the Lord when He had risen, a brilliant sermon, which — together with some homilies of his, written in Greek — is kept in the Vatican library.

Gregory, bishop first of Sasima (a mean little town of the Cappadocians), then of Nazianzus in Cappadocia, and at last of Constantinople; who, by all the Greeks, on account of the singular excellence of his authority, was — the first after St. John the Evangelist — distinguished with the surnames of "the Theologian" and "the Great"; a man abounding in the riches both of philosophy and of theology, and, in the loose and pedestrian [prose] oration, the most eloquent of all his time, inasmuch as he had attained the sublime buskin of speaking of Polemon of Laodicea, that most celebrated sophist. This man was joined by the closest intimacy to Basil the Great, and had St. Jerome as a hearer and disciple in the studies of the divine scriptures.[2] He also obtained in the Greek Church so great a weight of authority that whoever should dare to gainsay his testimony would at once be either held a heretic, or noted with the suspicion of heresy.

And he composed all his works — both in prose and in verse — to the number of thirty thousand verses; out of which there are: annotations on the first chapter of Ezekiel; a sermon on the combat [agon] of the Maccabees; likewise, on Matthew 19, On the question of the Pharisees concerning divorce and repudiation, one homily, which begins, Jesus, who [called] the fishermen; likewise, on the Passion and death of Christ [drawn] from the four evangelists, a Tragedy whose title is ΧΡΙΣΤΟΣ ΠΑΣΧΩΝ [Christ Suffering]. He wrote likewise — for the benefit of Christian youth, to whom Julian the Apostate had forbidden all the Greek disciplines — other poems too upon the sacred letters, so that the young, learning these instead of the Greek poets, might acquire skill in the Greek tongue and in verse. Among these is the Canon of the books of divine scripture which the Greek fathers in their age held for canonical, placed by us in the first book of this work. He flourished under Theodosius, in the year of the Lord 390. Gregory, a Cappadocian presbyter, wrote his life.

Gregory, bishop of Neocaesarea in Pontus, surnamed Θαυματουργός, that is, Wonder-worker [the doer of marvelous things], a Pontic by nation, formerly called Theodore. A hearer of Origen: while quite young, for the sake of the studies of Greek and Latin letters, he passed from Cappadocia to Berytus, and thence to Caesarea in Palestine, having joined to himself his brother Athenodorus. And when Origen had seen their excellent disposition, he exhorted them to philosophy: in which, gradually introducing the faith of Christ, he made them also his followers. And so, having been instructed by him for five years, they are sent back to their mother. Of whom Theodore, setting out, wrote a Panegyric of thanksgiving to Origen, and — a great throng having been convened — recited it, Origen himself being present. He then composed by lamplight a Μετάφρασις [Metaphrasis], or Paraphrase, on Ecclesiastes: of which Suidas says: Gregory wrote a Metaphrasis on Ecclesiastes — that one indeed most brief, but truly most admirable. Its beginning is, "These things Solomon, son of David the king and Prophet, King among all mortals, [says], etc." This the impudence of the printers has printed twice — first indeed under the name of its author, then under the name of Gregory of Nazianzus. But Jerome, on the fourth [chapter of] Eccle[siastes] [→ p254]

[→ p254: "Eccle…" — completing Ecclesiasten]

[1] The same wrote commentaries on the epistle of St. James. [2] Gregory Nazianzen was St. Jerome's teacher in Theological studies.

Running head: LIBER QVARTVS.)*

[Letter G, continued from p253:]

...[But Jerome, on the fourth chapter of] Ecclesiastes, upon that clause, Better is a child and poor, etc. [Eccl 4:13], bringing forth an exposition of those same words from that [paraphrase] of Gregory of Neocaesarea's Metaphrasis which is now extant, reveals its author in these words: The holy man Gregory, bishop of Pontus, a hearer of Origen, in his Metaphrasis of Ecclesiastes understood this passage thus: "But I understand a poor and wise young man, better than an old and foolish king: to whom it never came into mind that it is possible for any of those who had been bound to go forth from prison to a kingdom, and finally that he himself in turn should fall from his own unjust power — for it happens sometimes," etc., and the rest which follow. He flourished under Alexander [Severus], son of Mammaea, and Gordian, in the year of the Lord 240.

Gregory, bishop of Nyssa, whom the Greeks for honor's sake call Father of fathers,[1] brother of St. Basil the Great, cultivated in the Academic and Peripatetic disciplines, a man of sinewy and compressed eloquence, at the request of his brother Peter, bishop of Sebaste, wrote on the Hexaemeron one book, beginning, What doest thou, O man of God?; in which he set into order and concord those things which, [said] by Moses concerning the creation of the world, seemed at first sight disparate and mutually contrary, showing that Moses was consistent and constant with himself.

He wrote also, on that text, Let us make man to our image and likeness [Gen 1:26], On the Making of Man, two sermons, to supply those things which Basil had left untouched concerning the formation of man. Of which the first begins, The payment of an old debt; the other, That wise Solomon. Concerning the plan of both works and the manner of teaching, he himself, at the end of the Hexaemeron, wrote thus:

> These things, O man of God, we have answered to the questions proposed to us by your prudence, seeking out no cosmetics of speech, no moral allegories, nor passing over unexplored anything of those things which were objected to us; but, the proper signification of the words being preserved, we have followed out by argument the order of nature, and have demonstrated, to the best of our power, that nothing of those things which at first sight seemed contrary is at variance with the others. As for the rest, pertaining to the creation of the world, which were made in the space of six days, we have thought it superfluous to linger, since that sublime voice of our teacher Basil omitted nothing which pertained to that disputation, except the making of man, which we have explained in a proper book — the one we sent to you, O best of men, before this one. But you, and all into whose hands these books shall come, we would ask that in neither of them you think me to oppose the zeal of my teacher: but that, in the former, taking up the argument he left, I added a disputation concerning man to those things which had been elaborated by him in the Hexaemeron; and in this latter, for the sake of those who require order in the monuments of Scripture, I so applied my mind to writing these things, that the force of the words in what is written might be preserved, and the natural continuation might not disagree with the words.

There is also carried about under his name another book, sufficiently prolix and learned, On the creation of man, upon the same text, Let us make man, etc., which begins, This is the book, says the scripture, of the generation of the heaven [Gen 2:4].

Likewise, On the sacrifice of Abraham in Genesis chapter 22, one book: which Theodoret in the Immutable [dialogue], and [John] Damascene in book 3 against the Iconoclasts, cite.

Likewise, On the narration of the Mosaic life [the Life of Moses], from Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy, one book, in which the perfect form of the Christian life is proposed: which begins, Just as those who [watch] a contest of horses.

He also wrote commentaries on the Psalter, which are kept, written in Greek, in the Vatican Library.

Likewise, on the fifth chapter of Matthew, On the seven beatitudes, seven books, which Liberatus cites in his Breviary on the Nestorian cause, and Theodoret in the Immutable.

Likewise, on the sinful woman from the 7th chapter of Luke, one sermon, beginning, No Pharisee.

He published also commentaries on the Epistle to the Philippians, which Cyril brings forth in his book to his brother Euoptius against Theodoret. He flourished under Valentinian and Valens, in the year of the Lord 380. Gregory of Nazianzus wrote his life.

Gregory Olympias [Olympiadas], most illustrious in Greek eloquence, and greatly exercised and learned in the divine letters, published commentaries on the Parables [Proverbs] and on the Song of Songs of Solomon, which have not yet been printed. But they are extant, written in Greek, in the Sauli Library at Genoa.

Gregory, Supreme Pontiff, the first of that name, Roman by fatherland, of a most illustrious family of senators, great-grandson of Pope Felix IV, formerly a monk and a levite [deacon], a man illustrious for sanctity and miracles, notable for erudition, and taught in the explanation of the divine volumes by the illumination of the Holy Spirit (both invisible and visible), expounded almost all the holy Scriptures — partly by homilies, partly by commentaries: the greater sum of which, not yet multiplied into more copies, his most wicked rivals burned immediately after his death,[2] fearing lest the glory of his sanctity and doctrine should come down to posterity in the monuments of his writings.

In his Homilies — and these especially, which he delivered to the people in the midst of the very mysteries of the Mass — he used a brief and succinct elucidation of the divine reading. But on the contrary, in his commentaries, delighting in the accumulated [Coacervatus] kind of explanation, he most abundantly expounded the divine letters with a most copious abundance of senses and speech, almost everywhere observing such a manner and order of expounding:

First of all, having laid the foundation of the history, he discourses, running briefly and by snatches through the context of the letter according to a double edition — namely the old version, which is called the Italic, and the new version of Jerome. Secondly, from the words of the history he draws forth various — indeed most copious — fountains of Allegory and Anagogy (which with him are the same). Thirdly, he inclines the sense of the Allegories to the edification of the church, to the exercise of morality, and diverts the allegorical rivers to irrigate the sowings of the moral virtues; and he speaks with such efficacy concerning the virtues and vices that he seems not only to expound them in words, but in a manner to demonstrate them in visible and palpable forms. He himself, giving the reason for this order, says that, just as in the salvation of the faithful faith is prior to works, so in the explanation of the Scriptures, Allegory (which pertains to faith) ought first to be laid upon the foundations of history, but afterward [the moral sense] above [→ p255]

[→ p255: "supra…" — "above"]

[1] Gregory of Nyssa is called by the Greeks the Father of fathers. [2] The rivals of St. Gregory [the Great] burned a great part of his books.

[Letter G — Gregory the Great, continued from p254:]

...above it, the Moral explanation itself, which treats of the right method of acting. Fourthly, to these three kinds of exposition he adds also a fourth kind, more difficult than the rest, expounding the several testimonies of the scriptures which he himself had taken up in his commentaries for the elucidation and confirmation of the aforesaid explanations.

The kind of words and speech in almost all his writings is continuous and connected, running with certain clauses and members corresponding to one another, and with ὁμοιοτέλευτα — that is, flowing with similarly-terminating sentences — and almost always ending in absolute and perfect periods, yet not affected nor far-fetched, but flowing spontaneously from his former exercise in secular eloquence, without any artifice of careful diction and elaborate texture. Which he himself, not dissembling, excuses in the preface to his commentaries on Job in these words: I beg that, seeking out the sayings of this work, you do not require in them the leaves of words: for I have scorned to observe that very art of speaking which the teachings of the outer discipline inculcate. For — as the tenor of this preface also declares — I do not shun the clash of metacism, nor do I disdain to keep the confusion of barbarism, the arrangement and the government of the prepositions, and the case-endings: because I strongly judge it unworthy to constrain the words of the heavenly oracle under the rules of Donatus.[1] Thus he.

There are those who believe that Gregory, besides the things which he expounded in the Latin tongue, composed also many things in the explanation of the holy volumes in the Greek language. But that these are greatly mistaken, Gregory himself shows in his epistle to Eusebius, bishop of Thessalonica, where — accusing the impudence of Andrew the monk, who had forged Greek Homilies inscribed under Gregory's name — he freely professes that he neither published anything in Greek, nor ever learned the Greek language.[2] But the Pastoral volumes of Gregory which now are extant among the Greeks, Anastasius, bishop of Antioch, turned into Greek; just as also Pope Zacharias first gave to Greek ears the four books of the Dialogues, on account of which John Damascene, Euthymius, and the other Greek writers call Gregory, the author of these volumes, "the Dialogist." Thus far concerning the method of the explanations, and the manner of speaking, proper to Gregory: of whom these are the exegetical writings which now survive, and which are wanting:

On the Heptateuch, seven books, which John the Deacon testifies were burned by the envious after the author's death.

On the books of Kings, six volumes of a begun exposition: with which, as Gregory himself asserts, he was the first of all the Latins to attempt a continuous exposition on the books of Kings; of which he took up only the first sixteen chapters of the first book to be expounded, that he might from that labor make trial whether he could go further in explaining; whence he is fuller in the two former books than in the other four. The beginning of the work is, After the books of Moses and of Joshua son of Nun.

On Job, to Leander bishop of Seville, 35 books of commentaries [the Moralia], published by him while he was tortured with frequent pains of the bowels — the strength of his stomach being broken, and with continuous and slow fevers coming upon him — divine providence so disposing it, that the miseries of a man scourged by God should be expounded by a man scourged by God, so that he might narrate them, experience dictating, more surely, more copiously, more clearly, and more ardently. And so he left the other commentators of this book at as great an interval behind him as, in the knowledge of all things, science joined with experience is superior to science without experience. But how greatly the judgments of the ancient fathers esteemed these truly golden commentaries appears from this: that already, while Gregory was living, the Bishops began to read them publicly through the various churches — which, when he himself had learned of it, he forbade to be done, by letters sent to them, which still survive. This work Odo, abbot of Cluny, and Simon, a monk of Afflighem, abridged: the latter into ten small books, the former into a slender volume. Gregory likewise composed:

On the seven Psalms which are called Penitential, a brief and moral commentary, following in it Augustine's Enarrations. The work begins, If that king and prophet. Likewise he wrote:

On the Song of Songs, a commentary according to the Anagogic and the Ethic [Moral] sense, using a more compressed explanation than in the rest; its beginning is, Because if to a blind man, etc. He published also (with notaries taking it down):

On Ezekiel, two books of Homilies to the Roman people — that is, on the first three chapters of Ezekiel, 12 Homilies contained in the first book; and again, on chapter 40, On the vision of the temple to be built in Jerusalem, 10 Homilies contained in the second volume. These he delivered to the people, tossed with the greatest cares of mind, on account of the calamity impending over the City, when Agilulf, king of the Lombards, having already crossed the Po, was hastening to besiege it. The beginning of the work is, To his most beloved brother Marian, bishop of Ravenna, etc. Besides, he composed:

On the Evangelical lessons which are read in the sacred mysteries of the Mass, forty Homilies: of which he recited some (dictated by himself beforehand) to the people through a notary, but others he himself pronounced with living voice, notaries taking them from his mouth. These Gregory, having first revised them himself, enclosed in two volumes, and dedicated to Secundinus, bishop of Lauritum. Their catalogue is this:

- On the second chapter of Matthew, On the coming of the Magi, one homily.
- On Matthew 4, On the temptation of Christ, hom. 1.
- On Matthew 4, On the calling of the four Apostles, hom. 1.
- On Matthew 10, On the sending of the 12 Apostles, hom. 1.
- On Matthew 11, On John in chains, hom. 1.
- On Matthew 12, upon that [text], Behold thy mother, hom. 1.
- On Matthew 13, On the treasure hidden in the field, hom. 1.
- On Matthew 16, upon that, If any man will come after me, hom. 1.
- On Matthew 20, On the vineyard, hom. 1.
- On Matthew 22, On the king making a marriage for his son, one hom.
- On Matthew 25, On the ten virgins.
- On Matthew 25, On the five talents, hom. 1.
- On Mark chapter 16, On the women [going] to the [tomb] [→ p256]

[→ p256: "-mentum…" — completing monumentum, "the tomb"]

[1] The words of the heavenly oracle are not to be constrained under the rules of Donatus [the grammarian]. [2] Gregory the Great never learned to speak Greek.

- On John 21, On the manifestation of Christ at the sea of Tiberias, hom. 1.

Thus far the exegetical writings of Gregory, from which Paterius (notary of the Holy Roman Church), Bede the Anglo-Saxon, Alulf the monk, Odo the abbot, Simon of Afflighem, Werner of Paris, and very many others, gathered commentaries on almost the whole of divine scripture. Gregory flourished under Maurice Augustus, and dies in the second year of the Emperor Phocas — that is, in the year of the Lord 605 — when he had presided over the Roman pontificate for thirteen years and six months.

Gregory Primaticci [Primaticius] of Siena, of the Order of Preachers, a professor of Theology and of the good arts, arranged a literal exposition on all the epistles of St. Paul, very useful to beginners and the less learned: whose beginning is, Paul — why he was so called by name. He lives up to the present year of our salvation 1566.

Guerric of Igny [Guericus], Abbot of Igny, of an easy genius and sweet in eloquence, wrote a work of Sermons on the gospels, On the Season and on the Saints through the circle of the year, which he delivered to his brethren, one book, which begins, We await the Savior. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1300.

Werner of Paris [Guernerius Parisiensis], Subprior of the monastery of St. Victor at Paris, a man illustrious for the sanctity of his life and pious erudition, gathered and arranged in a most fitting order, out of all the writings of St. Gregory the Pope, 16 books, On the allegorical figures of the names and of all things contained in the sacred letters, which he entitled ENVCLEAMENTA BIBLIAE [The Kernels of the Bible] — a work truly worthy to be received with open arms by the students of divine scripture. Its beginning is, God, sometimes in sacred scripture. He flourished under Rupert the Bavarian, king of the Romans, in the year of the Lord 1400.

Guy of Évreux [Ebroicensis], of the Order of Preachers, a notable Theologian, and eloquent and fluent in declamations to the people, added to the rules of Tyconius the African certain most fitting teachings, useful for grasping the sense of sacred scripture — showing from the ignorance of what things it often happens that men err in the exposition of sacred doctrine — and to these he gave the title, ON THE KEYS OF DIVINE SCRIPTURE [De clavibus divinae scripturae].

Guy, bishop of the Church of Ferrara, of the Order of Preachers, a poet very elegant among the scholastics of his time, and also an excellent handler of the divine letters, among the many works of his genius published — in imitation of Peter Riga, presbyter of Reims — a Scholastic poem, dedicated to Pope Clement the fifth of that name: in which, in hexameter verse, he discoursed on the books of both testaments with a historical and allegorical explanation. Its title is, THE PEARL OF THE BIBLE [Margarita Bibliae]; but the beginning is, A noble beginning. He flourished under Henry VII the Emperor, in the year of the Lord 1130 [so printed, though the dedicatee Clement V reigned 1305–1314].

Guy of Perpignan [Guido Terreni], a Spaniard by nation, the twelfth Prior General of the Carmelites, and afterward bishop of the Churches of Majorca and of Elne, an excellent professor of scholastic Theology, wrote — in imitation of Augustine — On the Harmony of the Evangelists, one book, in the year of the Lord 1320.

William, abbot of St. Thierry [sancti Theoderici], briefly elucidated the epistle to the Romans.

William of Alcono, of the Order of Preachers, a master of the Sorbonne Academy at Paris, gathered a scholastic Postil on Ecclesiastes, of which Vincent Bandelli makes mention in his treatise On the Conception.

William of Cremona, the 12th master general of the Hermits of St. Augustine, bishop of Novara [Nouatiensis] and Cardinal of the Roman Church, wrote an exposition on the Gospels, 4 books. He flourished in the year 1340.

William [of Auvergne], bishop of Paris, of Auvergne by fatherland, a man erudite in the divine scriptures, and not ignorant of Aristotelian philosophy, subtle in genius, and scholastic in eloquence, composed commentaries on various many passages of both testaments, by which he transmitted his name to posterity. Of these there survive, of explanation:

- On the Hexaemeron, one book,
- On the Psalter, one book,
- On Proverbs, one book,
- On Ecclesiastes, one book,
- On the Canticles, one book,
- On Matthew, one book.

He flourished under Frederick II the Emperor, in the year of the Lord 1230.

William [of Aachen], German by nation, from Aachen [Aquisgranum], formerly a most vigilant preacher of the Metropolitan Church of Basel, illustrious for erudition and [manner of] life, scholastic in eloquence and in his manner of speaking and writing, composed by lamplight one book of exposition on John [→ p257]

[Letter G, continued from p256:]

...one book, in the year of the Lord 1485.

William Gregory [Gregorius], a Scot by nation, a Theologian of the Paris Academy, wrote scholastic commentaries on David [the Psalms], in the year of the Lord 1517.

William Hamer [Hamerus] of Neuss [Nouesianus], Doctor of sacred theology, of the Order of Preachers, composed learned, useful, and pleasant-to-read commentaries on Genesis, so adorned with the sentences of very many most illustrious authors of the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin tongue (both sacred and profane) that they cannot be read by a fair and candid reader without great fruit and pleasure. Their beginning is, This world, which by another name [is called] Heaven. He flourished in the year of salvation 1560.

William, abbot of the monastery of Hirsau in the diocese of Speyer, of the Order of St. Benedict, German by nation — to whom Blessed Anselm, Archbishop of Canterbury, wrote several epistles — a man most erudite in the divine scriptures, and in secular letters second to none in his time, most holy in life and conversation, wrote On the correction of the Psalter, one book: whose beginning is, If anyone in this necessary [work]. He flourished under Henry III the Emperor, in the year of the Lord 1090.

[Lindanus (bishop of Roermond 1562–1588) was Sixtus's near-contemporary; whether this entry stood in the 1566 text or is a later-edition addition is uncertain — the cited works may postdate 1566.] William Lindanus [van der Lindt], bishop of Roermond, a most learned man of our age, wrote Paraphrases on the Davidic Psalms; likewise Meditations on Psalm 118; likewise a declaration of the prophecy of Jeremiah, Out of the North shall evil break forth [Jer 1:14].

William of Melitona [Middleton], of the Order of Preachers [read Minors], chancellor of Paris, wrote a Postil on the 12 [minor] Prophets, which is kept at Piacenza in the Library of the Preachers; and likewise on the epistle to the Hebrews, which still survives at Bologna in the Dominican Library, with this beginning, I will declare thy name.

William Pepin [Pepinus], professor of sacred Theology, and a nursling and inhabitant of the religious convent of Évreux of the order of Preachers, an eloquent and ardent preacher (whose equal in his times the French tongue did not have), composed on Genesis, on Exodus, and on the seven penitential Psalms a scholastic Lecture according to the fourfold sense of divine scripture — in a rude and uncultivated style indeed, but framed with artful industry, useful to the declaimers of the divine word: in which, first of all, having divided each chapter of the book into three, or four, or more clauses, he explains each of them nakedly and openly according to the history [literal sense]; and, having added at the end of that same historical explanation many not-to-be-despised little questions (which being finished), he narrates the same clause again with three, or four, or sometimes six or eight different moral expositions; and again, after these, he subjoins to the exposition of the same clause three or four allegorical interpretations; which at last he concludes in a single anagogical explanation, referring all things to Christ, as to the end of all things. He wrote also, on the epistles and gospels of the whole year, scholastic Sermons almost innumerable. He died under Charles V, Emperor, in the year of the Sack of Rome, 1527.

Gutierre Trejo [Gutierrus Treius], sprung of Plasencia in Spain, of the Order of Minors, elaborated commentaries on the four gospels in the year 1550.

H

Adrian Lametius [Henencurius], a doctor and Theologian, out of many commentaries of the fathers constructed one work: in which, from the sayings of the ancient authors, he expounded the first twenty-six Psalms in a most beautiful order and most elegantly. The work begins, Blessed is the man, etc. The opinion of Jerome. He flourished under Charles V, Emperor, in the year of the Lord 1550.

Haymo of Halberstadt [Alberstatensis], the third bishop in Saxony, German by nation, a disciple of Albinus [Alcuin] — who was the teacher of Charlemagne Augustus — formerly a monk of the Benedictine monastery of Fulda, and Abbot of the monastery of Hersfeld of the same order, a man notable for sanctity and erudition, composed commentaries on all the books of both testaments, praiseworthy for their piety, brevity, simplicity of diction, and perspicuity; in which he reduced into a compendium the things which by the ancient interpreters were either written for the learned or spoken to the people more diffusely — with a perspicuity and lucid brevity so great, that they can be read by the busy at small cost of time, and most easily understood by the simple and lightly-lettered. But he was engaged almost always in the allegorical and anagogical senses, which — like a spiritual little bee — he plucked from the gardens and most flowering meadows of all the ancients, that for his readers there might be prepared an abundance of most wholesome honey. The titles and beginnings of his commentaries, which I myself have read, are these:

- On the Psalter, one book. [Begins:] Hymns are called...
- On the Song of Songs, one book. [Begins:] Since of all holy [women]...
- On Isaiah, one book. [Begins:] It should be known that, the people being divided...
- On Ezekiel, one book. [Begins:] The blessed one says...
- On the Gospels, two volumes of Homilies. [Begins:] The Lord conferred...
- On all the epistles of Paul, 14 books. [Begins:] From Corinth...
- On the Apocalypse, 7 books. [Begins:] We read in Ecclesiastes...

He dies under Louis Augustus, son of Charlemagne, buried in the church of St. Stephen of Halberstadt, in the year of the Lord 834.

Hector Pinto [Pinctus], a Portuguese, a monk of the Order of St. Jerome, wrote on Isaiah the Prophet polished and cultivated commentaries: in which he diligently examines the Hebrew context of Isaiah together with the Vulgate edition. Theobald Paganus [Payen] printed [them] at Lyons in the year 1561. He published likewise most learned commentaries on the Prophets Ezekiel and Daniel, and on the Lamentations of Jeremiah.

Elias de Anibaldi [degli Annibaldi], a Minorite, master of Theology, wrote a Postil on the Apocalypse.

...one book. He flourished in the year 1350.

Henry, a monk of the Benedictine monastery of Auxerre, instructed in secular literature, most skilled in the divine Scripture, and an excellent declaimer of his time, wrote, about the year of the Lord 880, very many homilies on various passages of the Gospels, of which 37 are inserted in the Homiliary of Alcuin.

Henry Arnoldi, a Carthusian, a monk of the house of Basel, formerly a notary in the sacred Council of Basel, a man instructed in every kind of letters, wrote in an open and simple style, on the Harmony of the Evangelists concerning the Passion of the Lord, one book, in the year 1440.

Henry of Coesfeld [Consueldius], a German, a Carthusian, Prior of the house of St. Mary near the mount of Blessed Gertrude in Holland, a scholastic by profession, wrote on Exodus, and on the epistle to the Romans. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1410.

Henry of Cossey [Costesay], a Minorite, composed an exposition on the Psalter, one book; [and] a Commentary on the Apocalypse. He died in the year 1336.

Henry Esseburne, a Dominican, wrote on the Parables [Proverbs] of Solomon, 1 book; on Ecclesiastes, 1 book; and Lectures on the Bibles, 1 book. He flourished in the year 1280.

Henry Herp [Harphius], of the Order of Minors of the regular observance, Guardian at Mechelen, a contemplative man, and on every side no less learned than illuminated, wrote on Mystical Theology — both speculative and especially affective (which is obtained not so much by reading as by the exercise of purity and love) — three books, of which he presented the first in the exposition of the Canticles, which is entitled Mystical Theology, or A Soliloquy of the divine love and forms of Christ, or Paradoxes on the Song of Songs: in which, in a broken [disjointed] order, he most brilliantly expounded various sentences of this book with pious affections and flaming words. Peter Blomevenna of Leiden, a Carthusian, translated this work from the German idiom into the Latin tongue. The work begins, Let him kiss, etc. Tell us, I pray, of whom, by whom, and to whom it is said, "Let him kiss me," etc.

Henry Helmesius [of Germipolis], of the Order of Minors, a plainly learned and pious man, and preacher of the chief Church of Cologne, wrote — on all the festal Epistles and Gospels — of Homilies in the self-expounding kind, ἑαυτοῦ ἐξηγητικῷ (that is, [Scripture] expounding itself), five volumes, framed with marvelous artifice and erudition out of the mere sentences of divine scripture, in the year of the Lord 1550.

Henry of Hesse the Younger [Hassius Iunior], a Carthusian, Prior of the house of the monks of St. Mary, nobly erudite in the holy Scriptures, not ignorant of secular literature, a scholastic by profession, and by his elegance of speech well fitted for illuminating the understanding and inflaming the affection, wrote on Genesis one book of commentaries, on Exodus one book, on Proverbs one book, on the Apocalypse one book. He flourished under Sigismund the Emperor, [in] 1428.

Henry Kalteisen [Kaltisenus], of Koblenz by fatherland, of the order of Preachers, bishop of the Churches of Nidaros [Trondheim] and of Caesarea, formerly lector of the sacred palace, and before that a preacher [at the convent] of the Holy Cross, and an inquisitor of heretical depravity, a cultivated Theologian and Philosopher, wrote in scholastic eloquence, on the Canticle of Mary [the Magnificat], one book, in the year of the Lord 1460.

Henry of Langenstein [Langesteinus], a German, from Hesse, canon of the Church of Worms, doctor of the Paris Academy under Pope Boniface IX, in the year of our salvation 1400; on account of his singular erudition in Philosophy and Theology, he was summoned — by the public favor of all the learned — to illustrate the Academy of Vienna, then first founded; and he abounded in so great a copiousness of matter in speaking and writing, that, after the manner of Demosthenes, he had always to think, not what he might add, but what he might take away from his discourse. From which abundance it came about that, having consumed many years in the public exposition of Genesis, he could scarcely reach the fourth chapter of the book — having published as many books of commentaries — being about to make truly an immense work, and one wasteful of much paper, if he had reached the end of Genesis by expounding. He wrote therefore, in the scholastic manner of interpreting: a book of Prologues on Genesis; on the first four chapters of Genesis, four books; and on the Song of Songs, one book.

Henry Logen, a Carthusian, Prior of the house near Brussels, wrote explanations on the Psalter.

Henry Regius of Paderborn wrote an Alphabetical Bible [Biblia Alphabetica], which the Neuss printer printed, at Cologne, in the year 1535.

Henry Sachs [Sachsius] had three books published, On the seemingly-contrary passages of both Testaments, at Cologne, 1540, together with the Commentary of Honorius on the books of Solomon.

Henry Vinchingam [Vinchingan], an Englishman, wrote a scholastic Postil on Isaiah, in the year of the Lord 1447.

Henry Urimarius [of Friemar], a Hermit [Augustinian], German by nation, doctor of the Paris university, illustrious in life and doctrine, wrote on the Decalogue, 1 book; whose beginning is, Hear, O Israel, the precepts. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1340.

Heraclius, under the empire of Commodus and Severus, in the year of the Lord 200, composed on the Apostle [Paul] fourteen books of commentaries.

Under the name of Hermann, Archbishop of Cologne, elector of the Holy Empire, there came forth a most noble explanation of the Decalogue, which is contained in the Compendium of the Council of Cologne, together with an exposition of the Lord's Prayer and of the Creed. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1540.

Hermann, called Contractus [the Lame] — because he was contracted [crippled] in the limbs of his whole body — a Benedictine monk of the monastery of St. Gall, a German by nation, son of the Count of Veringen in Swabia, a philosopher, mathematician, and historian, most skilled in Greek, Latin, and Arabic, among his many excellent writings left a notable little work: a chronicle entitled ON THE SIX AGES OF THE WORLD, in which, in imitation of Bede, he arranged in a most fitting order all the ages, generations, years, and times contained in the sacred letters. He flourished under Henry II, in the year of the Lord 1040.

...[rector of the house of St. Anne of the nuns of his] order, near Bruges in Flanders, venerable for his life, erudition, and zeal for declaiming, published on the Lord's Prayer, in scholastic style, 50 sermons. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1428.

Hermann Schildis [Schildius], a Hermit [Augustinian], imbued with philosophy, and perfected by assiduous exercise in the divine letters, wrote in scholastic style on Genesis and on the Song of Songs; likewise, On the four senses of scripture, 1 book. He flourished under Louis IV the Emperor, in the year of the Lord 1340.

Hesychius the Monk, and in Palestine the father of many monks, joined by the closest love to Hilarion the most holy hermit — to whom the most blessed Hilarion himself, dying, wrote with his own hand a brief epistle, as it were in place of a testament, leaving to him all his riches, namely the Gospel, and a sackcloth tunic, a cowl, and a little cloak — a man most skilled in the Greek tongue, and an assiduous reader of the divine Scriptures, published a new Greek translation of the whole scripture, partly corrected by himself from the LXX interpreters in the Old Testament, partly restored by his own industry, in the New Testament, to the ancient faith. There are those who attribute this same translation to Hesychius the Jerusalemite presbyter, a most learned man, whom Nicephorus writes to have flourished in the times of Theodosius the Younger. Which does not seem probable to me, since Jerome writes that this Hesychian edition was in use in his time (that is, under the reign of Theodosius the Elder) in all the churches throughout Alexandria and Egypt. And Hesychius [the Monk] flourished under Constantius Augustus, in the year of the Lord 360.

Hesychius, the Jerusalemite presbyter — or, as it is written in the Ordinary Gloss on Leviticus, bishop of Jerusalem — a hearer and disciple of Blessed Gregory of Nazianzus the bishop, a man most erudite in the divine scriptures; admonished by the example of his teacher, he is reported to have written on the divine books many little works of explanations: of which there are extant, on the whole of Leviticus, to Eutychianus the deacon, seven books, in which he spiritually interprets the mystical intention of Moses, following an edition so tempered that it agrees with the LXX and does not differ from our Vulgate. He has a certain kind of diction unusual, and rather affected, and abhorrent from the common custom of speaking. The work begins, To the venerable deacon Eutychianus, the sinner Hesychius, servant of Christ, a presbyter — salvation in Christ. He wrote also, with a like zeal of explanation, commentaries on Ezekiel, of which he makes mention in the preface to his first book on Leviticus; likewise on the Epistle to the Hebrews. He flourished under Honorius Augustus, in the year of the Lord 400.

Jerome Fracastoro [Girolamo Fracastoro], of Verona, a most noble illustrator of the art of medicine and of poetic study, published, on the last ten chapters of Genesis, a heroic poem On the life of Joseph, admirable for the gracefulness of its verse — which indeed he could not complete, being prevented by death, in the year of the Lord 1548.

Jerome of Leopolis [Lwów], from the province of Ruthenia, of the Order of Minors of the regular observance, a preacher and lector of the Metropolitan Church in the city of Cracow (the royal seat of the Polish kingdom), who fought strenuously against the Lutherans even unto death, translated all the books of the Bible into the Polish language. He flourished under Charles V Augustus, in the year of the Lord 1536.

Jerome ab Oleastro [of Azambuja], a Portuguese, of the Order of Preachers, professor of sacred Theology, and inquisitor of heretical depravity at the renowned Lisbon [Ulyssippo], published commentaries on the Pentateuch of Moses according to the edition of Sanctes Pagninus: in which he first most exactly explained the Hebrew truth, then indeed subjoined separately those things which can be fitted to the composition of morals, from the inmost recesses of the letter itself. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1556, in which he also sent forth this very work, printed at Lisbon.

[Later-edition addition — not in Sixtus's 1566 text: Osório died in 1580, and the entry notes he died "in recent years," after Sixtus's own death (1569).] Jerome Osório [Jerónimo Osório], a Portuguese, bishop of the Algarve, a most eloquent man, wrote a Paraphrase on Isaiah. In recent years he migrated from this life.

Jerome of Padua [Patavinus], excellent in verse and prose, wrote to Peter Donato, bishop of the city of Padua, On the Passion of the Lord — from the four evangelists, in heroic verse — one book, which begins, Greatest of the heaven-dwellers, in the year of the Lord 1494.

Jerome Savonarola [Girolamo Savonarola], of Ferrara, of the Order of Preachers, a man of excellent genius, and endowed with an abundance of many sciences, was a declaimer simple indeed and unadorned in speech, but sharp in sense and vehement in action; and in the reputation of sanctity so admirable to all, that the people of the city of Florence — among whom for seven years he delivered sermons in a great and assiduous throng of hearers — thought that he spoke with God, and received from Him the prophecy of future events; and on that account were unwilling that the commonwealth, and the common government of the whole city, should be administered except at his nod. Which things, since they did not sufficiently please some of the leading citizens, effort was made that the magistrates of the city should be created from the number of those who least followed him; [and so] Jerome, not without tumult and the blood of many, was seized, and cast into prison, and condemned to death; a little after, being deprived of his priestly honor [degraded], he was burned alive in the middle of the marketplace, and his ashes — lest, being religiously kept by his own followers (who had already begun to collect them), they should be venerated — were thrown into the flowing Arno. This man, therefore, labored much in the divine scriptures, of which the below-written are reported:

- On the Ark of Noah, in the 6th chapter of Genesis, 10 sermons.
- On the first 6 chapters of Exodus, 14 sermons.
- On the history of Ruth, 5 sermons.
- On the first two chapters of Job, 40 sermons.
- On Ezekiel, 46 sermons.
- On Amos, 40 sermons.
- On Zechariah, 20 sermons.
- On Micah, 30 sermons.
- On Haggai, 5 sermons.
- On the 7 Penitential Psalms, commentaries.
- On Psalm 72, 24 sermons.
- On Psalm 79, an exposition.
- Likewise, on various verses of the Psalms, 20 sermons.
- On the Lord's Prayer, a threefold exposition.
- On the first Canonical [epistle] of John, 19 sermons.

[Letter H, continued from p259:]

...[the day before he was led to dea]th, he wrote — amid the fearful horrors of the prison and the anguish of the imminent punishment — in Latin speech, Meditations on the 31st Psalm and on the fiftieth, most burning with living words, lively thoughts, and fervor of spirit. The former of these, in which the struggle of hope and despair is expressed, begins Sadness has beset me, etc.; the latter begins Unhappy man that I am, etc.

Ambrose, bishop of Compsa [Conza], published a book of many annotations against the aforesaid volumes of Jerome [Savonarola] — out of which volumes the holy Synod of Trent forbade the below-written sermons to be read, until they should come forth corrected by the tribunal of the holy Roman Inquisition:

- On Exodus, sermon 1, beginning Lord, why are they multiplied.
- On Exodus, sermon 2, beginning Since we are set by the Lord.
- On Exodus, sermon 3, beginning When Israel went out of Egypt.
- On Exodus, sermon 6, beginning The more he oppressed them.
- On Exodus, sermon 10, beginning The cry therefore of the children of Israel.
- On Exodus, sermon 20, beginning His eyelids question the sons of men.
- On Ruth, chapter 3, the sermon beginning And behold, now in the middle of the night the man was afraid.
- On Job, chapter 5, the sermon beginning Blessed is the man who is corrected by the Lord.
- On Ezekiel, sermon 21, beginning The Lord said, Hear me, pass over through.
- On Ezekiel, sermon 32, beginning And after all thy abominations.
- On Ezekiel, sermon 41, beginning And the word of the Lord came to me.
- On Amos, chapter 4, sermon 12, beginning Hear this word, ye fat cows.
- On 3 Kings [1 Kings] 18, concerning the fiery experiment [ordeal] of Elijah: an Exhortation delivered to the people in the year of the Lord 1498, on the seventh day of April, when — to explore the truth of the matters foretold by the author [Savonarola] — Dominic of Pescia the Dominican, defender of Jerome [Savonarola], and Julian the Florentine Franciscan, his accuser, were about to enter the burning pyre. The beginning of the sermon is, Since, besides those things which have been accomplished, prayers, many things still remain to be done.

Thomas Neri [Tommaso Neri], of the Order of Preachers, a man both pious and learned, recently wrote an Apologetic book in defense of the teaching of this author [Savonarola] — who, being in the forty-sixth year of his age, was slain, namely in the year of human salvation 1498, on the 14th day of June. [The execution is otherwise dated 23 May 1498; "14 June" as printed.]

John Francis [Gianfrancesco Pico], prince of Mirandola, wrote his [Savonarola's] life.

Jerome Seripando [Girolamo Seripando] wrote a Commentary on St. Paul's epistle to the Galatians. Rubinus printed it at Venice, 1569.

HIERONYMUS of Stridon [St. Jerome], whom Severus Sulpicius calls rector of the parish of Bethlehem, and whom all the Greeks call the Jerusalemite presbyter — son of Eusebius, from the town of Stridon (which, overthrown by the Goths, was once the border of Dalmatia and Pannonia) — was a man most consummate in every kind of learning. For, by the splendor of his speech and by the strength of eloquence — in which he advanced under Donatus the Grammarian and Victorinus the Rhetor, most illustrious men[1] — he left all the writers of the Latin Church far behind him at a great interval. Of tongues, too, he had so great a skill that he held Greek, Hebrew, Syriac, Chaldee [Aramaic], and Latin all as equally as his native Dalmatian mother-tongue. But also in the schools of the philosophers he left nothing untouched of Aristotle, Plato, and Zeno — that is, of the Peripatetics, Academics, and Stoics. Furnished with these apparatuses, he betook himself to the studies of the sacred Letters, using in these as teachers Apollinaris of Laodicea, Didymus of Alexandria, and Gregory of Nazianzus.[2] Under whom he acquired for himself so great an erudition in divine matters, and such a name for erudition, that in the obscure difficulties of the holy volumes the Roman Pontiff Damasus, the most learned Augustine, Paulinus, Chromatius, Heliodorus, and many others everywhere throughout Italy, Gaul, Spain, Africa, Palestine, and Greece — most erudite bishops — took refuge in this one man, as in one who, aided by his manifold variety of tongues, had read all the interpreters of divine Scripture: Greeks, Hebrews, and Latins. Which also Augustine, in Book 1 against Julian, openly shows in these words, saying: The holy presbyter Jerome, learned in Greek, Latin, and Hebrew eloquence, passing from the Western to the Eastern Church, lived in holy places and in sacred letters even to a decrepit age. He read all — or nearly all — who before him had written on ecclesiastical doctrine from either part of the world.

This admirable man, therefore, produced — besides his exoteric writings, which are many — so many and so great exegetical volumes upon the holy Scriptures, that there is no part, whether of the Old or of the New Testament, on which he did not publish either translations, or annotations, or commentaries, or epistles. For by these four orders [classes] are distinguished all his works that pertain to the understanding of the sacred Volumes. In the first, the order of translation, he turned the whole body of Scripture into various tongues. In the second, the order of annotation, he illustrated many things from both Testaments, applying here and there brief scholia. In the third, the epistolary order, he wrote almost innumerable letters, in which he satisfied the questions of those who, sending letters to him from divers parts of the world, consulted him on the abstruse questions of divine Scripture. In the fourth and last, the Hyponematic — that is, the order of Commentaries — he expounded the divine Scriptures according to the various editions of the Greeks (but especially the LXX), and according to his own edition, which he had translated from the Hebrew source, to the letter; and, first of all the Latins, he most skillfully investigated and most clearly discussed the historical sense — which, on account of its difficulty, none before him had either touched or fully explained — adding also brief allegorical and tropological explanations, which should be, as it were, the appendices and ornaments of the literal understanding.

Now, of these Commentaries he wrote several with his own hand, and dictated very many through secretaries, with such facility and speed that each [→ p261]

Book IV, letter H, the St. Jerome entry continuing: his prodigious dictation and his following of Origen "like a bee"; the Terentian cento by which he defended himself; his habit of suppressing authors' names; the contrast of his ornate versus his plain style, with his plain-diction motto and the "Questions to Damasus" quotation; then the announcement of a double Index of his works, opening the First (undoubted) Index. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)*

[Letter H — St. Jerome, continued from p260:]

...each day he would exceed a thousand verses [lines] by dictation. For which cause — as he himself relates about himself in the epistle to Eusebius — many reckoned him rather to be reading others' works than composing his own.

Now Jerome followed, among the other Greek expositors — whose writings he culled after the manner of a bee — chiefly Origen, not indeed as a dogmatist but as an interpreter; out of whose immense volumes he poured almost innumerable things into his own works. On which account, when he was accused by his rivals, he excused himself in many places, but especially in the preface to his second commentary on Micah, where out of Terentian verses he fitted together a cento of this kind for his defense:

> I warn the fat bulls that have surrounded me, that they be quiet and cease
>
> To slander, lest they come to know their own misdeeds.

For, as to their saying that I plunder the volumes of Origen, and

That it is not fitting that the writings of the ancients be contaminated:

Because they reckon this a vehement reproach,

I count it the greatest praise — since I wish to imitate

Him whom I doubt not to please you, and all the prudent.

For if it be a crime to translate the good sayings of the Greeks, let there be accused Ennius, Maro [Virgil], Plautus, Caecilius, and Terence, Tullius [Cicero] too — nay, let our own Hilary be held guilty of theft:

who, upon

The Psalms, turned nearly forty thousand verses of the aforesaid Origen according to their sense —

Whose diligence, of them all, I long to emulate

Rather than the obscure negligence of those men.

Now Jerome, in gathering the explanations of the ancients, is wont very often to report their opinions — and sometimes also some erring and absurd opinions — with the authors' names suppressed (whom, to avoid the reader's tedium, he was accustomed to name once in the prefaces of his books); sometimes omitting too, for modesty's sake, the refutations of those opinions, because he had refuted them most fully elsewhere. Whence it comes that, while he mixes others' matter with his own without distinction, he sometimes seems to accept the errors of others and to pronounce them as the judgment of his own mind. And hence Jerome's detractors have seized what occasion they could to assail him, [saying] that he had bespattered almost all his commentaries with the dogmas of heretics. Meeting whose calumny, Jerome left these things written in his fourth volume on Jeremiah:

> I am accustomed, in my commentaries and explanations — as is the custom — when setting down the various opinions of interpreters, to mix in speech of this kind: "Some say this, others assert that, several think thus." And for this the wretched Grunnius [Rufinus], and, after many years, the disciple of Jovinian, calumniate me — [saying] that under others' names I set down my own opinions. Which I do for the sake of good will, lest I should seem to tear anyone by name. But my kindness has been turned into calumny against me.

The style of Jerome, in each of these orders [classes of work], is far different from that which he uses in his other works. For in his exoteric little works — whatever they be, whether Paraenetic (which contain instruction for life) or Apologetic (which look to refuting the errors of heretics and the calumnies of the malevolent) — he has a manner of speaking composed of a certain varied and admirable mixture of all things, and adorned with ornaments and pigments culled from every side out of every variety of writers; painted with the colors of the rhetoricians, the subtleties of the dialecticians, the flowerlets of the poets, the maxims of the philosophers, and with allusions of every kind to all the arts and sciences; and variegated with a diversity of foreign words — Greek, that is, Hebrew, and Chaldee [Aramaic] sayings — after the fashion of an emblem (as Ennius says) of mosaic work, and interwoven like a Musaeum-work with many-colored little stones. On the contrary, in his exegetical works, or enarrations of the divine Scripture — all the pomp of secular letters despised — he abstains from every paint of eloquence and from all ambition of the most difficult questions, unwilling (as he himself says), under the occasion of the divine words, to show off his own eloquence and erudition, and in these to hunt praise and admiration from his readers. But everywhere he uses a diction succinct, simple, and open, and words (as he himself says) taken from the crossroads [common speech], repeating in all his commentaries, and in almost every preface of his books, this saying, namely: Let those who desire rivers of eloquence and elegant declamations not read these things. For this alone is my purpose: to declare the words of divine Scripture; and this alone is my praise, that through me the reader may understand the words of divine Scripture. Giving the reason of this purpose himself, in the Questions to

Pope Damasus he thus writes:

> One who disputes about the Scriptures ought not to hunt out the arguments of Aristotle, nor is the rivulet to be drawn from the river of Ciceronian eloquence, nor are the ears to be soothed with the flowerlets of Quintilian and with scholastic declamation. A speech is needful that is pedestrian and like everyday speech, and redolent of no lamplit toil — one that explains the matter, sets forth the sense, makes the obscure plain, not one that puts forth leaves in the composition of words. Let others be eloquent, let them be praised as they will, and weigh out foaming words with puffed-out cheeks: it is enough for me so to speak that I be understood — that, speaking and disputing about the Scriptures, I may imitate the simplicity of the Scriptures.

And let these few things now be what we have touched, in general, concerning the exegetical works of Jerome. But in particular, those which under his name are reported to have been published on all — or on the several — books of divine Scripture, we shall distinguish by a double Index: in the first of which we shall place the undoubted labors of Jerome; in the second we shall enumerate those writings about which it is greatly doubted among the learned whether they are his.

Running head: LIBER QVARTVS.)*

...the whole Church of the Latins received,[1] and the very ancient Fathers approved by their own antiquity — but first of all Augustine, in the 18th book of the City of God, writing thus: There was not lacking in our times the presbyter Jerome, a most learned man, and most skilled in the three tongues, who translated the divine Scriptures into Latin not from the Greek but from the Hebrew. Which so great a literary labor of his even the Hebrews confess to be truthful. Subscribing to him, Gregory in the eleventh book of the Morals thus speaks: The new translation of Jerome is held to have rendered all things for us more truly from the Hebrew speech; therefore whatever is said in it is to be trusted, and it is fitting that our exposition should more subtly search out its words. Isidore, bishop of Seville, in the second book of the Etymologies, adds these things: Jerome, most skilled in the three tongues, translated the divine Scriptures from Hebrew into Latin eloquence, and eloquently rendered them; whose interpretation is deservedly preferred to the others: for it is more tenacious of the words, and clearer in sense by its perspicuity, and — being a Christian interpretation — truer. Thus he. Nor is it to be passed over that Jerome corrected the edition of the Seventy interpreters [LXX] — already for many ages before translated into Latin by an uncertain author, and corrupted by the injury of the times — and restored it to the Greek verity,[2] as he himself testifies in the preface to Paralipomenon [Chronicles]. He translated, moreover, with such facility and speed most of the Hebrew volumes of the Old Instrument, that by the labor of three days he made Latin out of Hebrew the three books of Solomon — namely Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Songs — and turned the book of Tobias from Chaldee [Aramaic] into Latin by the work of a single day.

Besides these, he also carefully corrected the whole New Testament — already by others either badly translated into Latin, or corrupted by the negligence of copyists — and with the utmost care emended it according to the Greek verity. Of which emendation Augustine, in a certain letter to Jerome, brought forth his judgment in these words: Accordingly we give no small thanks to God for your work, that you have translated the Gospel from Greek into Latin: because in almost all places there is no stumbling, when we have compared the Greek scripture. Whence, if anyone be contentious for the old falsity, he is either taught or refuted by the codices being brought forth and compared; and if some passages very rarely give deserved cause for warning — who is so hard that he would not readily pardon so useful a labor, for which he is not able to render a return of praise? [printed "non non"] Thus Augustine.

Jerome also translated — as he himself testifies in the epistle to Sophronius — the whole body of the entire divine Scripture into the Dalmatian tongue, for the benefit of the peoples of his own nation;[3] which nation, even to this day, uses the reading of this translation with the utmost veneration.

He also translated, out of Philo and Origen, On the Interpretation of the Hebrew Names which are contained in both Testaments — one book, beginning Philo, a most eloquent man.

After these labors of translation he wrote an Epistolary of Prefaces upon the several volumes of the Bible — one book, whose beginning is Brother Ambrose. He wrote also:

Upon all the holy scripture, one book of Traditions, or of an inchoate [begun] exposition of Hebrew Questions — from the beginning of Genesis even to the end of that same volume. By which work he refuted the errors of those who wrongly brought forth various testimonies from the sacred Letters, thinking that they were so read in the Hebrew codices; showing which words, both in the Greek and in the Latin codices of the blessed Scripture, were superfluous or lacking, each being restored to its truth. He moreover explained in Latin the etymologies of things, of names, and of regions, unknown to the Latins, promising that he would publish, by a similar labor, annotations upon all the Old scripture. Whether he afterward performed this, is unknown to me.

He wrote besides, on Genesis, to Damasus, three questions:

- On Genesis 4, one question, On the vengeance for the slayer of Cain.
- On Genesis 15, one question, On the sons of Abraham who should return from Egypt in the fourth generation.
- On Genesis 27, question 1, Why Isaac blessed not the son to whom he wished, but why he blessed the son to whom he did not wish.
- Likewise on Genesis 14, one epistle to Evagrius, On Melchizedek.
- On Exodus chapter 39, one epistle, On the priestly vesture.
- On chapter 33 of the book of Numbers, On the 42 encampments of the children of Israel in the desert, to Fabiola, epistle 1.
- On the same [book], On the Land of Promise, to Dardanus, epistle 1.
- On the same, a small booklet On the Land of Promise, which he mentions in book 1 on Jeremiah.
- On 3 Kings [1 Kings], On the Ephod, to Marcella, one epistle.
- On 4 Kings [2 Kings] 17, On Ahaz begetting a son when he was eleven years old, epistle 1, to Vitalis.

Upon the Psalter he set forth epistles, and a threefold variety of translation. The first, indeed, when he was at Rome, by order of Pope Damasus — which ought rather to be called a correction than a translation; for he corrected, and in great part emended, the common [Vulgate] edition of the Psalter,[4] contaminated with innumerable faults, following in this the Greek version of the Seventy interpreters. When this, at Damasus's command, had begun to be read and sung in the Roman Church, it was called the ROMAN PSALTER.[5] But when this emendation was again corrupted through the fault of copyists — among whom the error of the old translation prevailed more than the fidelity of the new correction — Jerome, at the urging of Paula and Eustochium, put forth a second edition from the Greek version of the Seventy interpreters, in which, by obeli set beside [that is, by horizontal strokes], he marked what among the LXX was superfluous, and, by asterisks (``) likewise inserted, noted what he himself had added from the Hebrew verity. When Damasus had granted this work to be sung in the churches of Gaul, it was called the GALLICAN PSALTER.[6] The third edition he rendered from the source of the Hebrew verity into Latin eloquence, at the request of Sophronius; by whom, when the Jews — bringing forth testimonies of the psalms — were pressed in disputation, they mockingly answered, almost at every word, that it was not so held in the Hebrew, as he alleged from the Seventy interpreters. This edition, again turned into Greek by Sophronius, no church, so far as I know, has been accustomed to sing. He wrote also, upon the second Psalter version published by him, a boo[klet] [→ p263]

Book IV, letter H — St. Jerome's First Index continued: the letter to Sunnia and Fretela on the Psalter; Psalter commentaries cited by Gregory and Augustine; epistolary explanations on three Psalms; seven treatises translated from Origen; Ecclesiastes to Paula and Eustochium, with the censure of Rethicius over "Aurum ophaz"; the 63 books on all the Prophets (Jerome the first of the Latins to expound them historically), dictated in old age; then the catalog of the several Prophet-commentaries (Isaiah through Haggai), each with dedicatee and incipit. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

...a boo[klet], or very prolix epistle, to Sunnia and Fretela, showing in what places the edition of the Seventy interpreters differed from the Hebrew verity, and how the corrupted readings in the psalms ought to be restored according to the Hebrew faith [text]; and [displaying] the LXX edition, before rendered by himself into Latin and distinguished with asterisks and obeli.

He is also reported to have written commentaries on the whole Psalter — out of which Gregory, expounding the Psalms that are called Penitential, brings a testimony from the exposition of Psalm 50; and Augustine, from the explanation of Psalm 93, in the Epistle to Fortunatus, bishop of Sicca, brings forth an opinion.

Besides these, he composed epistolary explanations on three Psalms, that is:

- On Psalm 44, one epistle, to the virgin Principia.
- On Psalm 99, epistle 1, to Cyprian.
- On Psalm 126, an epistle, to Marcella.

He also translated, out of the commentaries of Origen upon the Psalms, seven treatises — from the tenth Psalm to the sixteenth Psalm, one treatise for each Psalm. He wrote also:

On Ecclesiastes, to Paula and Eustochium, one book — remarkable for its wondrous brevity and wondrous facility — according to the literal and the spiritual sense; in which, following the authority of no single edition, he rather fitted himself to the custom of the Seventy interpreters, but only in those places which did not much differ from the Hebrew verity; sometimes he also explained the translations of Aquila, and of Symmachus, and of Theodotion. The beginning of the work is, I remember. He wrote besides, to Marcella, one epistle, whose beginning is Lately with Rethicius, in which he censures Rethicius, bishop of the Aedui [Autun], because he had wrongly interpreted Aurum ophaz [gold of Ophaz], for which, in the fifth chapter, we read the finest gold; and he himself declares what it is.[1] After these he published:

Upon all the Prophets, both the greater and the lesser, 63 books of commentaries; in which, according to each edition [Hebrew and LXX], he was the first of all the Latins to undertake and complete a historical and literal exposition upon the several words of the Prophets, from the first to the last[2] — which, on account of the enormous difficulty of the matter, none before him had dared either to begin, or, once begun, to pursue. These foundations being laid, he built upon the history the anagogical and tropological senses, following in these the Greek authors, and most of all his own Origen. He set forth, moreover, with skillful diligence, the several Prophets, in a style succinct and simple, but as easy and open as could be — reckoning this to be his highest praise, if through him all the words of the Prophets should be most clearly explained. He divided his commentaries into many books, so that — the long journey of exposition being separated by fixed stages — he might make easier, divided into parts, the labor of the one dictating, of the one writing, and of the one reading. And he set before the several books certain pointed little prefaces, in which he briefly explains the themes of the explanations and sharply refutes the slanders of his rivals. He dictated these commentaries in extreme old age — not in the same order in which they are read in the Canon, but as he was able, and as he was asked, his secretaries taking down his words — since now, with dimming eyes and trembling fingers, he could no longer bear the labor of writing with his own hand; and moreover with such speed that he scarcely had space for re-reading and correcting. The catalog of these books is this:

• On Isaiah the Prophet, 18 books of commentaries, to Eustochium, beginning Being at length hardly finished in a long time.

• Likewise, on Isaiah chapter 6, on the mystery of the Seraphim, to Pope Damasus (as it is read in the common codices), two epistles — which, however, are not epistles, nor written to Damasus, but one treatise divided by I-know-not-whom into two sections. Of which Jerome, in the third book of his commentaries on Isaiah, thus writes: Of this vision, about thirty years ago, when I was at Constantinople and was being instructed in the studies of the holy scriptures under that most eloquent man Gregory of Nazianzus, then bishop of that same city,[3] I know that I dictated a short and hasty treatise, that I might take a test of my little talent, and obey my friends who bade me. To that booklet, therefore, I refer the reader.

• On Jeremiah, 20 books of commentaries, to Eusebius — which Rabanus [Maurus], in the preface of his commentaries on Jeremiah, and Trithemius, and Cassiodorus cite; but yet of these only six, on thirty-two chapters of this Prophet, could be found. Their beginning is After the explanation.

• Likewise, he rendered the Lamentations of Jeremiah in Latin verse, as he himself testifies in the preface to Jeremiah, which was translated by him.

• On Ezekiel, to Eustochium, fourteen books, [beginning] The eighteen volumes of explanations on Isaiah being finished.

• On Daniel, to Pammachius and Marcella, one book of an interpolated exposition (that is, written by intervals), [beginning] Against the Prophet Daniel.

• On Hosea, to Pammachius, 3 books, [beginning] If in the explanations.

• On Joel, to Pammachius, 1 book, [beginning] The order is not the same.

• On Amos, to Pammachius, 3 books, [beginning] Amos the Prophet.

• On Abdias [Obadiah], to Pammachius, 2 books; of which one he wrote in old age, whose beginning is When I was a little one; the other he wrote in youth, allegorically, when he did not yet understand the historical sense of the Scriptures — which one perished through the injury of time.

• On Jonah, to Chromatius, 1 book, [beginning] About three years have passed.

• On Micah, to Paula and Eustochium, two books, [beginning] Micah, on whom now.

• On Nahum, to the same, one book, [beginning] According to the Seventy interpreters.

• On Habakkuk, to Chromatius, 2 books, [beginning] First, O Chromatius.

• Likewise, another book of annotations on the same Prophet, [beginning] The burden which.

• On Zephaniah, to Paula and Eustochium, 1 book, [beginning] Before I approach Zephaniah.

• On Haggai, to the same, 1 book, [beginning] In the second year of Darius.

Running head: LIBER QVARTVS.)*

[Letter H — St. Jerome, the First Index concluded, then the Second Index:]

• On Zechariah, to Exuperius of Toulouse, an epistle in 3 books, [beginning] In the last part now of autumn.

• On Malachi, to Minerius and Alexander, one book — the last of the 12 Prophets.

And these things he composed on the Old Testament; now follow those which he composed on the New Testament.

On Matthew, four books of commentaries, to Eusebius: in which — the authority of the Ancients omitted (whom, for the shortness of time, he had no opportunity either to read or to follow) — he briefly arranged the historical interpretation, sometimes mingling in the flowers of the spiritual understanding, and laying in these the foundations for a future work, which he afterward completed on Matthew more fully and more exactly. He dictated these four books with such speed that, within the space of two weeks — and with the feast of Easter imminent, by which he was chiefly detained in spiritual occupations — he finished the whole work. Its beginning is That many [have].

He wrote also certain other things on Matthew, of which we have:

• On Matthew 6, upon that text Be not solicitous for the morrow, one epistle to Amandus.

• On Matthew 11, On the disciples whom John sent to Christ, to Algasia, question 1.

• On Matthew 12, upon that text He shall not break the bruised reed, to Algasia, question 1.

• On Matthew 16, upon that text Whoever wishes to come after me, to Algasia, question 1.

• On Matthew 20 [read 21], upon that text Hosanna, blessed [is he], to Damasus, epistle 1.

• On Matthew 21 [read 19], upon that text If you wish to be perfect, to Hedibia, question 1.

• On Matthew 24, upon that text Woe to them that are with child and that give suck, to Algasia, question 1.

• On Matthew 26, upon that text I will not drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine, to Hedibia, question 1.

• On Matthew 28, On the time of the Resurrection of Christ, and the things that happened in it, to Hedibia, question 3.

• On Luke chapter 15, On the prodigal son, to Pope Damasus, one epistle, which begins Of your Beatitude.

On the Epistles of Paul he brought a twofold kind of exposition, namely the Hypomnematic [commentary-style] and the Epistolary. In the first kind, indeed, he gathered from the explanations of Origen, Victorinus, Didymus of Alexandria, Theodore, and Apollinaris a [commentary] on the Epistle to the Galatians, to Paula and Eustochium, 3 books, of which the first begins Very few indeed.

- On the Epistle to the Ephesians, to the same, 3 books — which he testifies he published with such haste that each day he would dictate up to a thousand lines. Their beginning is A wise man.
- He wrote likewise, in the same style, on the Epistle to Titus, 1 book, beginning Although they are not.
- Likewise, on the Epistle to Philemon, 1 book, beginning Those who are unwilling.

He also composed, on various places of Paul, questions and various epistles, of whose number are:

- On that text Romans 5, Scarcely for a just man will one die, to Algasia, one question.
- On that text Romans 7, Occasion being taken, sin revived, to Algasia, question 1.
- On that text Romans 9, I wished to be anathema, to Algasia, question 1.
- On that text 1 Corinthians 6, Every sin that a man does is outside the body, to Amandus, epistle 1.
- On that text 1 Corinthians 8 [read 2], What are those things which the eye has not seen, to Marcella.
- On that text 1 Corinthians 15, He must reign, to Amandus, question 1.
- Likewise on that text 1 Corinthians 15, We shall indeed all rise again, to Minerius and Alexander, epistle 1.
- On that text 2 Corinthians 2, To some the odor of death, to others the odor of life, to Hedibia, question 11.
- On chapter 2 of Galatians, On the pretended dispute of Peter and Paul, to Augustine, epistle 1.
- On that text Colossians 2, Let no man beguile you, to Algasia, question 1.
- On that text 1 Thessalonians 4, On the rapture of the living to meet the Lord, to Marcella, question 1.
- On 2 Thessalonians 2, On the man of sin, to Algasia, question 1.
- On 1 Timothy 3, On the conditions [qualifications] of a bishop, to Oceanus, epistle 1.

And these are the undoubted writings of Jerome; but those which are doubtful are noted in the following Index.

SECOND INDEX OF THE EXEGETICAL VOLUMES. In which, under the uncertain title of Jerome, these are contained:

- On the three books of Kings — one book. [beginning] There was one man.
- On the two books of Paralipomenon [Chronicles] — one book. [beginning] To Heber were born.
- On Job — one book. [beginning] Job, who grieving.
- On the Psalter — one book. [beginning] Lately, when Origen.
- On Proverbs — three books. [beginning] The parables of Solomon.
- On Lamentations — three books. [beginning] You have in the lamentations.
- On Mark — one book. [beginning] Every learned scribe.
- On Luke chapter 15, on the prodigal son — one book. [beginning] Of all indeed.
- On the Acts of the Apostles, on the interpretation of the names — one book. [beginning] Aceldama, a field.
- On all the epistles of Paul — 14 books. [beginning] By your letters.

Concerning all these, what I myself think — being always ready to acquiesce in a better judgment — I will indicate in a few words.

ON THE ANNOTATIONS ON KINGS AND PARALIPOMENON [CHRONICLES].

The Annotations on the three books of Kings and the two of Paralipomenon, Nicholas of Lyra, in his commentaries on those same volumes, denies to be Jerome's — affirming that their author was a certain neophyte Jew, who from Hebrew fables noted down many things no less fictitious than ridiculous; and this too seems to confirm Lyra's opinion, that [it seems...] [→ p265]

(Rich PDF p. 265 [printed folio 246, verso]. Book IV, letter H — Sixtus's critical judgments on the doubtful works attributed to St. Jerome: the Annotations on Kings/Chronicles (against Jerome's custom); the Commentary on Job (reckoned spurious, perhaps Bede's, compiled for Bishop Vecterius, with a Faustus of Riez citation); the Commentaries on the Psalter (a monk's centos, with the Cynomia and Ps 86 "le-Ziyyon" disputes); the Commentaries on Proverbs (citing Gregory and Augustine — the table-distich — assigned by Trithemius to Bede); and the Commentaries on Lamentations (a cento gathered by Rabanus Maurus). Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

[Letter H — St. Jerome, judgments on the doubtful works, continued from p264:]

...[it seems] confirmed, in that Jerome, in the Annotations which he wrote on Genesis, everywhere brings forth Hebrew and Greek testimonies of the divine scripture, expressed in Hebrew and Greek words, weighing everywhere the various translations of the different interpreters — of which things you will find no mention in these annotations [on Kings and Chronicles].

ON THE COMMENTARY ON JOB.

The Commentary on Job — which the author, as appears from the end of the volume, compiled for the sake of Bishop Vecterius — is for that reason reckoned supposititious [spurious], because it follows neither the edition of the Seventy interpreters nor the Hebrew verity, nor cites any of the old expositors, but treats only mystical senses, the understanding of the letter being entirely omitted: all which things are far removed from Jerome's custom. It may be conjectured (if indeed anything is to be attributed to conjectures of this kind) that this work is by Bede the presbyter, as being an Englishman writing to an Englishman. For that Vecterius held a bishopric among the English, and lived in Bede's times, that Chronicle-volume testifies which is commonly called the English Chronicle. Yet it must not be denied that most things in these commentaries are borrowed from the writings of Jerome. For — to omit the rest — Faustus, bishop of Gaul, about the year 430 from the birth of Christ, at the beginning of his book On Creatures cited a testimony from a certain treatise of Jerome, which is now had here word for word at the end of the explanation of the twenty-fifth chapter in Job.

ON THE COMMENTARIES ON THE PSALTER.

The Commentaries of Annotations on the Psalms, arranged by intervals, give many indications of not being Jerome's. First, because this author, the historical sense set aside, dwells only in allegorical and tropological expositions, using no variety of editions. Then, he has none of that Greek and Hebrew erudition which Jerome is wont to bring into all his exegetical works. He wrote also many things diametrically opposed to Jerome's opinions — as in the interpretation of Psalm 77, where he says Cynomia [κυνόμυια] is the dog-fly, Jerome protesting against it in the epistle to Sunnia and Fretela. On Psalm 86 he notes that, according to the Hebrew verity, it ought to be read Shall a man say of Sion, against Jerome's translation, who, according to what is in the Hebrew — לציון le-Ziyyon — translated To Sion shall a man say. Psalm 89, which Jerome ascribed to Moses, [this author] contends is not Moses'. As, in the explanation of Psalm 13, that testimony of Paul in the third chapter of the epistle to the Romans — which Jerome shows to be borrowed from Isaiah — [this author] asserts to be taken from Deuteronomy. To these is added, that — teeming everywhere with the ineptitude of speech, with battologies [vain repetitions] and solecisms — [this work] recoils both from the Jeronymian phrase and from his manner of writing, and often runs off into the formulas of homilies and sermons, repeating even to the point of nausea certain inept little exhortations, among which are these: Why do I say all this? Do you wish to know what this is? And see what he says. It is evident, from the exposition of Psalms 89, 111, and 115, that the author of the work was a monk, who was accustomed to speak, before the monks standing by, to the measure of the appointed hour, with rhapsodies brought here and there from the commentaries of various doctors, and especially of Jerome — as one may see in the enarration of Psalm 93, into which is inserted, word for word, a fragment of the Jeronymian exposition cited by Augustine in the epistle to Fortunatus, bishop of Sicca; and in the exposition of Psalm 50, where are reported the words of Jerome alleged by St. Gregory in the explanation of the fourth penitential Psalm. There are those who think the commentaries are Jerome's, but contaminated by an uncertain impostor with countless trifles and nonsense.

ON THE COMMENTARIES ON THE PROVERBS OF SOLOMON.

The three books of commentaries on Proverbs are denied to have been Jerome's — both because of the dissimilarity of the sentences and of the eloquence, and because in them Gregory and Augustine are cited more than once. For a testimony of Augustine, from the book On Lying to Consentius, is adduced in the explanation of the sixth chapter; and again, in the explanation of the twentieth chapter, is cited a distich of the same [Augustine], from the Sermons to the Hermits, that is:

> If anyone loves, by his words, to gnaw the life of the absent,
> let him know this table is forbidden to him.

And in the exposition of the 21st chapter he cites the blessed Pope Gregory in the homilies of the gospel; and in the annotations on the 30th chapter he alleges by name an opinion of St. Jerome himself, from the commentaries on Jeremiah. Trithemius attributes these commentaries to Bede, by whose title also, in the most ancient copies, they are inscribed.

ON THE COMMENTARIES ON THE THRENI [LAMENTATIONS].

In the Commentaries on the Threni [Lamentations] — besides certain prefaces to Eusebius, gathered partly from the Epistle of Jerome on the interpretation of the Hebrew Alphabet, to Paula Urbica, partly from others of his writings — there is nothing that breathes the Jeronymian genius. For, besides that there is in them no trace either of Greek or of Hebrew understanding, the very structure of the speech — everywhere unequal — plainly cries out that this work is nothing else than a hotchpotch of centos, heaped together by a zealous collector out of the sayings of various different authors, and especially out of the opinions of Gregory, and even out of whole chapters. Nor do I fear to affirm that the gatherer of this heap was Rabanus Maurus, in whose works, printed at Basel, these three books are found. These the printers, that they might publish them more plausibly as Jerome's writings — enlarged into a greater bulk, and for greater [→ p266]

...and might sell them at a greater price, inserted them into the volumes of Jerome — some lines being cut from the beginning of Rabanus's preface, so that the imposture might the less be detected by blind buyers.

ON THE COMMENTARIES ON MARK.

The Commentaries of Mystical explanation on Mark recoil from Jerome's style more than fire from water. That these are the work of a man who knew not much Latin, and even less Greek and Hebrew, the barbarism of the speech is proof, and the inept interpretation of foreign words: an example of which you have in the exposition of chapter 14, where the author noted that the word Pascha signifies in Latin "passing over" [transitus], but Phase "immolation," and that Nardus pistica is equivalent to "Mystical." But in the same place he affirms that Mary, who anointed the head of Christ in her own house, was that sinful woman who, in the house of the Pharisee, washed His feet with her tears. And in chapter 15 he writes that the ram was sacrificed for Isaac by Abraham on Mount Calvary — of which opinions Jerome disapproves the former in his chapter on Matthew 26, and the latter in the epistle to Marcella, affirming that the same sacrifice of the ram was offered on Mount Moriah. Again, in the explanation of chapter 15, he inserts certain verses on the figure of the cross, torn out in mutilated fashion from the fourth book of the poems of Sedulius[1] — who, it is agreed, was some years later than Jerome.

ON THE PRODIGAL SON.

That this treatise too is not Jerome's — if it were little clear from the character of the speech — this also could prove: that it is not likely that Jerome, who had written the exposition of this parable to Damasus, should again, with his opinion changed, have published another treatise with a contrary sense of explanation; and that all the printers have printed this very [treatise] among the homilies of John Chrysostom — although it is not Chrysostom's either, but of an uncertain writer, as we have noted in the censures of his works.

ON THE ANNOTATIONS ON THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES.

And this little book of Annotations too a certain zealous man gathered out of St. Jerome — whose name, and whose book On the Interpretation of the Names, he cited at the end of the volume. It is credible that the collector was Bede, in whose works this same booklet still survives.

ON THE COMMENTARIES ON PAUL.

The Annotations on the thirteen Epistles of Paul — although on their front they display a little preface of Jerome writing to Heliodorus — yet the diversity of style and the difference of doctrines show that they are not his. Ambrose, archbishop of Compsa [Conza], asserts that the writer of the work was Pelagius, because in the exposition of the eighth and ninth chapters of the epistle to the Romans he teaches that eternal predestination is [made] from the merits of the elect foreseen by the divine foreknowledge. But I, to pronounce freely what I think, do not at all doubt that the author, whoever he was, labored under the Pelagian plague — as can most plainly be detected from the annotations on the seventh chapter of the epistle to the Romans, where, expounding that text Without the law sin was dead, he thinks those to be mad who believe that Adam's sin has been derived into us by the propagation [inheritance] from our parents, affirming that the same sin was transmitted to posterity not by propagation but by example only. From which it is sufficiently clear that Jerome, the most bitter enemy of the Pelagian dogma, was not the author of this work. There are also certain other things asserted in these commentaries, not lacking the suspicion of heresy, which we — together with the aforesaid errors — have noted in the following volume. Yet I am not of the opinion of Ambrose my teacher, so as to judge these commentaries to be Pelagius's own: for Pelagius, as Augustine testifies in the third book On the Baptism of Little Ones, in the very brief explanations which he published on the epistle to the Romans, used such modesty that he set forth the argument against original sin not under his own person but under another's — which Augustine, in the same place, transcribed word for word and reviews.

Besides these, Trithemius asserts that Jerome wrote on the four gospels according to the anagogy, 4 books, whose beginning is First it must be asked; likewise on the Canonical [Catholic] epistles, 7 books; and on the Apocalypse, 4 books. Concerning which I have nothing certain to affirm, except that Jerome, in the preface to the commentaries of Victorinus to Anatolius, promised that he would write on the Apocalypse.

There are also found, in the homiliary of Albinus [Alcuin], and in the breviaries of the divine offices, some homilies under the title of Jerome — which, however, are not homilies, but fragments of explanations, excerpted from various of his commentaries.

These, then, are the exegetical writings of Jerome, who, after countless labors of his studies, dies under the emperors Honorius and Theodosius, in the 61st year of his age, about the year of our salvation 422.[2] His life, it is believed, Eusebius of Cremona, his disciple, committed to the monuments of letters.

Jerome [Girolamo Trevisan], bishop of Verona, a Venetian by fatherland, of the noble Trevisan family, of the Order of Preachers, most celebrated throughout all Italy in sacred preaching, showed me an explanation on the Epistle to the Hebrews, published by himself, of singular erudition and judgment. He dies in the year of the Lord 1562.

Jerome Varlenius Sylvius [Hieronymus Varlenius], professor of sacred letters at Utrecht among the Johannites [Knights of St. John], composed three books of commentaries on all the Davidic Psalms, in which — bringing forward the various editions of the old interpreters — he elucidated the more obscure passages. Their beginning is Before [I begin] the enarration. He flou[rished] [→ p267]

[Letter H, continued from p266:]

...[He flou]rished in the year of the Lord 1550.

Jerome Vida [Girolamo Vida] of Cremona, from a canon regular of the Lateran [made] bishop of Alba, a poet an incomparable imitator of the Virgilian song, was almost the first of all the Latin poets to sing — most happily — the life, death, resurrection, and other deeds of our Savior, gathered out of the four gospels, with a sublimity of song next to the Virgilian majesty. Which he himself, no inept judge of his own [work], indicated modestly enough in these verses:

> I myself have led the Muses — a work attempted by many before —
>
> from the Aonian summit to the waves of Jordan, > and through the Palestinian glades I take my stand upon the heights of the Idumaean mount.
>

and, after a few lines:

There was no way; sheer cliffs and rough rocks, and briars covered all with their thickness.

I myself, shaking the strong two-edged axe with both hands, drive a broad path, the shadows of the shrubs giving way.

And now an entrance is granted, and one may go by an open road.

I hope too that it will come to pass, that the road which we ourselves hammer out, one day some man, dearer to the gods and to the Muses themselves, will carry to something better, and polish more lavishly with art; and the way which now by our first labor is opened,

he will more smoothly pave with cut marble.

For me it will be enough to have shown a specimen of illustrious toil.

This most learned man, therefore, gathered out of the four gospels six books of a Christiad, whose beginning is: You who fill the sea, who fill the heaven, who fill the lands with your divine power. He still lives, up to the present year 1566.

Hilary [Hilary of Arles], bishop of Arles — to whom, as the chief parent of the desert-solitude, Eucherius, bishop of Lyons, published a book In Praise of the Desert — a man versed in the divine scriptures and eloquent enough in speech, whose merits of sanctity the Catholic Church proclaims. He was of such piety toward the poor that, all his goods being cheerfully distributed for their uses, he was thereafter called, and was, the father of the poor. He wrote, among other things, to Pope Leo, in heroic verse, the history of Genesis very briefly — namely from the beginning to the seventh chapter. Its beginning is: We have obeyed your admonitions, following your sweet commands. He dies in the year of the Lord 440.

Hilary [Hilary of Poitiers], bishop of Poitiers [Pictavium] in Aquitanian Gaul, a man illustrious in erudition, sanctity, and miracles — whom Jerome, for his distinguished eloquence, calls the trumpet of the Roman tongue, and the Rhône of Latin eloquence — worked out, on the divine Scriptures, many most praiseworthy little works of Mystical explanation: that is, treatises on Job, or very many homilies, which Jerome, in the epistle against Vigilantius, testifies to have been gathered from Origen. From these Augustine, in the second book against Julian, brings forth testimonies against the heresy of the Pelagians.

He wrote also commentaries on the Psalter according to the LXX edition; of which Jerome relates that he read [Hilary's commentaries] on the first and second Psalm, and on Psalm 51 up to 62, and from 118 to the last. Beyond these I have myself read also other commentaries on seven Psalms — that is, from 62 to 70 — printed in type. There are those who assert that he published treatises on the entire body of the Psalter, and that it survives in Spain. But however it be, Jerome, writing against Rufinus, affirms that Hilary translated this explanation of the Psalms from the commentaries of Origen on the Psalter — from which he rendered, in the same sense, up to forty thousand lines, with a few things of his own interposed. And since he himself was ignorant of the Hebrew tongue, and had scarcely received some thin breath of Greek letters, he used the help of Heliodorus the presbyter, his very close friend, learned in Greek — asking of him the things he could not understand in reading Origen. But since Heliodorus was destitute of the Hebrew tongue, and was sometimes deceived by the ambiguous signification of Greek words, this was the cause that Hilary, following his error, in some places of the Psalms twisted his expositions far from the pure and genuine sense of the letter toward allegorical and anagogical senses. His style, both in the Psalter and in the Matthew commentaries, is — without any affectation of art — compressed, solid, sometimes rather obscure, but foreign to all swelling and pride. Although Jerome seemed to think otherwise: who, writing to Paulinus, says: Hilary is lifted up on the Gallican buskin, and, when he is adorned with the flowers of Greece, is sometimes wrapped up in long periods, and on that account is far from the reading of the simpler brethren. Which words of Jerome are certainly to be referred to the twelve books On the Trinity, in which (as the same Jerome writes in the epistle to Magnus the orator) he imitated the twelve books of Quintilian, both in style and in number. The beginning of the work is That the opinions of very many are diverse, etc.

He also published commentaries on the Song of Songs, which, however, Jerome confesses that he does not know.

Besides, he divided the gospel of Matthew into 33 Canons; and, following the order of this division, he discussed almost the whole evangelist with a succinct but erudite and solid explanation, delighting more in the allegorical than in the literal sense. The beginning of the work is The step which Matthew, etc.

Much this incomparable Bishop endured from the Arians. For, banished to Phrygia by the decree of the Synod of Béziers [Biterrae] — through Saturninus, bishop of Arles — he suffered a hard exile for four years with a constant mind; from which, having returned, he dies at Poitiers, Valentinian and Valens reigning, in the year of the Lord 370. Fortunatianus [Venantius Fortunatus], bishop of Poitiers, wrote his life in hexameter verse, in the year of the Lord 570.

Hildegard [Hildegard of Bingen], abbess of the monastery of St. Rupert of the town of Bingen, in the diocese of Mainz, of the Order of Benedict, a virgin of most holy conversation, and from her childhood illustrious for divine revelations and approved by miracles, wrote in Latin speech on the Gospels of the whole year — of which Trithemius reckons fifty-eight homilies. She dies in the year of the Lord 1180. The life of this venerable virgin, Theodoric Teuco [Dietrich], a Benedictine abbot, comprised in four volumes, in the year of the Lord 1200.

[Letter H, continued from p267:]

...[or, as Ge]lasius the Pope first testifies in the book against Eutyches, [Hippolytus was] bishop of the metropolis of the Arabs — or, as Zonaras relates, bishop of the Roman Port [Portus] and a martyr — a man most learned in the divine scriptures, and (as far as appears from his fragments) most studious of allegories. He wrote many, and almost incredible, Greek volumes upon the sacred scriptures: so that that Ambrose, whom Jerome calls Ἐργοδιώκτην [ergodioktes], that is, One who urges on the work [a taskmaster], exhorted, and in a manner impelled, Origen to write commentaries on the sacred letters after the imitation of Hippolytus — furnishing him with papers, parchments, seven secretaries and as many girls most swift in writing, and an equal number of copyists, at his own expense, and demanding of him a new work every day. Whence it came about that these two most famous men, in a certain generous contest, strove with all their might, each to surpass the other in the publishing of books. Hippolytus, then, wrote:

- On Genesis, complete commentaries: of which Jerome, in Question 3 to Damasus, cites a testimony from the exposition of chapter 27.

• Likewise, on the Hexaemeron, separately, one book.

• On Exodus, one book.

• On Numbers, one book.

• On the beginning of the book of Kings, sermon 1 — cited by Theodoret in the Polymorphus [Eranistes].

• Treatises on the Psalter, out of which Theodoret in the Polymorphus places fragments from the exposition of Psalm 2, 22, and 23.

• On the Proverbs of Solomon, one book.

• On Ecclesiastes, one book.

• On the Song of Songs, one book.

• On a part of Ezekiel, one book.

• On Zechariah, one book.

• On Matthew, one book.

• On the Apocalypse, one book.

There were found in recent years at Basel certain commentaries on the Apocalypse, inscribed to Hippolytus, concerning which there is doubt, on account of the poverty of their erudition and style. He flourished under Alexander Severus, in the year of the Lord 220.

He is cited in many commentaries, both Greek and Latin, as Hippolytus, bishop of Rome; but in some, as Hippolytus, of Rome, or simply the Roman — whom some suspect to be another Hippolytus, different from this one, and to have written in Latin, because Jerome, in the epistle to Magnus the orator of Rome, reckons a certain Hippolytus, a senator of the city of Rome, among the most learned writers of the Church.

Honorius [Honorius of Autun], presbyter of the Church of Autun, assiduously versed in the divine volumes and imbued with all the liberal arts, wrote in Latin and eloquent speech, on the Hexaemeron, one book; on the Psalter, one book; on the Song of Songs, one book, which begins In the beginnings of the books. He flourished under the Emperor Henry V, in the year of the Lord 1120.

Hubert Leonard [Hubertus Leonardus], bishop of Darién — a Carmelite, once moderator of the Theological School at Paris, and inquisitor of heretical depravity — wrote, according to the custom of his school, on the Gospel of Luke, one book. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1490.

Ubertine of Casale [Ubertino da Casale], of the Order of Minors [Franciscan], a pious man and a student of the divine scripture, when he saw his order falling away from its first institution, began certain new separations under the appearance of a reformation, and obtained that they be confirmed by the Supreme Pontiff; which then, at the petition of the Ministers of the same order, were revoked by the same Pope, because they seemed undertaken to the grave scandal and schism of the order. Whence, moved [by this], Ubertine, having entered the Order of the Carthusians, wrote to all the faithful of Christ a commentary on the Apocalypse, which he entitled On the Seven States of the Church, according to the seven visions of Blessed John in the Apocalypse — in which he is thought, by some professors of his order, to have written certain things by a prophetic spirit. The beginning of the work is To all the truly faithful of Christ Jesus. He flourished under the Emperor Albert, in the year of the Lord 1300.

Hubert Leonard, a Carmelite, bishop of Darién, wrote on the Gospel of Luke, 1 book. He flourished in the year 1490. [This entry duplicates the Hubert Leonard notice above — so printed.]

Hugh [Hugh of St-Cher], of Saint-Cher [Carensis] — either from the town of St. Cher, or of St. Theodoric — bishop of Barcelona, by profession a Dominican, cardinal-presbyter of the title of St. Sabina, the first from the Order of Preachers to be raised to the Cardinalate;[1] a man distinguished for holiness of morals and abundance of letters — whom Humbert of Vienne [Humbert of Romans], the fifth Master General of the Order of Preachers, his hearer and disciple, drew from the Academy of secular disciplines to the institute of his religion. And a little after, Pope Innocent IV, greatly delighted with his sweet and erudite familiarity, co-opted him into the college of Cardinals, and sent him as legate into Germany to the Electors of the Empire, that at his persuasion they might substitute, in place of the deposed Frederick II, another Emperor. This man published many works: of which there are commentaries on the whole Scripture according to the fourfold sense, written in the scholastic (that is, brief, bare, and worn) speech, without any paint of secular eloquence, beginning — after the manner of the Scholastics — from various sentences of the divine Scripture; their beginnings, as being known to all, I omit for brevity's sake.

And after these commentaries, he first of all devised a great index upon the sacrosanct Bible, entitled Concordances of the Bible[2] — a most laborious work indeed, of immense tedium and time, but greatly necessary to the students of the sacred volumes; in which he arranged, with most accurate diligence, the several declinable words of the divine scripture according to the sequence of the letters, noting not only the books, but also the chapters of the books, and the lines of the chapters, in which each desired word was contained. There are those who think that this work — on account of the immense expenditure of time and labor, for which the life of one man could not suffice — was, at Hugh's urging, enjoined upon five hundred zealous fathers of various monasteries, on this plan: that each should reduce individual words into Alphabetical classes; and so, in a short time, by the diligence of many, [→ p269]

[Letter H — the Hugh entries, continued from p268:]

...[and so, in a short time, by the diligence of many,] the work was completed. Which we have afterward seen most diligently imitated, both by the Greeks and by the Hebrews — by the work of Rabbi Isaac Nathan the Jew, and of Euthalius the Rhodian monk: of whom the former collected the Hebrew concordances of the Bible, the latter the Greek. These [Greek ones] we saw at Rome, written by a Greek hand on ancient parchments; but those [Hebrew ones], printed at Venice from the press of Giustiniani. He flourished under the Emperor Frederick II, and died at Lyons in the year of the Lord 1262, and there obtained a tomb in the church of the Preachers.

Hugh of St. Neot [de sancto Neoto], a Carmelite, published on the Gospel of Luke, 1 book. He died in the year 1340.

Hugh Virley [de Virley], an Englishman, a Carmelite, professed of the monastery of Norwich, published commentaries on Matthew in the year of the Lord 1344.

Hugh Victorinus [Hugh of St. Victor], or of St. Victor, a Saxon by nation, a Canon of the Augustinian institute, Abbot of the monastery of Blessed Victor at Paris, a man most illustrious for the exquisite erudition of divine and human letters, and so great an emulator of Augustine's doctrine and phrase that he was called, by the common byword of the learned of his time, the Tongue of Augustine. This man gathered, from the reading of the old fathers — and especially of Augustine — upon the whole body of the divine Scripture, a great number of little works, divided into five classes, that is, into Annotations, Questions, Homilies,

Commentaries, and Miscellanies. Of whose number, those which embrace almost universally the explanation of the whole divine scripture are these, namely:

• On all the books of the Old Testament, nine books of Allegories. [beginning] Whoever, by wisdom.

• From both Testaments, five books of Miscellanies. [beginning] The spiritual man judges.

• On the sacred scriptures and writers, one book, in which he discussed, in a beautiful order: On the excellence and usefulness of sacred scripture; On its matter and its difference from the other sciences; On its threefold understanding; On the order, number, and authority of its books; On the writers of the sacred books; On the translators of scripture and its restorers; On the Apocryphal Scriptures; On the mystical places, times, and numbers of Scripture; and On the difficulties contained in scripture. The beginning of the book is [To] the reader of the divine scriptures.

• The same composed, for the sake of Raynerius the convert, three books On the Animals and Plants which are read in the scriptures, and their mystical significations — bringing great utility to those who approach the spiritual senses of scripture. The book begins, At the petitions of your desire.

• On the Pentateuch, five books of Annotations according to the literal sense, whose beginning is Desiderius is a proper name.

• On the four books of Kings, one book of literal Annotations.

• On the various verses of almost all the Psalms, one book of Annotations, both according to the literal and the spiritual sense; to which he made the beginning, Certain things, to you, dearest brother.

• Likewise, on the first four chapters of Ecclesiastes, 19 Homilies. [beginning] Which things, from the book of Solomon, etc.

• On the Song of Songs, mystically, 1 book. [beginning] In the beginning of the work.

• On the Threni [Lamentations], one book of Annotations according to the four senses.

• On Ezekiel, 1 book.

• On Joel, one book of Annotations according to the fourfold sense.

• On Abdias [Obadiah], one book of Annotations.

• On Matthew, one book of Allegories. [beginning] Jesus, seeing the crowds.

• On Mark, one book of Allegories. [beginning] Jesus entered into the synagogue.

• On Luke, one book of Allegories. [beginning] This matter.

• On John, one book of Annotations to the letter. [beginning] Among all the scriptures.

• On John, one book of Allegories. [beginning] The first parents.

• On all the epistles of Paul, four books of Questions and Decisions, whose beginning is Paul, an appellative name.

• Likewise, on the epistle to the Romans, 1 book. [beginning] God made all things.

He flourished under the Emperor Henry V, in the year of the Lord 1130.

I

James [Jacobus] the Englishman, by name and nation, wrote on the Song of Solomon. He lived in the year of the Lord 1270.

James [Jaime Pérez de Valencia], bishop of Christopolis, a Spaniard by nation, of Valencia by fatherland, of the Order of the Hermits of St. Augustine a most observant follower, copiously imbued with human and divine letters, published on all the Psalms of David a huge and prolix volume of the scholastic kind of explanation — full of allegorical and anagogical senses, and abounding in many digressions of the various sciences — which he dedicated to Rodrigo Borgia, Cardinal of Valencia, bishop of Portus. Its beginning is I will open in parables. He wrote also on the Song of Songs, one book; on the ferial Canticles; and on the Canticle of Zechariah, of Mary, and of Simeon, one book. He flourished under the Emperor Frederick III, in the year of the Lord 1490.

James [the Apostle], the brother of the Lord according to the flesh, first of all applied an interpretation and exposition to the Gospel of Matthew — which was written in Hebrew by Matthew himself, and published at Jerusalem. Athanasius, in the Synopsis, is witness.

James Furnius, a Genoese, a distinguished jurisconsult, translated Psalm 119 [the great acrostic psalm; Vulgate 118] into Greek and Latin verse, after the likeness of the Hebrew verses; of which, as the several octonaries [eight-line stanzas] contain eight verses, beginning from one letter according to the order of the alphabet, so the Greek and Latin octonaries have as many verses, beginning from the same letter, in this manner:

A. [Aleph]

Ἂν ἂδ′ ἄμωμοι μάκαρες βάντες ἐν νόμῳ θεοῦ.

ἁπάσαις φρεσὶ Ὅσια μάρτυροι ἰχνεύοντες ὄλβιοι.

Then the Latin octonary, also acrostic on A [Aleph]:

Blessed is whoever walks in the law of the Lord, and follows His commands with a steadfast heart,

[who] with a right mind turns aside from crooked ways —

the straight ones. O God, which you have given, so greatly to be kept:

yet to your commandments let my will be ready.

By me, O Father, in loving you may I never be confounded, and, joined to your law, I will confess you with my heart:

but do you not forsake me, who hold fast to your words.

He flourished in the year of the Lord 1500.

James [Jacobus de Voragine], archbishop of Genoa, of the Order of Preachers, from the town of Varazze [Varagine], which is situated on the maritime coast of Liguria not far from Genoa — a man of much and varied reading, wonderfully eloquent in his own tongue, and celebrated in the opinion of all in sacred preaching, also no contemptible writer of histories, and so studious of the volumes of Augustine that he held almost all of them in memory — first of all men translated the divine volumes of both Instruments [Testaments] into the Italian tongue, with the utmost fidelity and diligence. He flourished under the Emperor Adolf, in the year of the Lord 1290.

James Goeuschelius of Winterthur [Vitodurensis] wrote On the tropes, figures, and idioms of the divine scripture, one book, in the year of the Lord 1536.

James of Lausanne [Jacobus Lausannensis], a Dominican, bishop of an uncertain city, distinguished for the knowledge of divine and human things, and most celebrated for the fame of his ecclesiastical preaching, wrote in scholastic speech very many commentaries on the sacred letters — of which, at Venice, in the library of St. John and Paul [Santi Giovanni e Paolo], I read the below-written:

- On the Pentateuch, five books. [beginning] In the beginning [God] created.
- On Job, one book. [beginning] You have heard of the endurance of Job.
- On Proverbs, one book. [beginning] I will open in parables.
- On the Song of Songs, one book. [beginning] About the beginning of this book.
- On Wisdom, one book. [beginning] Wisdom cries out.
- On Ecclesiasticus, one book. [beginning] This book is divided.
- On Isaiah, one book. [beginning] It is not good.

He flourished under the Emperor Wenceslas, in the year 1390.

James of Logenhagen [Jacobus a Logenhagen] wrote Annotations on the Canonical Epistle of St. James, printed at Louvain in the year 1572. [Later-edition addition — the Louvain 1572 printing postdates Sixtus's 1569 death; not in the 1566 original.] Likewise a Commentary on the Gospel of St. Luke, collected from all the works of St. Augustine.

James López de Zúñiga [Lopis Stunica] composed two books in defense of the Vulgate edition of the New Testament — the former against Erasmus, the latter against James Faber Stapulensis [Lefèvre d'Étaples], bishop of Vienne. He flourished in the year 1530.

James of Lausanne [de Lusanna], of the Order of Preachers, wrote a Commentary on Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy. [This appears to overlap the "James of Lausanne" entry above (both a Dominican of Lausanne); so printed as two notices.]

James, surnamed Magnus [the Great], of Toledo by fatherland, a follower of the Eremite [Augustinian] order, vehemently exercised in the wrestling-school of scholastic discipline, much renowned, illustrious for the science of natural philosophy, and a distinguished interpreter of the sacred letters, adorned the whole Bible with annotations. He flourished under the Emperor Wenceslas, in the year of the Lord 1400.

James Martin, a Frenchman [Jacobus Martinus, Gallus], in the year of the Lord 1536 published a noble volume, dedicated by himself to Michael, bishop of Langres — in which are briefly contained all the Tropologies and Allegories of Origen Adamantius on the Heptateuch, selected by an uncertain but erudite author, and arranged into seven books. The beginning of the work is In the beginning, etc.; Because our inner man.

James Nacchianti [Jacobus Naclantus], bishop of Chioggia [Clodiensis], of the Order of Preachers, the most celebrated philosopher and theologian of his time, wrote to Pope Julius III pious and learned enarrations on Paul's epistle to the Romans and to the Ephesians, in a brief, clear, and elegant style, in which he inserted and expounded — according to sacred scripture and the orthodox faith — almost all the difficulties of Christian piety. We have also read a work of his most useful for the understanding of the divine volumes, whose title is The Marrow of Sacred Scripture; likewise an explanation on the ninetieth psalm, expounded as a sermon; likewise Theological Theorems. He flourished under Pope Julius III, in the year of the Lord 1554.

James Paniscotius of Molfetta [Malfetanus], a Minorite of the regular observance, professor of Theology and of the sacred letters, wrote a prolix work on the exposition of the fourteenth psalm, published as an interrupted dialogue between Solomon questioning and David answering — in which many things are made manifest, most useful and necessary to all the faithful. Its beginning is When the compass of the heavens. He flourished in the year 1550.

James Sadoleto [Jacopo Sadoleto], bishop of Carpentras [Carpentoractensis] in Gaul, and Cardinal of the Roman Church, a man plainly learned and a most happy imitator of the Ciceronian style, wrote to Matthew Giberti, bishop of Verona, pious explanations on three psalms — namely 50, 93, and 95 — of which the first begins David [son] of Jesse of Bethlehem, the second Many and grave things press upon [me]. Likewise, on the epistle to the Romans (translated by himself into Latin), eloquent commentaries — of a continuous Collation, or of a continuing dialogue, to Francis, king of the French — arranged into three volumes, whose beginning is Often, as I ponder. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1530.

James Sannazaro [Jacopo Sannazaro], a Neapolitan patrician, who is also [called] Actius Sincerus Parthenopaeus, a man born under a most happy star to illustrate the sacrosanct poetry of Christians, wrote on the second chapter of Luke, On the Virgin Birth, three books in heroic verse — so displaying the Virgilian brightness and sublimity that you would think you were reading and hearing Virgil himself. The beginning of the work is Of the Virgin's childbirth, and of the great [offspring born] to a virgin parent, I sing. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1530.

James Schoepper [Jacobus Schoepperus], a distinguished professor of divine Theology, and an eloquent preacher, delivered sermons to the people of the city of Dortmund [Tremonia] upon the Gospels which are read on the several feast-days — both of the Saints and of the Season — which he himself afterward wrote out in an elegant method and a most succinct style, and re[duced] into three volumes. James Tralensis [Jacobus Tralensis], a German, moderator of the school of Theologians at the renowned city of Cologne, the most noble Theologian and Philosopher of his time, worked out one book of scholastic exposition on the Apocalypse of John, whose beginning is Jacob saw in a dream. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1480.

Janus Vitalis [Giano Vitale], polished in the more elegant letters, wrote on the fiftieth psalm an elegant commentary, beginning When David's army. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1550.

Of an uncertain, but ancient, author a Latin treatise, not yet printed, is kept by the Academicians of the Venetian Academy, entitled On the Theological Poetry of David: in which it is shown how the royal prophet David, in setting forth the divine praises and expressing the affections of his most ardent heart pertaining to the salvation of the soul, left the other poets as far behind him as the divine spirit surpasses all the force of human genius.

Innocent [Innocent III], Supreme Pontiff, the third of that name, a Campanian by nation, of Anagni by fatherland, from his childhood imbued with the best studies in the most celebrated Academy of Paris, celebrated for erudition and holiness of life; after Pope Celestine III — by the common consent of all the Cardinals, although he was the younger among them — raised, at God's nod, to the supreme honor of the pontificate, wrote out many things on the divine Scriptures. Of these I have read learned and holy commentaries on the seven penitential psalms, worked out in the Scholastic manner but in a more conspicuous and ornate speech, in which he reduced the scholastic divisions and distinctions to a fixed number, without any tedium of superfluous multiplication and repetition; and he prudently accommodates the frequent testimonies of the holy scriptures to their places, without any harshness of forcing [the text], mingling among these many pious and sweet little meditations and prayers, by which he kindles the reader's mind with sweet affections. The work has this beginning: Lest, amid manifold occupations, etc. He also published certain sermons to the clergy and people — now in the Latin, now in the Italian tongue — in the Lateran church; which, edited into one volume in Latin, he dedicated to Arnulph, abbot of the Cistercian order. The work begins The prophetic authority teaches. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1200.

Innocent V [Pope], formerly called Peter of Tarentaise — which is now a town of the Helvetii [Swiss][1] — of the Order of Preachers, sat in the supreme pontificate, according to the number of his name, only five months; a man certainly most learned in the divine scriptures, and nobly instructed in Aristotelian philosophy, who taught Scholastic Theology for many years in the school of Paris with distinction. He reduced all the works of St. Thomas [Aquinas] into an epitome, and acquired great praise for his erudition. He wrote on the sacrosanct Bible various lectures in the scholastic manner — but especially one book of a lecture on the Song of Songs; on all the epistles of Paul, 14 books, [beginning] A vessel of election. In the Dominican Library at Bologna is seen a Postil of his on the whole of Paul, in manuscript, whose beginning is Your lightnings shone. He flourished under the Emperor Rudolf, in the year 1275.

Joachim [of Fiore], abbot of the monastery of Fiore [Florensis] of the Order of St. Benedict, sprung from Calabria, a man studious and practiced in the divine scriptures, and in his time believed to be a most true prophet, wrote to Brother Rainerius of Ponza, on the whole prophet Isaiah, in a rude and obscure style, one book of commentaries — in which he discoursed on many things concerning the seven times [ages] of the Church, and concerning the burdens of the sixth time, as if foreknowing the future; mingling in many prophecies and predictions concerning future times — whether these have been fulfilled, or are still to be fulfilled, let others see. The work begins If [we come] to this center of the mystical wheels. He wrote also, to the Emperor Henry, on Jeremiah and on Daniel, commentaries of the same kind; likewise on the gospel of John. He wrote also five books On the Concord of the Old and New Testament, in which he shows that the times of both Testaments so agree that nothing was done in the Old Testament which is not equally done in the New — or done, or to be done, in the last days. The work begins Because of the falling and perishing age, etc. He flourished under the Emperor Henry VI, in the year of the Lord 1200.

John [Ioannes], abbot of the monastery of Nivelles [Nivicellensis], a Theologian distinguished among the scholastics, most learned in pontifical [canon] law, and consummate in the sacred letters by long practice, wrote a work whose title is The Concordance of the Bible and of the Canons: in which, according to the order of the divine books, he gathered from both Testaments all the passages with which the canons and decrees of the holy pontiffs agree, and set beside them the corresponding places of the canons. The work begins In the beginning God created, etc. He flourished under Pope Pius II, in the year 1460.

John Adamarius Lorichius [Johann Lorich] illustrated the book of the Wisdom of Sirach with a metrical paraphrase, in the year of the Lord 1540.

John Alcock [Alcoch], an Englishman, bishop of Ely [Eliensis], wrote on the seven penitential psalms, in the year of the Lord 1490.

John of Alerio [de Alerio], a Toulousan by nation, a Carmelite, the thirteenth Prior General of his order, studious and erudite in the divine Scriptures, and no less venerable for fervor of religion than for erudition, published one book of a scholastic lecture on Ecclesiasticus. He flourished under the Emperor Charles IV, in the year of the Lord 1348.

John Annius [of Viterbo], an Italian by nation, of Viterbo by fatherland, a professor of the Order of Preachers, an eminent Theologian, most celebrated for a most exact knowledge of all histories — as many as there are and have been — a most excellent antiquary, and an admirable investigator and discoverer of all the most ancient things, whose accurate commentaries on Berosus the Babylonian, Methasthenes the Persian, Manetho the Egyptian, and many other historians of the most ancient antiquity are extant. He wrote commentaries on the Psalter, of which he himself makes mention [in] the Chronography of Philo [→ p272]

...expounding the Chronography of Philo. He also published one book of Questions on the Apocalypse, which he sent and dedicated to Sixtus IV, Pontiff, and to the Christian kings — showing in it that that Beast, described especially in the thirteenth chapter of the Apocalypse (which the commentators commonly interpret as Antichrist), is the pseudo-prophet Muhammad; who, although he died very many years ago, yet his sect lives even now, and rages excessively against the people of God, and it will last so long, until — according to the seventh chapter of Daniel — the kingdom is given to the people of the saints of the Most High, that is, to the Christians. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1460.

John Arundineus [Ioannes Arundineus], a German, of the Order of Carmelites, bishop of Usbita [Usbitensis], a man most practiced in the divine volumes, not ignorant of secular philosophy, and a preacher of most celebrated reputation, published scholastic Lectures on the book of Wisdom, on Psalm 118, and on the epistle to the Romans — lectures earlier expounded by himself in public readings — in the year of the Lord 1490.

John Arboreus [Jean Arboreus], of Laon, a doctor, Theologian of the Sorbonne Academy of Paris, a most learned and truly Catholic man, published a huge volume divided into nineteen books, inscribed with the title THEOSOPHIA, that is, Of Divine Wisdom: in which — after the custom of the school, in an open and not uncultivated style — he explained the most difficult passages both of the Old and of the New Testament, discussing and examining the various opinions and controversies of the sacred doctors upon those passages, and destroying many machinations of the heretics with strong blows of argumentation. He arranged the Assertions of his work in alphabetical order, so that they might be more easily found. Its beginning is thus: To the most noble and reverend Cardinal Louis of Bourbon. He wrote also, to Henry [II], king of the French, on Proverbs one book, beginning They profit very much; on Ecclesiastes, to the same, one book, beginning With all [my] effort; on the Song of Songs, one book. He also published commentaries on the four Gospels, in which he discussed the opinions of the sacred doctors and rejected the pernicious assertions of certain interpreters. The beginning of the work is A sacred work to you. He flourished under Charles V, in the year 1550.

John of Abbeville [de Abbatis Villa], archbishop of Besançon, a Frenchman by nation, wrote commentaries on the Song of Solomon, printed at Paris by Ascensius [Josse Bade] in the year of the Lord 1521.

John Bacon [Baconthorpe], an Englishman, of the Order of Carmelites, the prince of the Theologians of his time, and having obtained no ignoble talent in expounding the divine scriptures, expounded the whole New Testament, publishing in the scholastic manner twenty-seven books of commentaries, which are:

- On the Gospel of Matthew, one book.
- On the Gospel of Mark, one book.
- On Luke, one book.
- On John, one book.
- On the Acts of the Apostles, one book.
- On the epistles of Paul, fourteen books.
- On the Canonical epistles, seven books.
- On the Apocalypse, one book.

He flourished under the Emperor Charles IV, in the year of the Lord 1350.

John Balbi [Giovanni Balbi], a Genoese, of the Order of Preachers, author of the Latin dictionary whose title is CATHOLICON, a man imbued with scholastic theology, skilled in the Latin and Greek tongue, wrote — after the scholastic custom — upon the four Evangelists a Postil on the four gospels, which begins Why did God wish there to be not more than four Evangelists? It is had at Genoa, in manuscript, in the library of the Preachers. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1280.

John Baptist Folengo [Giovanni Battista Folengo], of Mantua, a Cassinese monk of St. Benedict, composed and completed commentaries on all the psalms — with the utmost fidelity, wondrous clarity, and pleasing brevity, out of the Hebrew verity itself — in which are together a rare erudition, and an author burning with ardor of spirit, and candor and acuteness of the meanings, and the elegance of Latin speech. Their beginning is The argument of the whole volume. He wrote also clear explanations on all the Catholic epistles. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1550.

John Batmanson [Batmansonus], a Carthusian, wrote on the Proverbs and the Song of Solomon. He met death in the year 1531.

John Beetz [Beetzius], a German, attached to the institute of the Carmelites in the monastery of Tienen [Tenensi], a distinguished Theologian and philosopher, a most keen disputant in the schools of the theologians, and most pleasing to the people in his sermons, published in scholastic phrase one book of a scholastic explanation on the epistle of Paul to the Romans. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1470.

John Benedictus [Jean Benoît], a doctor theologian most celebrated in the Academy of Paris, gathered very brief but most useful scholia — from the holy and ancient fathers cited by name — upon the whole scripture. He flourished under Charles V, in the year 1550.

John Benius [Giovanni Beni], of Verona, a priest educated in the school of John Matthew Giberti, bishop of Verona, wrote in the Italian tongue seventy-seven Discourses, or digressions, on the passion of the Lord, [drawn] from the four Evangelists.

John Bertram [Bertramus], a German of Nuremberg, most excellent in the scholastic disciplines, once public professor of Theology in the Academy of Mainz, wrote a huge volume on the Prologue of the Bible, most copiously embracing all things necessary for an introduction to scripture, which begins As I ponder, etc. He flourished under the Emperor Maximilian, in the year of the Lord 1495.

John of Beverley [Beverlacius], archbishop of York, an Anglo-Saxon by nation, wrote commentaries on the Gospel of Luke, in the year of the Lord 721.

John Buteo [Jean Borrel], a Dauphinois, a Frenchman, a most excellent mathematician, wrote in the year of the Lord 1550, to Cardinal François de Tournon, one most erudite book on the Ark of Noah — of what form and capacity it was — beginning Upon that Ark, the seed-bed of the world.

John Catardus [Giovanni Catardi], of Acquasparta, published an enarration on the prophet Jonah, accommodated to sermons and to Christian consolation, which begins It looks to this; likewise a mystical Paraphrase on the same prophet, whose beginning is Brief indeed. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1550.

[Letter I, continued from p272:]

...[of the Order of] Preachers, [John Christopher] wrote commentaries on Matthew, Mark, Luke, John, and all the epistles of St. Paul. He flourished in the year 1260.

John Cassian [Ioannes Cassianus], a Scythian by nation, a hearer of John Chrysostom, and ordained deacon by him; after some years, departing from him for an uncertain cause, he was consecrated presbyter at Marseilles, where he also founded two monasteries, of men and of women. He wrote, in a plain and balanced speech, on that which the Apostle says — For the good that I would, I do not; but the evil which I would not, [that I do] — a learned and elegant book, which he afterward inserted among the Collations of the holy fathers published by himself, and marked it as the twenty-third book of the Collations. He dies at Marseilles, not without a reputation for sanctity, Theodosius and Valentinian reigning, in the year of the Lord 435.

John Colet [Coletus], an Englishman, wrote commentaries on the Proverbs of Solomon and on the Gospel of Matthew. He met death in the year of the Lord 1519.

John, archbishop of the city of Constantinople, called Chrysostom — that is, golden mouth — for the golden excellence of his speech, an Antiochene by fatherland, and once a presbyter of the church of Antioch, born of the noble parents Secundus and Anthusa; in the studies of eloquence a hearer and disciple of Libanius the Sophist, in philosophy of Andragathius the most illustrious philosopher, and in the divine scriptures of Diodore, bishop of Tarsus;[1] joined in the closest familiarity with Basil and Gregory the Great [Nazianzen]; he published on the holy letters very many volumes, both of commentaries and of homilies. Although of the commentaries, as I think, nothing is extant except a fragment of an exposition on the first eight chapters of Isaiah, and an entire explanation on the epistle to the Galatians.

In his Homilies he used a manner of teaching most suited to the office of an ecclesiastical teacher and to the benefit of his hearers, dividing all his sermons — sometimes into two parts, that is, the Exegetic and the Ethic; but sometimes into three, that is, the Parasceue [Preparation], the Exegetic, and the Ethic. In the Parasceue — that is, the Preparatory part — now commending the argument which he is about to treat, now praising the docility, the numerousness, the eagerness, and the desire of hearing of his hearers, now repeating the things he had said the day before, he prepares the minds of his hearers for the things that are to be said, with pleasant and often chance [extempore] exordia — but sometimes longer than the eager hearer would wish, who is impatient of all delay and hastens to the understanding of the proposed reading. Which Chrysostom himself, perceiving, excuses in the preface of a sermon, On bearing reproofs, saying: Certain of our friends reprove us, that we make the beginnings of our sermons rather long: to whom, whether they censure us unjustly or pass judgment justly, we are grateful for this reproof.

In the second part of the homily, which is called the Exegetic — that is, the Expository — Chrysostom is occupied in the explanation of the divine Scripture according to the historical, or literal, understanding, which he always lays down as a foundation; and he expounds it so purely, openly, genuinely, rightly, and aptly, as no other does — weighing each and every word of the Scripture cited, and illustrating them with clear paraphrases, and never, out of ignorance of the historical sense, does he either wrench the letter too harshly, or, leaving it, take refuge in certain far-fetched allegories (to which Jerome and Augustine are not ashamed to confess that they were sometimes driven by a lack of historical understanding); but, continually persisting in the true and proper sense of the letter, after the imitation of Eusebius of Emesa the bishop, and of Diodore of Tarsus the bishop (whom he chiefly follows in explaining the sacred volumes), he so abstains from allegorical wrappings that in all his explanations you would not find allegories, or anagogies (which are the same among them), except in a few and quite settled places, in which the most urgent necessity of the divine Scripture vehemently demands it.[2]

He expounds, moreover, in almost every homily, the common translation of his own times, pieced together from the versions of the Seventy interpreters, of Aquila, of Symmachus, and of Theodotion. Whence he often explains many passages of the Old Scripture otherwise than they are now read in our Vulgate codices.

Curious Questions, useless for the edification of the people, the battles of disputations, and conflicts about subtle and obscure matters, he avoids with the utmost care; and the things which some expositors in the divine letters are wont, for the ostentation of erudition — an occasion of disputing being sought — to obscure on purpose with many and great difficulties of doubts, he himself is wont to expedite in a few bare and simple words. Of which quality we can take some, even a slight, taste — for example, from his elucidation of that saying of Paul to the Romans: It is not of him that wills, nor of him that runs, but of God that shows mercy.[3] Which, whereas the most acute Augustine involves in many subtle and abstruse disputations concerning Predestination and Reprobation, concerning Grace and Free Will, Chrysostom releases himself from all the windings of the questions in almost two words — saying, first, that this saying was brought forward by Paul not from the person of one affirming, but from the person of one objecting; then, that the Apostle's saying is thus to be understood: that when he says It is not of him that wills, nor of him that runs, we should understand only [the word] alone, together with but of God that shows mercy — and rather [chiefly of Him]. For that whose part is the more powerful and greater in any business, we say the whole business is his.

But if it sometimes happens that Chrysostom falls upon some difficulty not to be dissembled, but necessarily to be discussed, he does not approach it before he shows that he has neither found the occasion of that disputation, nor, having found it, taken it up of his own accord, but that — compelled by the perfidy of the heretics — he descends into it to refute their calumnies, accommodating himself by this dexterity to the weakness of the unlearned multitude. In which, although there were some who could understand even higher disputations, yet very many were present who could not grasp the subtlety of doctrine — as being unlearned men, and craftsmen, and [people] occupied with mean business, and women little practiced in such disciplines, and a crowd of boys, and old men advanced in age, who all were to be instructed and refreshed with easy speech. Sometimes, however, to shake off the torpor of his hearers, he proposes certain little questions of no very great moment; and these, on purpose, [→ p274]

Running head: LIBER QVARTVS.)*

[Letter I — St. John Chrysostom, continued from p273:]

...on purpose leaving [them] unresolved, he immediately adds this: But WHY, and how this is so, I leave to you to investigate. For it is not fitting that you learn everything from us, but that you yourselves also labor and search out, lest you become the more sluggish. And these things Chrysostom perpetually keeps in the second part of his homilies.

In the third part, which is always the Ethic, or moral, [part], he digresses not only to those ethical Topics common to all who speak in a sermon — namely, on the contempt of riches, on luxury, drunkenness, anger, arrogance, and the other vices to be shunned — but he expatiates very often on certain select paradoxes of moral instruction, peculiar to himself alone, of which these are the chief:[1]

- That virtue is neither a burdensome thing, nor difficult to acquire.
- That it is much easier to live well than badly.
- That small and light sins are to be avoided with greater care than great ones.
- That there is no punishment more dreadful than a bad conscience.
- That no one can be harmed except by himself.
- That it is better to suffer injury than to inflict it.
- That many harm unjustly, but no one is unjustly harmed.
- That the ignominy of this world is glory, but the glory of the world is ignominy.
- That this life is not life, but death.
- That death is better than life.
- That the greatest gain is made in tribulations and temptations.
- That all the punishments sent by God upon mortals are great benefits of divine mercy.
- That almsgiving is the most profitable of all arts.
- That the advantages of solitude and of the monastic life are preferable to all felicities.
- That to be deprived of the kingdom of God is worse than the punishment of Gehenna.
- That to be unwilling to know all things is the highest wisdom.

• That we can demonstrate the divinity of Christ most clearly and most strongly, against all the nations, even without any testimonies of the divine letters.

With these and such-like truly golden digressions, inflaming the minds of his hearers in a wondrous manner, seizing [them], raising [them] up into the love of divine things, and transforming [them], lifted up, into God — he finally concludes all his sermons in brief prayers, thanksgivings, and praises of the kindness and mercy of Christ, to whom, together with the Father and the Holy Spirit, he prays there be honor, glory, and empire unto the ages, Amen. But although in almost all his homilies he inculcates the same moral topics, often repeated, yet he treats and re-treats the same thoughts with such variety of words and sentences that he always seems to say new and diverse things. Thus far the manner of teaching peculiar to Chrysostom.

But as for the manner of the words and the kind of diction, all attribute to him the native, plain, and graceful purity of Attic speech, joined with an admirable facility of teaching — such as never fell to the lot even of the most eloquent of the Greeks.[2] His disciple Isidore, Abbot of the Pelusian mountain [Isidore of Pelusium], describing this in an epistle to Ophelius the Grammarian, thus speaks: John's tongue, and the grace of his diction, I do not compare with others (for that perhaps would be a small thing with many), but with Libanius himself, who is held by all the most illustrious in eloquence. That [John's diction] was a matter of great admiration to Libanius, the epistle of Libanius himself is a proof — written to him [John], while yet a young man, when he had delivered an oration in praise of the Emperors.[3] It runs thus:

LIBANIUS TO JOHN.

> I have received your oration, long and beautiful, and I read it to men who themselves also compose orations. There was none among them who did not leap up and cry out, and do all those things which men are wont to do when overwhelmed with amazement. This delights me, that you have preferred to bring to this kind of oration the art of speaking which you could have displayed in pleading causes in the forum; and I judge you blessed, who have been able to adorn princes with such great praises; nor do I think those princes less fortunate, that they have obtained such a eulogist. Thus Libanius.

Plutarch, moreover, judges that a clear and easy oration is truly and genuinely Attic. For thus, says he, the ancient orators spoke. But Gorgias of Leontini was the first to introduce the vice of ambition and ostentation into civil orations — which vice also often befalls the admirable Plato. But if Plutarch is to be believed in this matter, John surpasses all the other illustrious orators in many ways — who, in his orations, so recalls the Atticism and retains the perspicuity of speech that I do not know whether anyone else retains it more. Thus far Isidore.

Agreeing with whom, Anianus, a very ancient interpreter [translator] of Chrysostom, praises in him an even moderation of speaking, gently and spontaneously flowing of its own accord — thus writing to Bishop Orontius:

> Chrysostom keeps this, as it were, peculiar and proper to himself: that although he is always solicitous, always watchful, and an enemy of harmful dullness, yet nowhere is his oration lifted up into the pomp of the speaker, but the whole is fitted to the benefit of the hearer. For his very style is accommodated to the ears of the Church, expressing that ancient but erudite kind of speaking — middling, even, mature, modest, foreign to all fault of carelessness and of pomp and of luxuriance; not squalid indeed, nor yet flowery; not unpolished, but neither filed down with excessive subtlety; not rough with harshness, nor yet wanton with charm — showing everywhere the greatest abundance and an admirable faculty, yet nowhere an ambition of speaking. Hence it comes that the simple reader understands him the more, and the eloquent reader praises him. In short, you would easily perceive that admirable care of speaking of St. Basil, and the applauded pomp of [John of] Antioch, and that sublime buskin of Gregory, surpassed by this middle-quality of John. Only the ears of the very young are perhaps less sweetly soothed by him — [ears] which, being set in the school of letters, are not so much pleased by solid things as by painted ones; who follow rather the beautiful than the useful, and love not so much the effective as the sonorous, and rejoice more to be besprinkled with the charm of flowers than to be nourished by the abundance of fruits. Thus Anianus.

Chrysostom is also wont (as appears in his writings) to abound, above all ecclesiastical writers, in similes, comparisons, and metaphors — fitted together, for the illustration and delight of the matters to be explained, with admirable artifice. Yet nowhere, for the sake of delighting, does he use either the subtleties of sentences, as Ambrose, or the allurements of the poets and the wit of the mimes, as Jerome, or jests and jokes, as Tertullian; but rather, by the affection of fatherly charity and by a certain pious zeal of helping, he wonderfully delights his hear[ers, whom] [→ p275]

[Letter I — St. John Chrysostom, continued from p274:]

...[he delights his hear]ers, whom — that he may hold them with greater attention — he interrupts the course of his oration with frequent dialogisms, little questionings, and little exercises,[1] often repeating expressions of this kind:

> What then is this? For what reason are these things said? Have you heard what he said here? Have you seen how he enjoins nothing burdensome? You have seen his self-controlled mind; have you heard his confidence? Hear also his immense charity. Have you perceived the loftiness of his philosophy? Behold his faith. Consider, I pray, the virtue of the man. Do you see how very easy this is? Ponder, I beseech you, these words. Observe that these things are not said simply and at random. Oh, what doctrine is this, and how necessary it is to all mortals! Oh, how full of good things is this sentence! We have need of great prudence and attention in these words. Consider for me, O beloved, those blessed men. Learn here how great virtue is. Where now are they who deride these things? Let those who do not believe hear these things. I would that all were here who blame our words. Gladly would I ask those who do not believe these things, whether… etc. Let not the things you hear disturb you, O beloved; wonder, beloved, that he said this. Do not tell me that you do not understand these things. Come, let us consider this also. What I am always wont to say, that I will not cease to inculcate now also.

By which figures [tropes], renewing attention, he rouses the slow, helps the weary, and sustains [them] up to the end of the oration. And let these things said concerning Chrysostom's doctrine and manner of oration be enough.

But concerning the number of his lucubrations [writings], Nicephorus Callistus testifies that he read a thousand books.[2] Suidas affirms that he wrote out so many volumes that it is not even possible to review them by counting. But we, passing over the exoteric writings, will review only the exegetical works which pertain to the explanation of the Scriptures — in two separate catalogs: of which the former will contain the truly genuine and legitimate writings of Chrysostom, but the latter will indicate his pseudepigraphal works — that is, those which are attributed to Chrysostom under the title of a false inscription.

OF THE WORKS WHICH, WITHOUT ANY CONTROVERSY, ARE BELIEVED TO BE CHRYSOSTOM'S. THE FIRST CATALOG.

On Genesis he wrote 67 homilies of a continuous and complete enarration, delivered to the people of Constantinople in the time of the Lenten fast, of which the first begins χαίρω μὲν καὶ εὐφραίνομαι ὁρῶν σήμερον τὴν τοῦ θεοῦ ἐκκλησίαν — that is, I rejoice and am glad, seeing today this Church of God. Concerning these, Photius, patriarch of Constantinople, in the book whose title is Myriobiblos [the Bibliotheca], left it thus written:

> Some accuse the divine John, that in his exegesis of Genesis — and especially in those homilies in which he narrated the work of the six days — he is too simple, and altogether destitute of all those speculations in which Origen, Hippolytus, Eusebius, Basil, and the others most learned of our holy fathers especially abound. Who indeed do not seem to me to grasp John's mind. For he, looking to the simplicity of the Mosaic narration, and leaving aside untimely speculations, chose rather to follow Moses in facility and humility of speech — [Moses] who, writing on the creation of the world, resolved not (as some think, foolishly enough) to discourse of the most obscure matters and in the most obscure words, but wished to set before the eyes of a rude and dull people, most simply and most clearly, only those things which could be grasped by the coarse understanding of the multitude. As John himself indicated, in his explanation of the Hexaemeron, in these words: "Moses, in the exordia of his narrations, accommodating himself to our smallness, discoursed nothing concerning the invisible Virtues; for he did not say, 'In the beginning God made the Angels and Archangels,' but 'Heaven and earth' — because in the first beginnings and preludes he spoke, in a coarser way, to the Jews, who wholly gaped after present things, and could comprehend nothing spiritual. And so he leads them, from sensible things and creatures, to the knowledge of the Creator of the universe. For it was not fitting that those should be fed with solid food, who still had need of the nourishment of milk. For just as the teachers of letters imbue little boys — taken from their mother's lap, and ignorant and incapable of all things — with the first elements only, and then hand them over to other teachers who instruct them in more perfect disciplines: so Moses imbued the nature of men, ignorant of all things and rude and (so to speak) but lately weaned from milk, with the first elements of divine knowledge, preparing it for more excellent teachers — namely Paul and John, who lead the boys, imbued with the first rudiments, to greater and loftier things, superimposing now, upon the foundation already laid, the lofty summits of the whole edifice." Thus he.

Chrysostom also published, besides these homilies, again 19 homilies on various passages of the Octateuch, namely:

• On Genesis chapter 1, On the beginning of Genesis, 1 homily, which begins Pleasant indeed to sailors.

• On the same, On the beginning of Genesis, 1 homily, [beginning] Many things indeed.

• On the same, Why are men harmed by beasts, since God wished them to be subject to man? 1 homily — from which St. Augustine, in Book 1 against Julian, brings forth a testimony concerning original sin, against the Pelagians.

• On Genesis 3, On God, walking in paradise, 1 homily, [beginning] You heard before.

• On Genesis 11 [printed "1"], On the confusion of tongues, 1 homily — from which Theodoret recites a fragment in the dialogue entitled Inconfusus [the Unconfounded].

• On Genesis 14, On Melchizedek, 1 homily — which Chrysostom mentions in the preface of his enarration on Psalm 41.

• On Genesis 17, On the change of Abraham's name, 1 homily, [beginning] It would not be difficult.

• On Genesis 37, On the continence of Joseph, 1 homily, [beginning] To me indeed always.

• On Leviticus chapter 7, On the priestly vesture, 1 homily, [beginning] The prophets preached the gospel of the kingdom of Christ — whose authority Epiphanius the deacon uses in the Second Synod of Nicaea, session 6.

• On 1 Kings [1 Samuel] chapter 1, On the faith of Hannah, 1 homily, [beginning] No thing indeed.

• On the same, again 1 homily — which Chrysostom mentions in the preface of the preceding homily.

• On the same, On the upbringing of Hannah and Samuel, 1 homily, [beginning] Unless I seem.

• On 1 Kings [1 Samuel] chapter 2, On the beginning of the Canticle of Hannah, 3 homilies, namely: On the first part of the Canticle, My heart is strengthened in the Lord, one homily.

• On the second part of the Canticle, My horn is exalted in the Lord, 1 homily.

• On the third part of the Canticle, My mouth is enlarged over my enemies, 1 homily, [beginning] Who a treasu[re] [→ p276]

Running head: LIBER QVARTVS.)*

[Letter I — St. John Chrysostom, First Catalog continued from p275:]

...[On the third part of the Canticle of Hannah, 1 homily, beginning Who dig for a treasu]re — in which Chrysostom testifies that he [also] wrote a first and a second homily, which are now lacking [lost].

• On 1 Kings [1 Samuel] 13 and the following chapters, 4 homilies, of which the first begins As often as [things] lasting; the second, You indeed; the third, I indeed think; the fourth, Not a little the city.

• On 2 Paralipomenon [Chronicles] 26, upon The heart of Uzziah was lifted up, 2 homilies, of which the first begins Blessed be God, but the second Come, to the exposition concerning Uzziah.

• On Job chapters 1, 2, and 3, 5 homilies, with Lelio Tifernate as translator, of which the first begins A great contender comes to us this day; the second, A great weight of things; the third, Now we all; the fourth, Everywhere indeed; the fifth, Let us therefore propound.

On the whole Psalter he wrote very many homilies, in which — contrary to his custom — he frequently discussed not only the translations of the Seventy, of Aquila, of Symmachus, and of Theodotion, cited by name, but also the Hebrew verity, and the Syriac (or Chaldaic) translation, expressed in Hebrew and Chaldaic words. These homilies, as appears from Suidas, some of the Greeks prefer to all of John's sermons, both for the sublimity of their meanings and for the smoothness and elegance of the oration. There now circulates, among the works of Chrysostom, a volume of homilies (or rather of expositions) on the psalms, woven together from various sermons of different authors, and given a Latin dress by Gentian Hervet; of which, those which are believed to be his own — both from the evidence of the style and from the testimony of the ancient fathers — are only these:

• On the usefulness of the psalms, one homily, [beginning] As by food, life.

• On Psalm 3, 1 homily, [beginning] To the leaders of the army. John Damascene cites its exordium in Book 3 against the Iconoclasts.

• On Psalm 4, 1 homily, [beginning] The prophet does not say these things.

• On Psalm 5, 1 homily, [beginning] Let us see first.

• On Psalm 6, 1 homily, [beginning] When you shall have heard [of] fury and anger.

• On Psalm 7, 1 homily, [beginning] It is fitting indeed.

• On Psalm 8, 1 homily, [beginning] In the previous psalm he had said.

• On Psalm 9, 1 homily, [beginning] This psalm is long.

• On Psalm 10, 1 homily, [beginning] Great are the powers of hope.

• On Psalm 11, 1 homily, [beginning] Virtue is indeed an arduous thing.

• On Psalm 12, 1 homily, [beginning] This is no small good.

• On Psalm 38, upon that text Yet in vain is every living man disquieted, 1 homily, which begins The deep gulf [surrounds] the fisherman.

• On Psalm 41, 1 homily, beginning You indeed will lately admire us. (Theodoret, in the Polymorphus, brings forth a testimony of Chrysostom from the exposition of Psalm 41 which is not found in this homily.)

• On Psalm 43, 1 homily, beginning This psalm the prophet indeed speaks.

• On Psalm 44, 1 homily, [beginning] I would that all the Jews and Gentiles were now present.

• On Psalm 44, upon The queen stood, 1 homily, [beginning] Pleasant indeed is a meadow and a garden.

• On Psalm 45, 1 homily, [beginning] He uses his accustomed philosophy. Euthymius cites this in his commentary on the psalms.

• On Psalm 46, 1 homily, [beginning] This psalm too touches the same argument.

• On Psalm 47, 1 homily, [beginning] This too signifies liberation. Euthymius cites this in his commentary on the psalms.

• On Psalm 48, 1 homily, [beginning] Certain great and secret [things]. Euthymius cites this in his commentary on the psalms.

• On Psalm 48, upon that text Fear not, when a man shall be made rich, one homily, [beginning] A farmer indeed.

• On Psalm 49, 1 homily, beginning He himself also said elsewhere.

• On Psalm 50, 2 homilies, of which the first [begins] Painters imitate; but the second begins The leavings of another's table.

• On Psalm 100, 1 homily, [beginning] We again, most beloved.

• On Psalm 108, 1 homily, [beginning] Here we have need of great prudence. Euthymius cites this in his commentary on the psalms.

• On Psalm 109, 1 homily, [beginning] Let us rise up, I pray, and bend our mind.

• On Psalm 110, 1 homily, [beginning] What is [it] in the whole?

• On Psalm 111, 1 homily, [beginning] The proem of this psalm seems to me.

• On Psalm 112, 1 homily, [beginning] In the scriptures words are often made.

• On Psalm 113, 1 homily, [beginning] Here he testifies the great kindness of God.

• On Psalm 114, 1 homily, [beginning] And who is [it], he says.

• On Psalm 115, 1 homily, [beginning] Of this saying, blessed Paul. Euthymius cites this in his commentary on the psalms.

• On Psalm 116, 1 homily, [beginning] Whose [meaning] is clear.

• On Psalm 117, 1 homily, [beginning] The saying indeed of the psalm.

• On Psalm 119, 1 homily, [beginning] Of other psalms indeed.

• On Psalm 120, 1 homily, [beginning] See again the soul.

• On Psalm 121, 1 homily, [beginning] But now many take the word ill.

• On Psalm 122, 1 homily, [beginning] They are sometimes profitable.

• On Psalm 123, 1 homily, [beginning] What I have often said, this too I now say.

• On Psalm 124, 1 homily, [beginning] Why did he not say absolutely, "Like a mountain"?

• On Psalm 125, 1 homily, [beginning] The word "captivity" is indeed.

• On Psalm 125 [so printed; probably 126], 1 homily, [beginning] This psalm was spoken concerning the state of affairs. [→ p277]

- On Wisdom chapter 3, 1 homily, [beginning] But the souls of the just.

On Isaiah the prophet, it is reported that Chrysostom composed entire commentaries, of which we now hold a fragment of a continuous explanation — from the beginning of the book up to the middle of the eighth chapter — according to the historical and mystical sense, lately turned into Latin by the industry of Godefridus Tilmannus [Godfrey Tilmann]; whose beginning is By what virtue especially this prophet outshone the rest.

We have likewise, of Chrysostom, on Isaiah chapter 1, On penitence — that it abolishes the stains and traces of all sins, 1 homily, which begins Although I have been absent from you for some time; and it is the same as that which, among the ten homilies of Chrysostom On Penitence, is inscribed the third.

• Likewise, on Isaiah chapter 6, On the vision of [the Lord] sitting on a throne, 3 homilies, of which the first begins I behold you; the second, I rejoice, beholding; the third, A noble theater for us.

• On the last chapter of Jeremiah, On the devastation of Jerusalem, 1 homily — which Chrysostom recalls in the preface of the homily upon There must be heresies.

• On Jonah, 1 homily, beginning It came to pass — which is collected from the first homily of the author On Penitence.

• Likewise, on 2 Maccabees chapter 7, on the contest [martyrdom] of the seven Maccabees, 1 homily, [beginning] How beautiful and pleasing.

These are the works which, out of the monuments of Chrysostom on the Old Testament, have come to light up to our times. But those on the New Testament — which are either published here and there, or found cited among the ancient authors — follow below, namely:

On the Gospel of Matthew, from beginning to end, 91 Homilies of continuous explanation, with Anianus the deacon and George of Trebizond as translators; of which the first begins Εἰ δεῖ μὲν ἡμᾶς — that is, It behoved us indeed.

He is also said, besides these homilies, to have written various sermons on various scattered passages of Matthew, of which two are especially celebrated — namely, On the martyrdom of John the Baptist, on the 14th chapter of Matthew. Of these, the one now extant thus begins: Alas, what shall I do? whence shall I make the beginning of my discourse? But the beginning of the other, which we now lack, is Again Herodias rages. The occasion of this sermon Socrates, in his ecclesiastical history, relates in these words:

> The Empress Eudoxia, on account of her statue being cast down [insulted] by Chrysostom, prepared a synod against him. Perceiving which, he brought forth a homily in the Church, in which — under the pretext of setting forth the savagery of Herodias against John the Baptist — he gravely complained of the unjust persecution of the Empress, thus beginning: "Again Herodias rages, again she is disturbed, again she dances, again she desires to receive the head of John on a platter," etc. Which oration so exacerbated the fury of the Empress that she immediately drove him into exile. Thus Socrates.

• There is extant likewise, upon that text Matthew 25, What you did to one of the least of mine, 1 homily, which begins Meadows and woody places.

• Likewise, on Matthew 26, On the betrayal of Judas, 1 homily, which begins Few things are necessary today.

That upon Mark also, and Luke, celebrated commentaries were left by Chrysostom, Euthymius and Suidas are witnesses — commentaries which our age has not yet seen. Yet there survive, from various passages on Luke, 6 homilies of his, namely:

• On Luke 16, On the rich man and Lazarus, 4 homilies, of which the first begins Yesterday; the second, I marveled; the third, No mean profit; the fourth, What remains of the parable of Lazarus.

• Likewise, on Luke 18, On the publican and the Pharisee, 1 homily, which begins As the concourse of clouds.

• Likewise, on Luke 23, on the cross and the thief, 1 homily, which begins This day.

On the Gospel of John we have [homilies] of continuous [explanation] [→ p278]

Book IV, letter I — the St. John Chrysostom First Catalog continuing: the John homilies (88, Griffolini's version) and the Cana homily; the Acts homilies (55, defended as genuine against Erasmus, with the "I am called John, but am not the Apostle John" passage; Chrysostom lived under Julian); Acts 9 (Paul's conversion); then the great catalog of the Pauline homilies, prefaced by George of Alexandria's story of St. Paul appearing to dictate the commentary into Chrysostom's ear, recognized by the venerated image of Paul in his chamber. Running head: LIBER QVARTVS.)*

[Letter I — St. John Chrysostom, First Catalog continued from p277:]

...[On the Gospel of John we have Homilies] of continuous and complete enarration, 88 in number, from the version of Francis of Arezzo [Griffolini]; of which the first begins Who by the contest of the games. There are also reported, on various chapters of this Gospel, some Homilies beyond the aforesaid number, of which only one — on John chapter 2, On the marriage celebrated at the feast [of Cana] — is thought to be the author's; whose beginning is The young of swallows.

On the Acts of the Apostles we have 55 homilies of continuous and complete exposition, by an uncertain translator; which, although Erasmus has called into doubt, yet no one can doubt that they are Chrysostom's. For besides that the frequent little questionings, dialogisms, and digressions of commonplaces toward the end of the homilies show the work to be Chrysostom's, the author himself, in the ninth homily, professes himself to be a Bishop; and in the eleventh homily indicates that he is Bishop of a most ample City, in which live more than a hundred thousand of the poor, needy of daily alms — such as Constantinople certainly, it is credible, was in Chrysostom's times. And the same [author], in the 9th and 12th homily, continually inculcates that law concerning oaths not to be sworn (peculiar to Chrysostom alone), adding also that he would cast out of the Church those who did not obey this law promulgated by him, and whoever should swear in any way. And in the 41st homily he indicates that he lived in the times of the Emperor Julian.[1] Finally, in the 52nd homily he incidentally makes mention of his own name in these words: To have the name of a prince is not to be a prince. For many are called by great names, as Peter, James, and John: but they are not, on account of the names, that which they are called — just as I also, although I am called John, am not, however, [the Apostle] John. But also John Damascene, in the 3rd book On the Faith, and Oecumenius, in his catena of explanations on Acts, bring forth testimonies of these sermons, as from a true and genuine work of Chrysostom, whose beginning is There are very many who are so ignorant of this book.

There remains likewise, after these sermons, on the 9th chapter of Acts, On the conversion of Paul, 1 homily, which begins They reprove us.

On all the epistles of Paul Chrysostom composed a great and distinguished volume of homilies, of which George, patriarch of Alexandria, making mention in the life of Chrysostom published by him, thus writes:

> The divine John, when he had begun to explain Paul's epistles — which he embraced with a vehement love beyond the other divine books — and had written many narrations upon them on each night, by the light of a wax taper, and had now for the most part interpreted them, one night, sitting in his chamber and bending over the exposition, began to be vexed with a certain human weariness, saying: "And who knows whether these things are accepted by God, and whether they will bring me favor from Him? And would that these things had been narrated without mark of reproof — have I attained the meaning of that wise and great man?" On this matter, that he might be made more certain by some proof, he suppliantly implored God. And behold, that same night, when — the papers snatched into his hands — he was bending more closely over the commentaries to be written on the Apostle, Paul the Apostle came to him, murmuring the exposition into his ears;[2] whom Proclus the chamberlain, keeping watch at the doors of the chamber and looking through a certain hole of the door, plainly saw — putting his mouth downward toward John's right ear, and familiarly dictating the things which John wrote. Now the form and appearance of the Apostle was in every part like the image of St. Paul which Chrysostom kept in his chamber, painted to the life, with the utmost veneration.[3] Thus George.

And the catalog of the homilies of this volume [on Paul] is this:

• On the Epistle to the Romans, 32 homilies, with Germain de Brie [Brixius] as translator, of which the first begins Συνεχῶς ἀκούων — that is, Continually hearing.

• On the First Epistle to the Corinthians, 44 homilies, with Francis of Arezzo as translator, of which the first begins Ὅρα πῶς εὐθέως — Behold how immediately.

• On the Second Epistle to the Corinthians, 30 homilies, of which the first begins Ἄξιον ζητῆσαι πρότερον — It is worthwhile to inquire first.

• On the Epistle to the Galatians, a commentary of continuous exposition, divided into no homilies, whose beginning is Πολλοῦ τὸ προοίμιον — The proem [is worth] much.

• On the Epistle to the Ephesians, 24 homilies, of which the first begins Ἰδοὺ πῶς τὸ "διὰ" τῷ πατρὶ δέδωκε — See how he attributes the [word] "through" to God the Father.

• On the Epistle to the Philippians, 16 homilies, of which the first begins Οἱ φιλιππήσιοι — The Philippians.

• On the Epistle to the Colossians, 12 homilies, of which the first begins πᾶσαι μὲν ἅγιαι — All [things] indeed holy.

• On the First Epistle to the Thessalonians, 11 homilies, of which the first begins Τί δήποτε φιλιππησίοις — For what reason to the Philippians.

• On the Second Epistle to the Thessalonians, 5 homilies, of which the first begins ἐν τῇ προτέρᾳ ἐπιστολῇ — In the former epistle.

• On the First Epistle to Timothy, 18 homilies, of which the general argument begins τῶν τοῦ ἀποστόλου — One of the Apostles.

• On the Second Epistle to Timothy, 10 homilies, of which the first begins Τί δήποτε καὶ δευτέραν — For what reason also a second.

• On the Epistle to Titus, 6 homilies, with Ambrose the Camaldolese [Traversari] as translator, of which the first begins τῶν Παύλου συνόντων — One of Paul's companions.

• On the Epistle to Philemon, 3 homilies, with Ambrose the Camaldolese as translator, of which the first begins πρῶτον ἀναγκαῖον — First it is necessary.

• On the Epistle to the Hebrews, 33 homilies, of which the first begins Ῥωμαίοις γράφων — Writing to the Romans. These Constantine the Presbyter, after the death of Chrysostom his teacher, collected out of his scattered enarrations into one body of complete enarration; and Mutius the Scholastic made them Latin.

There are extant, besides this already-described order of homilies, also twenty other Homilies on various passages of the epistles of Paul, namely:

• On the passage Romans chapter 16, Salute Prisca and Aquila, 1 homily, [beginning] Are you not learned?

• On the passage 1 Corinthians 7, The woman is bound to the law. On the bill of divorce, 1 homily, [beginning] Some time ago, to you, blessed Paul.

• On the passage 1 Corinthians 10, I would not have you ignorant, that the fathers were under the cloud, 1 homily, [beginning] Sailors [shun] that part of the sea.

• On the passage 1 Corinthians 7, Concerning virgins [I have] no commandment, etc.: On virginity, one book — whose author himself mentions [it] in the 19th homily on the First [Epistle] to the Corinthians.

• On the passage 1 Corinthians 11, There must be heresies, 1 homily, [beginning] A sermon [→ p279]

[Letter I — St. John Chrysostom, First Catalog concluded, then the Second Catalog:]

- ...[On the passage 1 Corinthians 11, There must be heresies, 1 homily, beginning] Your assembly.
- On 1 Corinthians 16, On the collection for the saints, and almsgiving, 1 homily, [beginning] I rose up today.
- On that text 2 Corinthians 11, Would that you would bear a little of my folly, 1 homily, [beginning] All indeed I love.
- On that text Philippians 1, Whether by occasion, or by truth, Christ is announced, 1 homily, [beginning] When formerly the Pharisees.
- On that text 1 Timothy 5, Use a little wine, 1 homily, [beginning] You have heard the Apostolic voice.
- On that text 1 Timothy 6, Charge the rich not to be highminded, 1 homily, [beginning] What shall I say, or what shall I speak?
- On that text Philemon 1, Paul, a prisoner of Christ, 1 homily, [beginning] The prudence indeed of the ruler.
- On that text Hebrews 10, If we sin willfully, 1 homily, [beginning] All the trees.

Likewise, on the praises of Paul, nine homilies, with Anianus as translator, explaining many things both of Paul's epistles and of those things which Luke writes of Paul in the Acts; of which the first begins He would err in nothing at all.

There is extant likewise, besides the lucubrations already enumerated, a Translation of both Testaments into the Armenian tongue — which the Armenians now use — published (as they themselves believe) by the industry and solicitude of Chrysostom.[1] George, patriarch of Alexandria, mentions this Translation in the life of Chrysostom, relating that when he was in exile at Cucusus, a town of Armenia, he led the inhabitants of that region to Christ, and thereafter took care that the Psalms of David, together with the holy Gospels and other histories of the Old Instrument, should be turned into Armenian — that the peoples of that province might the more easily obtain the knowledge of the divine scripture.

These, then, are the true and legitimate writings of Chrysostom which survive out of the so many published by him on the sacred letters. But the other exegetical writings, which — under the false title of Chrysostom — are mixed in among his true works, the following catalog will comprise.

CATALOG OF THOSE [WORKS] WHICH ARE WRONGLY THOUGHT TO BE INSCRIBED TO ST. CHRYSOSTOM.

- On Genesis chapter 2, 1 homily, which begins The dignity of human origin.
- On Genesis chapter 2, 1 homily, beginning God the founder of the World — which is collected from centos of Augustine; and there are in it two entire chapters transcribed from the book On Ecclesiastical Dogmas, namely the thirty-first and the thirty-second.
- On Genesis chapter 2, 1 homily, [beginning] Adam is commanded.
- On Genesis chapter 3, 1 homily, [beginning] God without beginning.

• On Genesis chapter 3, 1 homily, [beginning] As often as with me of time.

• On Genesis chapter 3, 1 homily, [beginning] For the Christian with the enemy.

• On Genesis chapter 15, 1 homily, [beginning] Faith is [the ground] of religion.

• On Genesis chapter 25, 1 homily, [beginning] Rebecca was carrying.

• On Genesis chapter 37, 1 homily, [beginning] But the sons of Jacob.

• On Exodus chapter 17, 1 homily, [beginning] Moses stood.

• On Judges chapter 11, 1 homily, [beginning] God who willed.

• On 1 Kings [1 Samuel] 13, 1 homily, [beginning] The Lord God with David.

• On 2 Kings [2 Samuel] 7, 1 homily, [beginning] Imitators of Christ.

• On 2 Kings [2 Samuel] 17, 1 homily, [beginning] Absalom destroyed.

• On 3 Kings [1 Kings] 17, On Elijah, 1 homily, [beginning] Glorious once.

• On the same, 1 homily, [beginning] When the sins committed.

• On 4 Kings [2 Kings] 2, On the ascension of Elijah, 1 homily, beginning Among certain ancients. This, Bede, in his Questions on the book of Kings, thinks to be Chrysostom's; but the style points to the author of that homily whose beginning is Rejoice, O heaven, and be in gladness, O earth — which is placed among the pseudepigrapha of Jerome, for the day of the Lord's resurrection, and among the sermons of Eusebius of Emesa.

• On 4 Kings [2 Kings] 5, On Naaman, 1 homily, [beginning] When Naaman.

Although these sermons thus far enumerated are themselves learned and worthy to be eagerly read by the studious, nevertheless by many not-to-be-despised conjectures it appears that they are not Chrysostom's, but of other authors — in whom there is neither that candor nor that unbroken ease of discourse which we admire in Chrysostom, but a discourse choppy, clipped, and somewhat harshly overwrought, having nothing of those similitudes and comparisons which are Chrysostom's chief ornaments; but abounding on the contrary in words that answer one another alike and in sentences that end alike, as is that which is read in the exposition of Psalm 33: Come now, my brethren, in this manner I wish to reply: as many as now say "I will not," who were but now saying "I will." And likewise this: Let the holy oracles of the reading, which sound in your ears, make a nest in your hearts — from which forms of speaking Chrysostom most greatly recoils.

Some also of these sermons contain certain marks from which you might easily suspect that their author did not write in Greek: such as some figures of speech which cannot be adapted to the Greek tongue, and likewise certain interpretations of words — as the etymology of Meridies (Midday), which you have in the homily on Psalm 90, namely: It is called Meridies because it divides the day; for meros [a part] is a divided portion of the day. And in the homily on Psalm 118: Veritas (Truth) is three syllables and seven letters: because on the seventh day God rested from his works. Besides, these homilies, contrary to Chrysostom's custom, are stripped of any exordium at the entrance of the discourse, without moral exhortations before the end, and without any doxologies or prayers in the conclusion of the sermon; and moreover the commonplaces on original sin, on predestination, on foreknowledge, on the hardening [of the heart], on grace and merit, which are handled at length in certain of the sermons, seem more peculiar to Augustine than to Chrysostom — who, as he always abstains from these, so he is nowhere accustomed to cite the names of the ecclesiastical doctors.[1] Some of them, however, are in these sermons brought in by name, as Hippolytus and Cyprian; and John the Evangelist too is cited under the title of "the Theologian" — which surname I do not know whether Chrysostom anywhere bestowed on John, though he was often accustomed to call him "the son of thunder."

Nor do I think it ought to be passed over, that this author divides and expounds the readings of the Scriptures, whatever they be, verse by verse, sometimes indeed marked off by number, frequently repeating this: The verse which we have just now heard; likewise, There follows another verse; likewise, Let us return to the proposed verses of the narrative; and again, Now that the first verse has been examined, and likewise the second, let us look at the third also — which formula of dividing you will nowhere find in Chrysostom's writings. To this is added, that the author often, forsaking the historical sense, without any occasion slides off into allegorical and anagogical senses — a thing Chrysostom does most rarely, and only when driven by necessity. But whoever the writer of these sermons may have been, it appears that he is ancient: both from the ancient translation of the Scriptures expounded by him (which is no light indication of antiquity), and from the paschal baptism and the other ancient rites of the Church, which he records as having been in observance in his own times.

Thus far concerning the pseudepigrapha belonging to the Old Testament; now we shall enumerate those which look to the New.

ON MATTHEW there is extant an unfinished work [Opus imperfectum] of an uncertain author, divided into 54 homilies — although it has no [true] homilies, but is one continuous commentary, containing an uninterrupted exposition of the Evangelist, namely from the beginning down to the middle of chapter 13, and again from the beginning of chapter 19 to the end of chapter 25; whose opening is, As they relate, that Matthew, &c. Concerning this work indeed diverse judgments are reported. There are those who deny it to be Chrysostom's, both on account of the Vulgate translation of the Latin Church which is discussed in it, and on account of the frequent allegories and citations of apocryphal writers, [→ p281]

[→ p281: catchword "quibus"]

[1] St. Chrysostom is not accustomed to cite the names of ecclesiastical doctors.

(Rich PDF p. 281 [printed folio 262, verso]. Book IV, letter I — still within St. John Chrysostom (Second Catalog, spurious works). Sixtus finishes the Opus imperfectum on Matthew: the case against it (a Latin author, heretical dogmas of Montanus/Mani/Arius/Donatus/Pelagius, condemned by Pope Paul IV) and the case for it (its public liturgical use and weighty sentences; the heresies interpolated by heretics, shown by a threefold argument; Chrysostom's own anti-Arian homilies quoted at length). Then the medley [farrago] of diverse sermons of an "Uncertain Monk" begins. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

[Letter I — St. John Chrysostom, Second Catalog: the Opus imperfectum on Matthew, continued:]

...[apocryphal writers] whom the author uses, citing the Scripture of Seth, the Apocryphon of Ezekiel, the Itinerary of Clement, and other things like these, most remote from Chrysostom's practice. To these they add that the phrasing, the expositions, and the dogmas of the commentaries are more contrary to Chrysostom's tongue and mind than fire is to water. For both the character of the diction and certain figures, in no way answering to Greek discourse, indicate that the writer was a Latin; while the heretical dogmas scattered everywhere throughout the work openly prove that the same [author] was a heretic — not attached to one sect only, but entangled in the various heresies of Montanus, the Manichaeans, Arius, Donatus, and Pelagius, and on account of those heresies deservedly condemned by the Church, and by Pope Paul IV enrolled in the catalog of writers of suspect faith.

There are, on the opposite side, those who contend that this very work is Chrysostom's — led not only by the authority of the Apostolic Church, which publicly, among the divine praises, reads homilies out of these commentaries under the name of John Chrysostom, but also moved by the weight and gravity of the sentences and propositions of this work; which, for the confirmation of Christian dogmas, are brought in under the title, testimony, and authority of Chrysostom in the authentic Glosses which they call the Ordinary [Gloss], in the Catenae of the Gospel explanations, in the Decrees of the supreme pontiffs, and in the Summae of Theologians of great name — in which places many of these sentences, most diligently weighed, are vindicated from all suspicion of error.

Nor does the recent edict of Pope Paul IV stand against these [defenders] in anything: since he did not simply and altogether reject this whole work — approved now for so many ages by the common assent of the Church — but forbids only those copies of the work which are found corrupted by heretics beyond the author's intention, and defiled with those dregs with which they now teem. But that these dregs and filth crept into these commentaries not by the author's fault, but by the fraud of heretics, they establish by a threefold indication. First, because certain very ancient copies contain nothing of errors of this kind, but others have them all added in the margins by another hand. Secondly, because whatever is heretical is so stitched onto the genuine reading by [an added] inference, that if it be cut away, not even a hair's breadth of the sense is changed — which surely could not be so, if it had been genuinely woven in by the author himself; just as no member can be taken from the human body without a deforming mutilation of the whole frame. Thirdly, because it is not credible that an author who was neither mad nor forgetful — writing on the same matters and in almost the same passages — should have thought and said things contrary to himself, and especially in those matters wherein he is accused of being an Arian. For how would it be likely that he agreed with the Arians about the inequality and the diverse substance of the Father and the Son, who in many places defends against the Arians the unity and equality of both? — and especially in homily 44, upon those words, Woe to you, Scribes and Pharisees, who shut up the kingdom of heaven, where he writes thus: "So also now the priests of the heretic shut up the gate of truth. Therefore, when they read among their people something such as He who sent me is greater than I, by a perverse interpretation they shut the gate of truth, saying the Son is less than the Father — whereas he is called 'less' only according to the dispensation of the flesh." And in homily 28, in the exposition of that saying, All things have been delivered to me by my Father, propounding and dissolving the argument of those who from these words built up [the claim] that the Son is less than the Father, he says thus: "By whom were all things delivered to him, if the Father and the Son are one? Or why could he not have [them] unless they had been delivered to him, if in all things he was equal to his Father? For the signification of 'delivering' excludes the notion of unity as much as of equality. I answer: they were delivered to him according to that whereby he was made a little less than the angels; for according to that whereby he thought it not robbery to be equal to God, God is one, and equal to him who delivered all things." And in the forty-fifth homily, expounding that [text] of Matthew 23, And do you also fill up the measure of your fathers, he says: "When you see three heretics equal in all things, saying [they are] not of the same substance, not of the same authority, without beginning, all these differing from one another in some part — do not wonder: for they fill up the measure of their Gentile fathers, since those likewise worshipped many gods." By which words, indeed, what could be said more openly against the Arian opinion that is ascribed to this author?

This, then, is the controversy over these commentaries; concerning which let those more learned than I judge. I, for what I would add, have nothing except this: that the work itself is eloquent and learned, and worthy to be read continually — provided, however, that it first be most diligently purged of those errors which, in the sixth book, in the censures upon the expositors of Matthew, I have noted. This author flourished (as is gathered from his 33rd and 49th homilies) after the times of Theodosius Augustus; and he wrote also, upon the other Evangelists, commentaries of like industry.

Thus far concerning the unfinished work on Matthew. After which there is held, among the works of Chrysostom, a medley [farrago] of diverse sermons upon various passages of the four Evangelists — of which some are taken from the homilies of Chrysostom, others from the already-mentioned unfinished work, and others are thought to be by the same author of whom we have fourteen sermons on Mark; who (so far as is discerned from his writings) was a monk placed under the authority of a bishop, and published his explanations for monks, with frequent allegories interspersed — and sometimes forced ones, a thing of which he himself was not unaware. For in homily 9 on Mark he excuses himself in these words: "You think we do violence to the scripture; and perhaps someone may say in silent thought, 'This man always follows allegories and does violence to the holy scripture,' &c." Of this [author], then, and of others, these following are the homilies:

- On the second chapter of Matthew, On the coming of the Magi, a homily of an Uncertain Monk, which begins This Isaiah [foretold as] to come.
- On Matthew 2, On the flight of the child into Egypt, a homily of an Uncertain Monk. — This child I.
- On Matthew 2, On the slaughter of the infants, a homily of an Uncertain Monk. — A new [one] is dedicated.
- On Matthew 2, On the return of the child into Judea, a homily of an Uncertain Monk. — In that which he said.

(Rich PDF p. 283 [printed folio 264, verso]. Book IV, letter I — the St. John Chrysostom entry closes with his death (exiled by Theophilus of Alexandria and the Empress Eudoxia, †Comana in Pontus, AD 405) and the abridgers of his exegesis (Theodoret, Theophylact, Euthymius Zigabenus, Oecumenius). The John (Ioannes) catalog then resumes: John son of Christopher, John Dietenberger, John Docaus of Laon, the long John Dominici (Cardinal, Archbishop of Ragusa, †1418), John Driedo of Turnhout (his four Isagogic books on the Ecclesiastical Scriptures), and the opening of John Duns Scotus. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

[Letter I — St. John Chrysostom concluded, then the John catalog resumes:]

This most blessed man dies — driven into exile by the faction of Theophilus of Alexandria and of Eudoxia Augusta — at the little town of Comana on the borders of Pontus, in the year (as Socrates relates) 405 from the birth of Christ, on the 14th day of September, in the seventh consulship of Honorius and the second of Theodosius. His exegetical writings were abridged by Theodoret bishop of Cyrrhus, Theophylact bishop of Bulgaria, Euthymius Zigabenus, and Oecumenius.

John, son of Christopher [Ioannes Christophori], a Dominican, long exercised in the Scriptures and nobly learned in secular philosophy, a scholastic in faculty and in speech, wrote a scholastic Postil on the four gospels and on all the epistles of Paul. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1240.

John Dietenberger [Ioannes Dietembergius], of the Order of Preachers, an excellent professor of theology and an inquisitor of heretical depravity, whose work of Confutations against the Lutheran scripturarians is extant; he bestowed both instruments of the sacred Law [both Testaments] upon the German tongue. He flourished under Charles V, Augustus, in the year 1520.

John Docaus [Ioannes Docaus], bishop of Laon, learned and eloquent, wrote upon the gospels which are read on the weekdays of Lent homilies elegant in style and notable for piety, of which the first begins In the first place let us say; likewise a narration on the Lord's Passion according to Matthew, which begins Paul, a chosen vessel. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1555.

John Dominici [Ioannes Dominici], Cardinal of the title of St. Xystus, Archbishop of Ragusa, a Florentine by birth, a Dominican by order, the teacher of Antoninus Archbishop of Florence; a man resplendent in sanctity, learning, and Tuscan eloquence, and excelling in such quickness of wit and tenacity of memory that he himself, in the book which he entitled Lucula Noctis [the Firefly of the Night], affirms upon inserted oath that he had no teacher in any branch of knowledge, but, after the example of Augustine, learned and understood all the disciplines by himself.[1] When this man had been sent to the Council of Constance by Gregory XII for the union of the Church, the Council being finished and the union entered upon, at the urging of the Emperor Sigismund he was sent by Pope Martin V as legate into Pannonia [Hungary] to extinguish the heresies of the Bohemians lately sprung up. Having set out thither, when he found minds so hardened in heresy that they could neither be bent by exhortations nor recalled from their undertaking by any prayers or threats, the case being desperate, he betook himself to Buda, the royal city of Pannonia, where, wasting away with grief of mind, he put off mortality in the year of the Lord 1418; and he was buried in the church of St. Paul the first hermit, resplendent with many miracles. He therefore, among his many scholastic expositions of the scriptures, left [these] scholastic commentaries:

- On Ecclesiastes,
- On the Song of Songs,
- On the Gospel of Matthew,
- On the Epistle to the Romans,
- Likewise, fifty sermons on the first nine Psalms, which he delivered to the people at Florence in the cathedral church, from Septuagesima Sunday to the third day of Easter, arranged in scholastic discourse;
- Likewise, on 1 Corinthians chapter 12, one [book] On Charity, beginning If I speak with the tongues of men.

John Driedo of Turnhout [Ioannes Driedo, Turnoutensis], most learned on every side, and public professor of sacred Theology in the most flourishing University of Louvain, wrote — in an easy and not at all uncultivated style, [dedicated] to John, king of Lusitania [Portugal] — four Isagogic [introductory] books on the Ecclesiastical Scriptures, learned and much to be praised, whose division is this:

The first book, divided into four chapters, shows in the first chapter the dignity, utility, number, order, and division of the Books of sacred Scripture; the second propounds certain difficulties arising, from the opinions of the fathers, over the things already said; the third brings forward certain canons necessary for resolving the difficulties; the fourth resolves the difficulties.

The second book is completed in three chapters: of which the first is on the translations of the holy Scriptures; the second on the multitude of the senses of sacred Scripture; the third on the way by which the ancient understanding of the Scriptures is to be investigated.

The third book contains treatises divided into several chapters. In the first it delivers certain general precepts, drawn from Augustine's book On Christian Doctrine, necessary for opening up the twofold difficulty of Scripture — namely, of things and of words. In the second it deals specially with certain obscurities which occur in the Scriptures according to the speech or diction. In the third, [it treats] of the difficulties which are in the Scriptures on account of the things themselves being difficult in themselves.

The fourth book, divided into six chapters, discusses the Apocryphal books and the writings of the ecclesiastical Fathers established outside the canon. The beginning of the whole work is, [He who is] about to treat of the things of the faith.

After these, he composed a treatise on the times, for illustrating the obscurities arising in sacred Scripture from the varying number of the periods and the diverse reckoning of the years, divided into five parts, whose distribution is this. In the first part he shows the diversity, and the cause of the diversity, of reckoning which exists among the ancient writers, and lays down that the reckoning to be followed is that of Berosus the Chaldaean, Metasthenes the Persian, Manetho the Egyptian, Philo the Jew, Xenophon the Greek, and Fabius Pictor and Cato of the Romans — whose Chronography he demonstrates to agree with the Hebrew truth of holy Scripture. In the second he reviews the enumeration of the aforesaid Chronographers, conformable to holy Scripture. In the third he compares the times of the Gentile kings whom Scripture records with the deeds of those same kings recorded in the Scriptures. In the fourth he works out the reckoning of the weeks of Daniel. In the fifth he treats of the times to come at the last coming of Christ. This treatise, previously published by him, he most fittingly joined to the third book On the Divine Scriptures which he afterward wrote. He flourished under Charles V, Augustus, [in] 1540.

[Letter I — the John catalog, continued:]

John Duns [continued] — on account of [his] most profound obscurity of speech he was surnamed Σκότιος [Skotios], that is, the Shadowy (which was once the surname of the most obscure Anaxagoras); and, because of the new Academy of Scholastic Theology called after his name, he is most famous in all the schools. He is reported to have written commentaries on the Gospel and on the Apostle [Paul], of which I myself have read a fragment on the Epistle to the Romans — very learned and profound in sense, but (true to the author's name) shadowy, obscure, and scarcely passable in his school even to the well-practiced — whose beginning is, Concerning the Epistle of Paul to the Romans. When in recent years a printer of Lyons was undertaking to print this, and demanded of me an epigram to be prefixed (as is the custom) to the beginning of the work, it came at once into my mind that no verse fits the obscurity of the work more aptly than that which Jerome, from his treatise on Ezekiel, sets before the vision, in these lines:

> This [is] the toil, that the house, and the error past unravelling — > as once in lofty Crete the Labyrinth is said > to have held its path woven amid blind walls, and a treacherous > guile of a thousand ways, whereby the tokens of the followers > were baffled, undetected, and the error past all return.

He flourished in the year of the Lord 1308.

John Eck [Ioannes Eckius], a Swabian, a German by nation, a doctor of the purer Theology and a most keen champion of the Catholic faith against the impiety of the Lutheran heresy, wrote a brief and learned commentary on Haggai, and published two volumes of homilies on the gospels of the whole year. The same [author] translated both Testaments into the German tongue, in the year of the Lord 1540.

John Ferus [Wild] [Ioannes Ferus], a Teuton by nation, of the Order of Minorites, preacher of the cathedral church at Mainz, a man nobly learned in divine letters and endowed with singular eloquence — whose equal in the office of Catholic evangelical preaching the Church of the Germans does not possess in this our age — wrote in Latin, and in cultivated speech, pious and learned lucubrations according to Catholic doctrine, in which he reduced, as into a compendium, the labors of expositors both ancient and recent. Of those which are now extant, and are studiously read by almost all preachers, [these] are:

- Commentaries on Genesis, whose beginning is The face of Moses, when everywhere.
- Lenten sermons on Ezra.
- On Psalm 31, On penitence, 10 sermons.
- On Psalm 66, 10 sermons.
- On Ecclesiastes, according to the letter, 1 book of annotations.
- On Matthew, expounded for preaching, 4 books of commentaries.
- On the Gospel of John, narrated in sermons to the people, 1 book of commentary.
- On Luke chapter 15, On the prodigal son, several sermons.
- An Exegesis on the Epistle to the Romans.
- On the first epistle of John, 1 book of annotations.
- On the festal gospels of the whole year, two volumes of sermons.

He flourished under Charles V, in the year of the Lord 1536.

Dominic Soto [Dominicus Soto] of Segovia, of the Order of Preachers, published Annotations upon the commentaries of this author [Ferus] on John, pointing out that sixty-seven passages in them are to be read with caution; to whom Michael Medina, a Franciscan — praiseworthy for the highest probity and erudition — replied in an Apologetic volume published in defense of those same passages.

John Fisher [Ioannes Fischerus], bishop of the church of Rochester in England — deservedly to be compared, for his abundance of erudition, his sincerity of piety, and his constancy of soul, with any of the most holy and most keen champions of the Church — when he rebuked with the utmost constancy of mind and word the profane marriage of Henry VIII king of the English (who, having repudiated his former wife, had married another), provoked against himself, like another John [the Baptist], the wrath and savagery of a new Herod. By him he was thrust into prison and grievously afflicted with various and frequent torments; and at length, when he had received in chains the insignia of the dignity of Cardinal, sent to him by the Roman pontiff in testimony of his approved faith and constancy, on the following day — before he could put them on — together with very many other innocent monks he received, for faith and truth, the triumphal crown of martyrdom from that most cruel tyrant. He, therefore, among the many and illustrious offspring of his genius which he sent forth into the light against the heretics, left also, for the use of the pious, a most holy and most pious exposition on the seven [penitential] psalms, worthy of a most learned bishop and most constant martyr. He wrote also, on the seventh chapter of Luke, On the single Magdalene, against Jacobus Faber [Lefèvre d'Étaples], "bishop of Vienne" [so styled as printed, but erroneous — Lefèvre held no such see; the same misdescription was flagged at p105], who asserted that there had been several Magdalenes — three books, whose beginning is A certain little book, by the author Jacobus Faber. He flourished under Charles V, Augustus, in the year of the Lord 1536.

John Francis Pico [Ioannes Franciscus Picus], nephew of John Pico [della Mirandola], Count of Mirandola, wrote a brief and moral exposition of the fifteenth Psalm, whose beginning is If anyone perfect; likewise, on Matthew chapter 6, an exposition of the Lord's Prayer. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1500.

John Francis Quintianus of Brescia [Ioannes Franciscus Quintianus, Brixiensis], a most graceful poet, wrote in Latin — from the four Gospels, after the manner of Sophocles and Euripides — a most weighty tragedy on the Passion of the Lord, in the year of the Lord 1520.

John of Frankfurt [Ioannes de Francforte], a German, of the Order of Preachers, put together a scholastic explanation on Job, which Vincentius Bardellus mentions in his book On the Conception of Christ. It is held at Lyons in the Library of the Preachers, with this beginning, O all you who pass by the way.

John Valois, otherwise Galensis [John of Wales], an Englishman by nation, of the Order of Minorites, most learned in the divine Scriptures, who for a long time gloriously taught Theology in the school of Paris; among many illustrious little works he wrote one book on the Apocalypse of John. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1270.

John Gagnée [Ioannes Gagnaeus] of Paris, a Theologian, preacher to Francis, most Christian King of the French, and his chief almoner; a man learned in secular letters and in the divine scriptures, and especially most accomplished in delivering homilies; he gathered, in a brief compendium, most clear and most easy scholia on the whole New Testament, selected from various manuscripts of both languages and from the chief opinions of both Greeks and Latins. Of which the catalog is this: [→ p285]

(Rich PDF p. 285 [printed folio 266, verso]. Book IV, letter I — the John (Ioannes) catalog: John Gagnée's New-Testament scholia and versified Psalter (fl. 1550); John Gauver of Mainz; the long John Gerson (Chancellor of Paris, †1419); John Glodeston; John Goodwick; John Haiton of Lincoln; John Hagen de Indagine (Carthusian); John Halgrin of Abbeville (his "sixth" exposition of the Song of Songs); a second John Hayton entry (a doublet); and the opening of John Hentenius. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

[Letter I — the John catalog, continued; first, John Gagnée's New-Testament scholia catalog (each incipit shown after the em-dash):]

- On the four holy gospels, 1 book, which begins εὐαγγέλιον [euangelion], a Greek word.
- On the Acts of the Apostles, 1 book.
- On all the epistles of Paul, 1 book, whose beginning is Those who give a preface.
- On the seven Canonical [epistles], 1 book, beginning The author of this epistle.
- On the Apocalypse, 1 book, beginning It seemed [good], Christian reader.

The same [Gagnée] also recast all the Psalms of David into lyric [verses] of diverse kinds and into stanzas of various odes, emulating the grace of the song of Pindar and Horace, with a brief prose argument prefixed to each ode explaining the theme of the Psalm, and with the very words of the Psalms themselves written down at the side of the page according to the truth of the Ecclesiastical version — which he everywhere follows in the text of the odes, and expounds, together with the Hebrew truth, in flowery paraphrases. The work begins, [He] who [desires] a studious and exact [rendering]. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1550.

John Gauver [Ioannes Gauuer], a German, of the Order of Carmelites, lector of the monastery of Mainz, a Theologian and distinguished declaimer, in the year of the Lord 1440 wrote, according to the custom of the Scholastics, one book of explanation on Exodus, whose beginning is A law for the common utility; likewise, On the Concord of the Evangelists, 1 book, which begins Because God sent.

John Gerson [Ioannes Gerson], a Gaul by nation, chancellor of the most flourishing University of Paris, most skilled in Scholastic Theology, a poet and orator distinguished in his time, legate of Charles king of the French at the Council of Constance, wrote many noble volumes on the divine letters — in a style indeed scholastic, but not at all unpleasant — in which he so mixed and tempered scholastic subtleties with the sweet affections of mystical Theology that it may be doubted whether he surpassed piety by erudition, or erudition by piety. Of their number there are extant:

- On the literal sense of divine Scripture, 1 book.
- Commentaries on the 7 penitential Psalms, which are believed to be [the work] of Pierre d'Ailly [Petrus Aliacus], his teacher.
- A Monotessaron of the Gospels, that is, One out of four.
- On the Canticle of the Virgin Mary [the Magnificat], 12 books, issued in dialogue form.
- On the beginning of Mark, 1 book.
- On various passages of the Gospels, 1 book of sermons.
- Commentaries on the Song of Songs, published in his extreme old age near the end of his life: in which he discoursed with such diligence upon the fifty properties of divine love, scattered everywhere throughout the whole book of the Song, that all the affections of divine love seem to have been reckoned into this one [work].

This work being finished, three days after, as he lay upon his little bed repeating again and again, with great constancy of countenance and soul, those last words of this Song, Strong as death is thy love, he rendered his soul to God in the 69th year of his age, and in the year of our salvation 1419.[1]

John Glodeston [Ioannes Glodeston], an Englishman, a Carmelite, wrote commentaries on the Gospel of Matthew and of John, and on the Canonical epistle of John. He lived in the year of the Lord 1320.

John Goodwick [Ioannes Goodvvyck] wrote commentaries on Genesis and Daniel. He flourished in the year 1360.

John Haiton [Ioannes Haiton], an Englishman, wrote annotations on the four Gospels, when he was at Lincoln, in the year 1428.

John Hagen de Indagine [Ioannes Hagen de Indagine], a German, a Carthusian, excelling in the knowledge of things divine and human, composed, among very many Scholastic commentaries which he published on the books of the divine scripture:

- On the four books of Kings, according to the fourfold sense, 4 books.
- On the vision of Daniel chapter 7, 1 book.
- Likewise, on that saying [1 Thessalonians 5], We pray that the whole spirit, flesh, and soul be preserved, one book, On the spirit, the soul, and the flesh.

He flourished in the year of the Lord 1460. There are listed, in the Catalog of books lately condemned by Pope Paul IV [the Index], works "of John de Indagine" — not indeed of this one, but of another, who wrote on chiromancy [palmistry].

John Halgrin of Abbeville [Ioannes Halgrinus ab Abbatis villa], dean of Amiens and Cardinal of Sabina, a Scholastic in profession, style, and method, illustrated the Song of Songs with a new kind of explanation, which is called the Sixth. For before him only five modes of exposition of this book had appeared. The first of them [is] of those who interpret the whole Song, according to the literal (Western) letter, of the loves of Solomon and the daughter of Pharaoh, or Abishag the Shunammite. The second, of those who expound the same [Song] as a colloquy between Solomon and the commonwealth of the Jews. The third, of those who — alluding to the book of Martianus Capella entitled On the Nuptials of Philology and Mercury — say that this Song is an Epithalamion of the Wise Man [Sapiens] and Wisdom [Sapientia] conversing with one another. The fourth, of those who affirm this book to be an Epithalamium of Christ and the Church. The fifth, of those who expound the same [Song] concerning the love of the soul toward God, and the love of God toward the soul. To these five expositions, then, John added a sixth, narrating the mutual colloquies of Mary the mother of Christ and of Christ her son — the argument of which narration he himself, in the preface of his commentaries, briefly comprised in these words:

> This Song contains the mutual and joyful applause of the mother and the son — namely, of the blessed Virgin and the Lord Jesus Christ. For here the mother applauds the son; here the son rejoices in the mother; here the son describes the privileges of the mother; here the mother describes the excellence of the son. Now there speak in this Song four persons, namely the Mother, and the Son, and the Angels who attend upon the Son as their Lord, and the young maiden virgins who attend upon the Virgin as their Lady, as the following series of the scripture will make clear.

The work begins, About to expound the Song of Songs to the honor of the mother and the son. Ascensius printed it at Paris in the year 1521. This author flourished in the year of the Lord 1450.

John Hayton [Ioannes Hayton], an Englishman, wrote Annotations on the Gospels of Matthew, Luke, and John; likewise on the Epistle to the Corinthians and to the Hebrews, and on the Canonical Epistle and Apocalypse of John. He lived in the year 1428. [This is a doublet of "John Haiton" above — the same Englishman (fl. 1428) entered twice, with differing work-lists.]

John Hentenius [Ioannes Hentennius], a German by nation, of Nechlin by fatherland, a monk of the Order of St. Jerome, wrote a very brief little commentary on the Apocalypse, to which he gave the title [→ p286]

[→ p286: catchword "IVDI[...]" — the title of Hentenius's Apocalypse commentary]

[Letter I — the John catalog, continued:]

...[John Hentenius, to whose Apocalypse commentary he gave] the title A Judgment concerning the Apocalypse and Antichrist: in which he maintains that that Beast, described in the thirteenth chapter of the Apocalypse, is Muhammad, the false Prophet of the Turks. Its beginning is, Before these [I write] commentaries on the Apocalypse. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1540.[1]

John Hessels of Louvain [Ioannes Hessels à Louanio], royal professor of sacred Theology, wrote commentaries on the Gospel of St. Matthew, on the first Epistle of St. Paul to Timothy; likewise on the first canonical [epistle] of St. Peter, and on the first Canonical [epistle] of John; he wrote also other things against the heretics of our own time. He was a man especially pious and learned, whom I heard teaching at Louvain in the year 1565; and, if I am not mistaken, in the year 1566 he migrated to the world above.

John Hoffmeister [Ioannes Hoffmeisterus], a Swabian by fatherland, of the institute of St. Augustine, and a well-deserving provincial of the same order in Swabia, wrote:

- On Tobit, brief and polished exegeses.
- On Matthew — 1 book.
- On Mark — 1 book.
- On Luke — 1 book.
- On the two epistles of Paul to the Corinthians — 2 books.
- On the epistle to the Philippians — 1 book.
- On the Sunday Gospels — 1 book of homilies.

He flourished in the year of the Lord 1546.

John, son of Ulrich [Ioannes Huldalrici], of Basel, of the Order of Preachers, a youth of a genius divine rather than human — whom you might call erudition itself and sincerity of faith itself — while still young acquired such knowledge of the Greek idiom as scarcely one or another of his age possessed; he wrote therefore, on the Epistle of Paul to the Hebrews, in Greek and in an elegant style, most praiseworthy commentaries. He died at Cologne in the year 1536, while still a youth.

John Justus Landsberg [Lanspergius], a Bavarian, a Carthusian, wrote on all the epistles and gospels of the whole year narrations and sermons, reproducing that ancient and genuine sense and piety of the orthodox fathers. The work begins, Knowing that, &c. [the following printed words, Quinquam nulli non tempori, are obscure as set]. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1540.

John de Isunio [Ioannes de Isunio; name uncertain as printed], of the Order of the Hospitaller Brothers of St. John of Jerusalem, a not-ignoble Theologian, well-deserving of the divine Scriptures, and public lector in the University of Paris, elaborated in scholastic phrasing one book of explanation on Job, whose beginning is He will sustain unto the time; likewise one book on Mark, whose beginning is He was made like to a lion; and, on all the epistles of Paul, [dedicated] to Philip the bishop of Rouen, 14 books. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1390.

John Kynyngham [Ioannes Kininghan], an Englishman, made a lecture [commentary] on the Lamentations, in the year of our Lord Jesus Christ 1399.

John Louis Vives of Valencia [Ioannes Ludouicus Viues, Valentinus], a Spaniard by nation, among many most noble lucubrations — learnedly indeed and accurately composed, in which he joined the highest eloquence with the most complete erudition and most Christian piety — wrote, [dedicated] to William de Croÿ [Guillielmum Crouium], Archbishop of Toledo, most eloquent meditations on the seven penitential Psalms: in which now he himself, now the psalmist, now the sinner, now some other person speak, with sweet affections, either to God, or to themselves, or to others, most piously. Of these the beginning is, I think there are very few. He flourished in the year 1518.

John Maistrosius [Ioannes Maistrosius], a Scot, wrote three books of commentaries on Matthew, in the year of the Lord 792.

John Major [Ioannes Maior], a Scot, wrote a scholastic Postil on the four Gospels, in the year of the Lord 1400 [so printed; the well-known John Major/Mair the Scot belongs to the sixteenth century].

John Montholon of Autun [Ioannes Montholonius, Eduensis], most skilled in both laws, patched together a huge volume, to which he gave the title A Storehouse [Promptuarium] of the Divine and of both branches of Human Law: in which, in alphabetical order, he collected all the maxims and passages which agree in the sacred Letters and in both Laws — the Imperial and the Pontifical — with the addition of many not-to-be-despised annotations opening up the obscurity of those same passages. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1520.

John Mary Verattus of Ferrara [Ioannes Maria Verattus, Ferrariensis], a Carmelite, a Theologian piously and holily learned, and a distinguished declaimer in the Italian tongue, published — [dedicated] to Ippolito d'Este, the most eminent Cardinal — most abundant narrations on five [so printed; six are listed] chapters of Matthew, that is, on the fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, and tenth, arranged into fifteen books, which most beautifully embrace the whole evangelical law and are filled with disputations against the false dogmas of Luther. The work begins, Jesus, seeing the crowds, &c. Here the discourse of the Lord is divided. He wrote also, on the festal gospels of the whole year, 2 volumes of homilies. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1540.

John of Mechelen [Ioannes Mechlinius], a German by nation, perfected by long exercise in the study of secular Philosophy and excellently instructed in the divine oracles — whom the University of Cologne had for many years as public teacher of Theology — among his other works wrote, according to the method of the school, one book of exposition on the Psalms. He flourished under Frederick III the Emperor, in the year 1460.

John Milbachius [Ioannes Milbachius], a German, renowned for scholastic erudition in both sacred and profane letters, and public professor of Theology in the University of Erfurt, sent forth thirteen books of commentaries on Paul, in the scholastic manner, in the year of the Lord 1494.

John, a monk, a Benedictine, a Theologian, Philosopher, and rhetorician, sprung from Germany, professor of the monastery of Kastl [Castellensis] in the diocese of Eichstätt, composed a most useful compendium of the whole scripture, to which he gave the title Breviarium Bibliae [Breviary of the Bible]; likewise, on the gospels and epistles of the whole year, three books of sermons. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1390.

John of Neuville [Ioannes Neouilleus], styled Genuillanus, wrote — [dedicated] to Charles of Lorraine the Cardinal — commentaries on the seven penitential psalms, beginning The Maker of men, &c., in the year of the Lord 1550.

John Nider [Ioannes Nider], of the Order of Preachers, a Teuton by nation, studious and learned in the divine Scriptures, sufficiently taught in scholastic Theology, and most pleasing to the people in delivering sermons, wrote — in a rough but plain style — on the twentieth chapter of Exodus, concerning the ten precepts of the Decalogue, a learned and large [→ p287]

[1] From a Hieronymite he became a Dominican; I heard him teaching Theology at Louvain in the year of the Lord 1565.

(Rich PDF p. 287 [printed folio 268, verso]. Book IV, letter I — the John (Ioannes) catalog: John Nider (his Decalogue and moral-leprosy books); John à Pastura of Gembloux; John Pfeffer of Wittenberg; the great John Pico della Mirandola ("the Phoenix") — his Heptaplus on Genesis 1, the varied judgments on it, and Bishop Lippomano's reason for omitting him; then John Poccanus of Cologne; John du Pré; John Quinquarboreus of Arles; John de Regno; John Royaerts of Antwerp; and the opening of John Rubius of Hainaut. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

[Letter I — the John catalog, continued:]

...[John Nider wrote, on Exodus 20, a learned and large] volume, whose beginning is The most sacred law of the Decalogue; likewise, on the thirteenth chapter of Leviticus, On the moral leprosy, 1 book; likewise, on the gospels of the whole year, two volumes of sermons. He flourished under the Emperor Sigismund, in the year of our Lord Jesus Christ 1430.

John à Pastura [of Pasture], Prior of the monastery of Gembloux [Géblacensis], published a Paraphrase on the Psalter, collected from the doctors of the Church, in the year of the Lord 1510.

John Pfeffer of Wittenberg [Ioannes Phefir, Vitembergensis], the first illustrious teacher of the school of Freiburg, published a distinguished scholastic work, divided into fourteen books, upon the epistles of Paul, which — read publicly — he entitled A Sacerdotal Directory [Directorium Sacerdotale], whose beginning is Concerning the reading of the epistles. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1490.

John Pico [della Mirandola], prince of Mirandola and Concordia in Italy, surnamed the PHOENIX on account of the nobility of his lineage and the rare and singular grace of his most beautiful body and most fair soul — a man of an almost prodigious genius, polished even to a miracle in every variety of the arts, sciences, and tongues — wrote, while quite young, and scarcely reaching his twenty-third year, [dedicated] to Lorenzo de' Medici, a Latin commentary on the first chapter of Genesis, brief but of admirable boldness and beyond the powers of adolescence, marked with the title Heptaplus, whose beginning is The emulation of your studies has moved me, &c.: in which, passing over all that the Latin, Greek, Hebrew, and Chaldaean narrators of Genesis had previously brought forward, he dared not only to promise but also to bring into the open seven new expositions, never before attempted by anyone, but first devised, discovered, and perfected by himself:

- The first is on the elemental and corruptible world, in which he draws all the single words of the first chapter, in a continuous series of exposition, to the explaining of the creation of this sublunary world.
- The second is on the celestial world, in which, by a like artifice, he applies the whole Mosaic narrative to the creation of the celestial spheres.
- The third is on the invisible and angelic world, in which he turns all that Moses writes concerning the work of the six days to the first creation of the Angels.
- The fourth is on the human world, which interprets the whole chapter of the nature of man.
- The fifth is on the distinction of the fourfold world, showing by what operations, properties, and differences the four worlds already mentioned are distinguished from one another.
- The sixth is on the mutual kinship of the worlds, demonstrating how these four worlds agree with one another.
- The seventh is on the Sabbath of the world, and the rest of all creatures in [their] final and eternal felicity.

To these seven expositions there is added, as it were for a crown, a certain specimen of an eighth, Cabalistic explanation — that is, drawn from the Kabbalah of the Jews — which elicits many senses not only from the single sentences and words, but deduces almost infinite mysteries from the single Hebrew letters of each syllable.

But concerning this work the judgments of learned men are various: some admire it as learned and sublime; some despise it as a display of youthful boldness, outwardly swollen but within utterly empty. I remember that in recent years, when I was at Rome, I familiarly asked that most excellent man Luigi Lippomano [Aloysius Lippomanus], bishop of Verona, why, among so many noble authors inserted by him into his Catena, he had made no mention of John Pico, that distinguished man. Then he, turning to me, said with the utmost emphasis of countenance and words: "When I was weaving together a Catena of explanations on Genesis, I chose those Writers who seemed to me to explain the words and thoughts of Moses by their expositions. Accordingly, since I had observed that Pico bent his effort to this one thing only — to express Platonic thoughts, or rather his own fancies, in Mosaic words and sayings — I judged that I had no need of his work." This most noble youth undertook, besides this Heptaplus (which lately Antonio Bonagratia, canon of Pescia, translated into the Tuscan tongue), also commentaries on the Davidic hymns according to the Septuagint edition, and along with these other labors on the sacred letters — about to publish many more still, had not an untimely death, as he was passing his thirtieth year, extinguished him, in the year of the world's redemption 1494. His life was written, in a splendid oration, by John Francis Pico, his nephew, heir of his ancestral virtue. And Antonio Tebaldeo, no ignoble poet, inscribed this elogium on his friend's tomb:

Here lies John Mirandola; the rest is known to Tagus and to Ganges — perhaps to the Antipodes too.

John Poccanus [Ioannes Poccanus], provost of the church of St. George at Cologne, published a Psalter in the Chaldaean tongue, but printed in Ethiopic characters — which the Ethiopian monks now use, who call themselves Indians, and they sing it publicly in the church which they have at Rome.

John du Pré [Ioannes de Pratis], a Gaul, [whose] Dictionary on the sacred Bible I saw in the Library of the Preachers at Lyons, written by hand: whose beginning is such:

The difficult parts which the Bible bears I strive to lay open, &c.

John Quinquarboreus of Arles [Cinqarbres] rendered into Latin the Targum Kinoth, that is, the Chaldaean [Aramaic] Paraphrase on the Lamentations, with the common Latin translation added, that it might more easily appear what advantage or usefulness that translation brings; with notes added also, on each chapter of the Paraphrase, [notes] not to be regretted. The work begins, They wrote most holily. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1549.

John de Regno, a Gaul, professed in the Order of Carmelites in the monastery of Toulouse, a Scholastic in the kind of his Theology and speech, wrote one book on the Gospel of Matthew, in the year of the Lord 1348.

John Royaerts of Antwerp [Ioannes Roiardus, Antuerpiensis], of the Order of Minorites, wrote literal homilies on all the Gospels — the weekday ones as well as the festal, the Lenten, the Advent, and [those] of the whole year — in a style midway between the ancients and the scholastics. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1540.

John Rubius of Hainaut [Ioannes Rubius Hannonius] gathered a Harmony of the four Evangelists into one body of History, with the [reasons] of the order and the agreement added in their places, [→ p288]

John Ruusbroec [Ioannes Rusbrochius], a Carthusian, a most eminent and most holy man, whom they call a second Dionysius the Areopagite, wrote commentaries on the Tabernacle of Moses and on things pertaining to it, wherein many mysteries of Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers are explained lucidly by the divine Spirit, and by no means in a commonplace way. Their beginning is, So run, that you may obtain.

John of Sancta Fides [Ioannes de Sancta fide], an Englishman, expounded the first epistle of John, in the year of the Lord 1359.

John Scotus, a monk of St. Benedict, a hearer of Bede, colleague of Albinus [Alcuin] the deacon and abbot, especially dear to Charlemagne, and learned by continual exercise in the divine Letters, published, in a clear and plain style, three books of commentaries on the Gospel of Matthew. He flourished in the year of the Lord 800.

John Soares [Ioannes Soarezius], Bishop of Coimbra and Count of Arganil in Spain [Iberia; Coimbra is in Portugal], published commentaries on Matthew, distinguished by many most useful treatises, whose beginning is The blessed Apostle and Evangelist. He flourished, celebrated at the Council of Trent, in the year of the Lord 1560.

John Tacesphalus, an Englishman, a Carmelite, famous for his erudition in the holy Scriptures and his practice of preaching, left two books of scholastic commentaries on the Apocalypse of John.

John Tauler [Ioannes Taulerus], a Dominican, a German, whose sermons — published with an admirable spirit — are extant; he wrote one most devout book On the Passion of the Lord, from the four Gospels; likewise one book of sermons, of scholastic meditations, on various passages of the Gospels.

John Tylney of Norwich [Nordouicensis] wrote a postil on the Apocalypse of John. He lived in the year 1430.

John de Torquemada [Ioannes ex Turre cremata], of the Order of Preachers, Cardinal of the title of St. Xystus, a man exercised in the divine scriptures and a most learned interpreter of pontifical law, among other splendid works of his genius published, on all the Davidic Psalms, [dedicated] to Pius II Supreme Pontiff, a most brief, most rich, and most lucid Paraphrase, dictated in a simple and plain style, whose beginning is To the most blessed father, and most merciful. He composed also, on the festal gospels of the whole year, a scholastic Postil; likewise, on the same Gospels, one book of scholastic questions. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1560 [so printed; read ~1460 — his dedication to Pius II, pope 1458–64, places him a century earlier].

John Wallensis [Ioannes Valeis], an Englishman, wrote 1 book on the Apocalypse. He lived in the year 1270. [This duplicates the "John of Wales" (Valois, alias Galensis) entry at p284 — the same Englishman (fl. 1270), one book on the Apocalypse.]

John Verdiacus, of the Order of Preachers, explained the book of the Canticles with scholastic commentaries. Vincentius Bandellus mentions this work in his book On the Conception of the Blessed Virgin.

John Viguier of Grenade [Ioannes Viguerius, Granatensis], a Gaul, of the Order of Preachers, a scholastic by profession, wrote commentaries on the epistle to the Romans, in the year of the Lord 1550.

John Voretan of London [Ioannes Voretan, Londinensis], a Carmelite, wrote a Postil on the Song of Solomon, in the year 1406.

John Trithemius [Ioannes Tritemius], Abbot of Sponheim, author of the Catalog of Illustrious Men, wrote, from the Greek [sources], questions on the Gospel of John, and homilies on various passages of the divine scripture. He flourished in the year of the Lord 1490.

John Zacharias [Ioannes Zacharias], born at Erfurt in Germany, a distinguished interpreter of secular Philosophy, exercised by assiduous reading in the divine volumes, and at the Council of Constance a notable champion of the Catholic faith against the Hussite and Wycliffite heretics, published many illustrious little works: of which there are reported five books on the Pentateuch, and 14 books on all the epistles of Paul, written in scholastic fashion. He flourished in the time of the Emperor Sigismund, in the year of the Lord 1430.

Jordan the Teuton [Iordanus Theutonicus], of the Order of Hermits of St. Augustine, a distinguished expounder of the divine Scriptures, and of excellent genius in delivering sermons, wrote — in a humble and plain style, in the year of the Lord 1410 — not-to-be-despised commentaries on the Apocalypse.

Josephus, born of royal and priestly blood, son of Matthias the priest — whom Jerome calls "the Greek Livy," but the more recent Jews call Joseph Bengorion [ben Gorion] — a Hebrew by nation, a Jerusalemite by fatherland, a priest by lineage; captured in the destruction of Jerusalem, he was led to Rome by the Emperor Titus. And there, on account of the excellence of his genius, he so earned [favor] from the Senate and people of Rome that, while he yet lived, his books were deposited in the public Library, and after his death a bronze statue was set up to him. He was a friend of the Christians, although he was a Jew; and he celebrated our Lord Jesus Christ with a notable elogium in the 18th book of the Antiquities[1] — for which reason St. Jerome reckons him, with fitting praise, in the catalog of Ecclesiastical writers. He, therefore, when he had observed that only the five books of Moses were extant among the Greeks — translated by the Seventy interpreters, by the labor of Ptolemy king of Egypt — resolved, spurred on by the exhortations of Epaphroditus, a most learned man, to deliver the whole history of the Old Testament to Greek ears. Which he also accomplished: having written first in the Hebrew tongue, then also in Greek, περὶ τῆς ἀρχαιολογίας, that is, On Antiquities, in twenty books; in which, preserving at once both the truth of the holy Scriptures and the laws of history, he fitted [the material into] a certain kind of Paraphrase on almost all the books of the Old Instrument — promising also that, if God should prolong his life, he would explain in another volume the causes of the sacred history and all its reasons, both natural and allegorical. These books Rufinus, presbyter of Aquileia, rendered into Latin, beginning his edition in this manner: To write the history, &c.

He wrote likewise, [addressed] to the same Epaphroditus, two books against Apion the Grammarian and Molon [Apollonius Molon], and many others who slandered the sacred histories of the Hebrews as a thing lately sprung up, fabulous, and lying — on the ground that among the noble Greek historians no mention of these things was found. Meeting these [objectors], Josephus brought forward so many testimonies out of the writings of the Phoenicians, Chaldaeans, Egyptians, and Greeks [→ p289]

[1] Josephus the Jew celebrated Christ the Lord with a notable elogium.

(Rich PDF p. 289 [printed folio 270, verso]. Book IV, letter I — the close of the Josephus (Flavius Josephus) entry (his Daniel and 4-Maccabees books; fl. AD 100); a second Josephus (Count Joseph of Tiberias, the convert who found the Hebrew Matthew; †370); Jovita Rapicio of Brescia; Irenaeus of Lyons (with Jerome's report of his millenarianism); Isaac the monk; and the Isidore cluster — Isidore the Elder of Cordova, Isidore Clario of Foligno, and the opening of Isidore of Seville. Running head: BIBLIOTHECAE SANCTAE.)

[Letter I — Josephus concluded, then Jovita, Irenaeus, Isaac, and the Isidores:]

...[Josephus brought forward so many] testimonies, conformable to the sacred histories, that St. Jerome greatly marveled how a Hebrew man, trained from infancy in the sacred letters, could have unrolled such great Libraries of foreign authors. The work begins, Sufficiently, I think.

He wrote also, On the Seventy Weeks of Daniel, one book, of which Jerome makes mention in the preface of the 11th book on Isaiah.
